British journalist obsessed with Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Robert Fisk is back in Canada. Actually, the Lebanon-based reporter for London's Independent, who is feverishly critical of Israel, never really went away. He has been picked up from time to time in various Canadian newspapers, such as the Hamilton Spectator. He also made several appearances last year on CBC Newsworld's Counterspin and CBC Radio's This Morning, where he was often challenged by columnist Norman Spector.

But without someone to rein him in, Fisk, who follows in the tradition of British Arabists like David Hirst and Patrick Seale, remains a formidable force obsessed with Israel.

As of March 2, he now appears in the Toronto Star. The paper announced that Fisk will "report regularly... on matters relating to the looming war in Iraq."

True to form, Fisk required only eight lines in his inaugural piece to get to his real target – Israel.

Ostensibly, of course, Fisk was writing about how the jingoistic U.S. media are cravenly buckling under to orders from U.S. military censors. So he concludes early on "that the Pentagon and the State Department have nothing to worry about." And then the kicker immediately follows, apparently out of the blue: "Nor do the Israelis."

What is the reference to Israel doing here? After all, Fisk is writing about U.S. media coverage of a yet-to-happen war in Iraq. Israel is not involved (except perhaps as a potential victim – once again – of Iraqi missiles). But just as Jerusalem was once viewed as the centre of the medieval world, in Fisk's own peculiar worldview, Israel is now the epicentre of the modern one.

Fisk has written that Israel is the force that "does indeed run U.S. policy in the [Middle East]" (The Independent, April 14, 2002). Perhaps this is why Fisk is so certain that the U.S. media will submit to Israel's will. Thus, in his piece in the Star, he says that CNN bowed to Israeli dictates, and he cites two stories to make his case.

In the first example, CNN brass in Atlanta allegedly withheld a story that was unflattering to Israel and then released it in a bastardized form to please the Israelis.

His second example concerns a CNN reporter who, under orders from Atlanta, had to temper reports of Israel's actions last April during Operation Defensive Shield. (The Independent was one of the British publications that led the way in promulgating the myth of the "Jenin massacre." Fisk's colleague, Phil Reeves, later apologized somewhat for misreporting events in Jenin. Fisk defended Reeves and attacked his critics. In late January, The Independent ran a hateful cartoon depicting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon feeding on a Palestinian child.)

Fisk's assessment of CNN is certainly news to the Israelis, who have long complained about the network's excessively unbalanced reporting. But the issue is not the substance of Fisk's complaints – it's his obsession with Israel.

Fisk himself reported last April from Bethlehem. He compared Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to the Roman persecution of Jesus. "Jesus, one assumes, also had to deal with the Roman version of closed military areas, but he had God on his side. Yesterday, the people of Bethlehem had no one." (The Independent, April 3, 2000).

To say the least, it will be interesting to follow Fisk as he reports on the looming war in Iraq.

That was "Iraq," right?

Iraqi oil not the issue, says Israeli journalist

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The real issue separating some European countries from the United States is who will get the hundreds of billions of dollars in construction contracts when it is time to rebuild Iraq after 20 years of destruction and neglect, says Shmuel Segev, an Israeli author and journalist.

The talk may be all about oil, he told a group of businesspeople at a lunch meeting of the Jewish National Fund Networking Business Club, but the real prize is much bigger than that.

"Everything needs to be rebuilt, and that's a big chunk of money.

"The Russians have signed letters of understanding for $40 billion [US] worth of projects, and the French and Germans aren't far behind. But if America occupies Iraq, Americans get the advantage in bidding on those contracts."

Segev, who divides his time between Winnipeg – his wife's birthplace – and Israel, was well received by the 25 businesspeople at the meeting, including an Orthodox rabbi and an Evangelical minister.

He said that in the early 1990s after the Oslo Accords were signed, both France and the United States proposed competing multi-billion-dollar oil pipelines running from Baghdad to an Israeli port, but the Israelis were not interested.

"The Israelis didn't trust Saddam Hussein," Segev said.

"There was a secret meeting in 1988 in Philadelphia between Yitzhak Rabin, who was then Israel's defence minister, and Iraqi representatives.

"An Arab banker had convinced Hussein that if he wanted a better relationship with the Americans, he would have to moderate his position on Israel, and thereby have America's Jews put pressure on the American government.

"After an hour, Rabin felt that there was something fishy there. That was when he learned about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction," said Segev.

"Those weapons of mass destruction were the major element that convinced [former U.S. president] George Bush to go to war. If Hussein had been able to obtain nuclear weapons, no country in the Persian Gulf would have been safe."

There was another secret meeting between Israeli and Iraqi representatives in Morocco in 1998, Segev said, but the Israelis remained suspicious of Saddam.

Segev said he believes that Americans know far more than what Colin Powell revealed at the United Nations. He also said he can't see President George W. Bush pulling back.

"We should know for sure by the end of March," he said about the coming war.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 30th, 2003.

שואל אותו הגרמני: איזה הוכחות יש לכם?
עונה לו האמריקאי: שמרנו את הקבלות....

התפקיד של קנדה במלחמה

כפי שפורסם, החליטו הקנדים לתת תקציב כדי לשלוח למלחמה שייטת קרב עם מאה אנשי יס. אבל אחרי שחשבו את שער החליפין עם הדולאר האמריקני הסתבר שהתקציב מספיק לסירת קאנו אחת עם שני אינדיאנים. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Hamas threatens Israeli leaders

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel has denied that its assassination of a senior Hamas political leader represents an escalation of its war on terror.

Just the same, after a Hamas founder, Ibrahim Makadme, was killed in a helicopter missile strike Saturday in the Gaza Strip, Hamas declared Israeli leaders "open targets."

In the wake of the Hamas threat, security was tightened around senior Israeli officials.

The developments took place during a weekend when the Palestinians took the first tentative steps toward creating the post of prime minister.

Makadme and three other Hamas members were killed when the missile struck their car.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz described Makadme as the "ultimate arch-terrorist" and vowed that Israel would target more terrorist leaders.

"None of the heads of terrorism, with an emphasis on Hamas, is immune," he told Army Radio. "Israel will put its hands on everyone that is involved in terror, anyone who dispatches terrorists with the goal of killing innocent Israelis."

Mofaz denied, however, that targeting Makadme raised the level of Israel's anti-terror operations.

"There is no escalation here," he said. "The test is simple: involvement in terror."

Israel Radio quoted sources in Jerusalem as saying that the decision to kill Makadme had been made a long time ago, but was put off several times in order to avoid hurting innocent civilians.

Saturday's operation followed a week of Palestinian terror attacks that killed 18 Israelis.

On March 5, a suicide bomber detonated his explosives aboard a Haifa bus. Fifteen people died in the attack. On Saturday, the toll rose to 16 when one of the victims succumbed to his injuries.

In a second attack, two Israelis were killed last Friday night by two gunmen who infiltrated the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba. The gunmen entered a home while the family was celebrating Shabbat, and opened fire.

The dead were later identified as Rabbi Eli Horowitz and his wife Dina. Five others were wounded before the terrorists were killed by Israeli troops. An explosives belt was found on the body of one of the terrorists.

Hamas claimed responsibility for both attacks.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday that the two attacks should give the world an idea of the kind of enemy Israel is up against.

In recent days, Israel has been criticized by the United States, Britain and the European Union for the number of Palestinian civilian casualties resulting from Israel's anti-terror operations in the Gaza Strip.

Regarding one incident, Mofaz told the cabinet on Sunday that the deaths of eight Palestinians in Gaza last week were caused by a Palestinian bomb that went off near them, not by an Israeli tank shell, as the Palestinians had claimed.

The eight were killed March 6 as Israeli troops were withdrawing from the Jabalya refugee camp at the end of a military operation ordered in response to the Haifa bus bombing.

Last Friday, in what was widely described as a significant ratcheting up of Israel's Gaza operations, soldiers took up positions in northern Gaza after Palestinians repeatedly fired rockets from the area in recent weeks on the nearby Israeli town of Sderot.

Still, Palestinians launched four more rockets Sunday at Sderot, but caused no injuries or damage.

In other developments, Israeli troops demolished the homes of the two Hamas gunmen who carried out last Friday night's attack in Kiryat Arba.

Troops also destroyed the home of the suicide bomber who carried out the Haifa attack.

In a change whose significance has yet to be seen, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat named his longtime No. 2 man at the PLO, Mahmoud Abbas, 68, to serve as prime minister. Abbas, 68, also known as Abu Mazen, is considered less hard-line than Arafat.

On Saturday, the PLO's 122-member central council formally decided during a late-night session to create the post of prime minister.

Abbas said he would have to know how much power the new prime minister will have before deciding whether to take the post.

On Sunday, Sharon welcomed the naming of Abbas, but added that Israel would "closely examine the extent of authority he is given."

The Palestinian legislative council must still approve the creation of the position and define its responsibilities.

While Abbas is considered a relative moderate among the top Palestinian hierarchy, there are also reports saying he wrote a 1982 doctoral dissertation and a study two years later about purported secret links between the Nazis and Zionist leaders.

The last day out for father and son

By YAIR ETTINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

HAIFA — "Maybe this is how it should have ended," Devora David, Mordechai Hershko's sister, said last week. "As they say, 'they were together in life and in death' – and that's exactly what happened. Moti brought Tom into the world, and no one can see how either would have managed without the other."

Moti, 41, and his 15-year-old son Tom were both killed in last Wednesday's bus bombing in Haifa as they were on their way home from a day out together.

"Mother, I have a surprise for you!" Ruti recalls him saying excitedly. "I can't tell you now, but I'll tell you later."

"I also had a surprise for him," Ruti added. "I told him he would see it when he got home. That morning, a technician had come to install the high-speed Internet connection I had ordered for him as a surprise. But he never got to play with it. I didn't reveal [my surprise] to him, and he didn't reveal his to me. I still don't know what it was."

Ever since his parents divorced when he was seven, Tom, their only child, has travelled back and forth between their homes in Haifa's Carmel Heights.

He was unusually close to both of them, friends and neighbours said. "He had two warm homes, in both of which he loved and was loved," said Ruti.

Ruti hastened to show off Tom's cellphone, which he had left at home the day of the bombing, to everyone who came to pay a condolence call.

The words "free love" were permanently displayed on its screen. "That's what he was like – a loving child, not ashamed to show his love, like many other boys his age," said Ruti.

"Every time Tom saw me, he would give me a kiss. Even if he came home and the house was full of customers" – Ruti runs a hairdressing business from her home – "he would come and give me a kiss."

Ruti also remembers the day Tom saw a television program that featured an impoverished old man dipping a crust of bread in his tea.

"He got very excited and said 'Mother, let's contribute!' He couldn't remain apathetic," she said.

Tom's devotion to "free love" was a legacy from his father, a Reiki healer.

"He was a special person," said Devora David of her brother. "Even at the most difficult moments of his life, he was always completely immersed in giving to others."

"The boy heard from [Moti] for years about his philosophy and became very attached to him through it," added Moti's brother-in-law, Eli. "There was a very special connection between them, an unusual connection for a father and son.

"They were like brothers, David and Jonathan. Moti didn't treat him like a child."

Twice a week, the two took a karate class together, and they had long conversations in which they shared every detail of their lives.

Moti's parents were Holocaust survivors from Romania who immigrated to Israel in the 1950s and opened a well-known coffee house, Pe'er, in Haifa's Hadar neighborhood.

In addition to his Reiki workshops, Moti helped his father run the family business. "Just as there was between Tom and Moti, there was an unusual connection between Moti and my father," said Devora.

"They were friends and admired one another, and each relied greatly on the other. With the passing of the years, elderly parents sometimes become more dependent on their children, but that didn't happen here. For each of them, the other remained a rock that he could lean on until the end."

Last Wednesday, like every Wednesday and Friday for the past eight years, Tom woke up in the house his father shares with his second wife, Ofra Arieli, and her daughter Shani. That morning, Moti had an interview in Karkur for a job he very much wanted, as director of an organization that runs workshops on avoiding violence.

Moti decided to take Tom along and spend the day with him afterward.

The interview turned into a two-and-a-half-hour discussion of life, the universe and everything in which Tom also participated, and Moti was informed on the spot that he had gotten the job.

That, said Ofra, was the surprise Tom was waiting so excitedly to tell his mother.

Despite the divorce, Ruti's sister Yaffa Sharon said, Ruti understood and encouraged Tom's love for his father.

That is why she insisted last week that they be buried side by side.

Argentina issues warrants in 1994 AMIA bombing

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The government of Argentina this week issued international arrest warrants and warrants of habeas corpus against four Iranians, including two former ministers, who are suspected of planning the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre in downtown Buenos Aires, in which 85 people, mostly Jews, were killed, and more than 100 were injured.

Since Argentina is a member of Interpol, its international warrants are automatically valid.

The warrants are against Ali Falahian, who was at the time of the terror attack a minister in the Iranian government in charge of Iranian intelligence services; Ali Akhbar Parvarash, who was education minister and headed a religious delegation to an Islamic convention in Buenos Aires; Muhsen Rabbani, who was the Iranian cultural attaché in Buenos Aires and a representative of Iranian intelligence; and Barat Ali Balesh Abadi, who was a courier working for Iranian intelligence, and had a diplomatic passport.

All but Falahian were in Buenos Aires either during the attack or shortly before it. The warrants were issued by federal judge Juan Jose Galiano, who has been investigating the affair for eight years. In the request to issue the warrants, Galiano said radical circles in the Iranian regime were connected to the attack. His report is based on an investigation that has been underway in the last few years, and on a secret document prepared by Argentina's intelligence service, which goes much further than Galiano's report.

The document compiled by the Argentinian intelligence service explicitly states that the most senior leaders in Iran, including spiritual leader Ali Khamenei and Hashemi Rafsanjani, who was president at the time, knew of the planned attack and did not oppose it. Galiano's report says Hezbollah was appointed to carry out the terror operation.

Argentine Jewish groups have for a long time complained of obstruction by public officials of investigations into the bombing.

They even produced a a 100-page document a few years ago citing unnamed "organisms of the state" and "public officials" of "diverting, obstructing and impeding" Judge Galiano's probe into the attack. The bombing on the AMIA – one of the bloodiest attacks against Jews in peacetime since World War II – came two years after the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires was bombed, killing 29 people,

Iraqi aid to terrorists' families continues

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Even continuing U.S. pressure on Iraq is not stopping Saddam Hussein from sending financial aid to the families of Palestinian suicide bombers in the West Bank and Gaza.

But it appears that the massive Iraqi support has started to arouse the concern of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, who fears outside assistance reduces his influence on what happens in the territories.

After a long hiatus, Arafat has renewed sending cheques to families of dead and injured terrorists, though he has not transferred monies to the families of suicide bombers.

Israeli security sources told Ha'aretz that at the end of January, representatives of the Arab Liberation Front, the Palestinian organization supported by Iraq, distributed financial aid to the families of 52 people killed in refugee camps in central Gaza.

The Iraqis, the sources said, adhered to a tariff set by Saddam at the beginning of the current intifada, with a suicide attack proving more profitable to a perpetrator's family than a "martyr" operation in which the terrorist is killed by Israel Defence Forces fire, but does not blow himself up.

The suicide bomber's family receives $25,000, while the family of a martyr gets $10,000.

Because of the difficulty in sending bombers into Israel, the number of families getting the bonuses is relatively small.

As on previous occasions, the ceremony in January at which the funds were distributed was attended by official representatives of the Palestinian Authority. They expressed no reservations about the praise heaped on suicide bombers by the Iraqi emissaries.

Defence sources report that Arafat recently did express qualms about the Iraqi support, as well as aid coming from other countries, such as Iran and Saudi Arabia, and Islamic charities.

"Arafat is not overly enthusiastic about the brazen outside involvement in Palestinian affairs," a defence source said. "It weakens his status. Now he has to try to regain some of the public support through renewing the process of transferring money."

Last month, Arafat started to redistribute aid to the families of injured Palestinians. Following the IDF operation in Zeitoun in Gaza about a month ago, the PA leader transferred payments worth $300,000 to families whose homes and property had been destroyed, as well as to families that had suffered injuries or fatalities.

The money was distributed at official ceremonies organized by the PA and sent to families by governors on behalf of the authority in Khan Yunis, Gaza and the refugee camps in the centre of the strip. The money was also paid to families of killed Hamas activists.

There has been a decline recently in the influence and scope of the contributions to the Holy Land Fund from the prominent Islamic charity organizations that transfer donations to the territories. It appears that the decline is connected to steps taken by the United States, which recently outlawed the fund.

March 3

• The Israeli press reported on a speech by British Prime Minister Tony Blair to the Community Security Trust, a Jewish security organization in Britain, that reaffirmed his country's support for Israel. He said Britain "is a strong and close friend of Israel, not a fair weather friend... Sometimes that means some plain talking...But the friendship is firm and will always remain so."

March 4

• A new poll, carried out last month, says Israelis oppose the creation of a Palestinian state by a 2-1 margin. It asked, "In light of the experience that has accumulated since the Oslo agreements, do you support or oppose a Palestinian state?" Sixty-one per cent were opposed, while 31 per cent expressed support.

March 5

• Iraq has not yet deployed missiles that would be capable of hitting Israel, Maj.Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, head of military intelligence, told a gathering of Knesset members. Iraq has such missiles, Ze'evi said, but they have not been installed in Iraq's western region, the only area from where the missiles could reach Israel.

March 6

• The foreign ministry reportedly completed a draft of an international convention against suicide bombers. Israel soon will begin distributing the draft to foreign governments in an effort to obtain enough signatures to make it a recognized international treaty.

March 7

• The Israel Defence Forces said it has arrested Abdallah Jamal Barghouti, considered the senior bomb maker in the West Bank. Barghouti is thought to be the head of several separate terror cells. Military sources said the arrest was the most important the IDF has made in the past 12 months.

New Palestinian Authority libel: Israel puts bombs in toys to kill children

By ITAMAR MARCUS

The Palestinian Authority (PA) generates lies and libels about Israel both in English, in order to blacken Israel's name internationally, (e.g. with the Jenin massacre story), and in Arabic, in order to promote hatred of Israel among their own population.

Palestinian Media Watch

The newest Arabic language libel in a report last week on PA TV is that Israel is making "bombs and mines designed as toys" and dropping them from planes onto populated areas where children play with them, and then Israel blows them up.

(Last year, in the same vein, Palestinian Media Watch reported the Palestinian libel that Israel was dropping poisoned candies from helicopters in front of schools in order to poison children.)

The new PA TV program also restated a number of old libels and lies, including that Israel is planning to destroy the Al Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, that the Jewish Temple was not on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem and that Israel has desecrated the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

The following is from the program Message to the World, broadcast on PA TV March 3:

"The Zionist criminals are planning to destroy the Al Aqsa mosque on the grounds that they are searching for the Holy Temple, which they falsely claim is under the mosque...

"Offences against our Islamic and Christian holy sites continue throughout Palestine. The Al Aqsa mosque is under threat, and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre has not been spared from desecration and destruction...

"They drop objects from jet planes that attract children to play with them and then they blow up. These are bombs and mines designed as toys."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Get creative with your mishloach manot

By RIVKA TAL

Mishloach manot, the sending of gift packages of food on Purim, is a wonderful way to cement relationships with extended family members, as well as neighbours. It's also a good way to show your appreciation for teachers and others who have helped you all year, too.

They can be as simple or as elaborate as you please.

It is customary to include (at least) two different types of food in the package, like wine and cake or candy. While Purim is generally a day of junk-food overload, it is often nice to send gifts of actual food that can be eaten at the festive Purim meal. A whole dressed fish, for instance, is customary in some communities. People in Israel tend to get really creative.

One memorable package included all the ingredients for a bagels-and-lox-brunch. A friend once sent us tomato soup and crackers. A simple gift can be put together with a few hamantaschen and some candy in a decorative bag and tied with ribbon.

With all the fancy ready-made mishloach manot available, the preparation of homemade Purim treats seems to be becoming the exception instead of the rule. That's unfortunate, as we say here in Israel, because it's fun and easy to make homemade candy treats that are usually appreciated.

Novice cooks often shy away from candy-making, and I don't blame them, for so many recipes require the use of a candy thermometer (nobody I know has one!) or for sweetened condensed milk, professional-type coating, chocolate or other unusual ingredients and/or equipment!

With mishloach manot, an eye-catching presentation adds so much to the gift itself. As advertising and marketing experts can attest, packaging is key. So wrap up candies carefully, noting the name of the sender.

These recipes are easy, delicious, and call for nothing out of the ordinary.

We won't discuss their calorie counts.

CANDY BARS

non-stick spray
3 cups corn flakes
½ cup chocolate chips
⅔ cup unsalted peanuts, shelled
½ cup peanut butter
¼ cup packed brown sugar
¼ cup white sugar
⅔ cup light corn syrup

Spray an 8-inch square disposable pan with non-stick spray. Crush corn flakes in food processor using steel knife. Leave in processor bowl; add chocolate chips and peanuts. Heat peanut butter, sugars and corn syrup in a heavy pan over low heat, stirring constantly. Remove from heat and let cool a few minutes. Process along with corn flakes, chocolate chips and peanuts. Press into prepared pan. Chill and cut into bars.

CINNAMON NUT MIX

1 cups whole almonds
2 cups pecan halves
1 cup white sugar
1 cup firmly packed brown sugar cup ground cinnamon
tsp. ground ginger
2 tsp. ground allspice
1 tsp. ground cloves
2 egg whites

Preheat oven to 300. Combine almonds and pecans with water in a large saucepan. Bring to a boil over medium heat. Reduce heat and simmer 1 minute. Remove from heat and drain well. Combine sugars, cinnamon, ginger, allspice and cloves in a large bowl. Whisk egg whites in a medium bowl until frothy. Add nuts and stir until nuts are well coated. Pour nuts into sugar mixture and stir until well coated. Spread evenly on a greased baking sheet. Baking 25 minutes, stirring occasionally. Cool on baking sheet. Store in airtight container.

PEANUT BRITTLE

1 cup shelled, roasted peanuts
2 cups sugar
few grains salt

Place 2 cups sugar in a heavy skillet. Melt over low heat, stirring constantly. Add 1 cup peanuts and a few grains of salt. Stir until nuts are coated. Spread in a well-greased 8 x 8 x 2-inch pan. Cool. Break into irregular pieces with the handle of a knife.

Purim meal served with good cheer

Purim is the most festive of Jewish holidays, a time of prizes, noisemakers, costumes and treats. The festival of Purim commemorates the miraculous salvation of the Jewish people from annihilation, and is recounted in the Megillah, the scroll of the story of Esther. Purim takes place on the 14th day of Adar throughout the world, except in Jerusalem, where we celebrate on the 15th. This year, Purim begins at sundown on Monday, March 17.

In keeping with the fact that the name of God is not mentioned in the Megillah, the custom has arisen to dress up in costume on Purim.

I know Purim is special wherever there are Jews. Growing up in Minnesota, we had Purim parties and heard the Megillah and twisted our graggers whenever the name of Haman was mentioned. There was a bit of "dressing up," but it wasn't a serious proposition. But nothing can compare to Purim in Israel.

Costumes here are serious business. The kids have dress-up parties at school, and sometimes even adults get into the act. The costumes involve much more than the basic outfit: they are always fully accessorized.

For a specific costume, a girl will, for instance, scour her entire neighbourhood for an appropriate fan. I remember one year we suddenly needed a bib for a baby costume. We knocked on our neighbour's door at 7 a.m. and were handed one, no questions asked. When my youngest daughter dressed as a policewoman, we made her a "photo ID." I always make a point of sitting at the entrance of my apartment building on Purim party day when school is getting out, just so I can enjoy the parade of costumes as the kids walk home.

The festive meal on Purim is unique. It takes place in an air of good cheer and camaraderie. The kids tend not to be too enthusiastic about whatever culinary delights are prepared, having stuffed themselves all day with whatever treats the family has received in the way of mishloach manot. Many of the men become seriously [illegible].

But for the rest of us here we eat a typical holiday meal. Kreplach are often served on Purim. Their "hidden" theme reminds us of the way God's name is hidden in the Megillah. Various edible seeds are used as a treat for when Queen Esther was in the king's palace, she ate seeds, we are told, so she wouldn't have a problem with kashrut, (That's why hamantaschen are often filled with poppy seeds).

NUT-DATE STUFFED CHICKEN BREASTS

4 whole large chicken breasts, skinned, boned, and halved lengthwise
3½ oz. pistachio nuts, shelled and roughly chopped
3½ oz. dates, cut into small pieces
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼-½ tsp. crushed red pepper
½ tsp. [illegible]
½ cup vegetable oil
½ cup semi-dry white wine

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease a shallow ovenproof baking dish. Place chicken pieces, boned side up, between two layers of clear plastic wrap. Working from centre out, pound chicken lightly with a mallet to make pieces about ¼-in. thick. Peel off wrap.

Combine nuts, dates and seasonings in a small bowl. Place 1 tablespoon of mixture in the centre of each prepared chicken piece. Tuck in sides and roll up as for a jelly roll, pressing to seal well. Transfer to baking dish. Repeat with remaining pieces.

Drizzle with vegetable oil and wine. Cover with aluminum foil. Bake for approximately 1 hour or until tender. Remove from oven. Either serve immediately or chill in refrigerator for at least two hours, then slice crosswise with a sharp knife for a pinwheel effect. Yield: 8-10 main dish servings.

Women urged to plan their own healthcare

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Most women spend more time planning their annual vacation than they do planning their future health care, says an obstetrician and gynecologist at Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital in Burlington.

"Women need to develop a road map. They need to sit back and think about what they can do to improve their health," said Lawrence Komer, at the recent Women for Women breakfast sponsored by Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

Komer, a leading expert on menopause, and an authority in the field of osteoporosis, said that the latter is an avoidable problem.

"Osteoporosis is silent; it does not begin with pain. People have osteoporosis when bone density drops by 25 per cent, but they usually do not know about it until they have a fracture."

Included in the recipe for avoiding osteoporosis, he said, are calcium, exercise and lifestyle change. "If you're not getting at least 1,500 mg a day of calcium, change your diet or take a supplement."

To absorb calcium, women also need at least 400 units of vitamin D, said Komer.

Most at risk for osteoporosis are women who are thin-framed and slender, who have had a long menopause, who have a family history of the disease, or who drink coffee or alcohol beyond moderation.

In the past two years, a drug has been developed that is intended to put calcium back into bones, and thus reverse bone aging, he said.

Lifestyle changes, such as keeping cholesterol down and quitting smoking are also needed in order to try and avoid heart disease, which kills nine times more women than breast cancer, said Komer.

Hormone Replacement Therapy was sensationalized in the media, said Komer, after a study by the Women's Health Initiative reported that the health risks of HRT outweighed the possible benefits.

"They did not address the quality of life of these women. There is a tiny risk of breast cancer, but women who drink and do not exercise, quadruple their risk. HRT definitely increases a woman's quality of life. We have to put things into perspective. What is the real risk?"

A menopausal woman has not had periods for one year, he said. "If women are still getting periods, they should not take hormones."

Symptoms of menopause include hot flashes, night sweats, depression, feelings of inadequacy, lack of energy, insomnia, a decrease in concentration, anxiety, a decrease in memory, and aching joints.

"Menopause, however, is not just about symptoms. Medical problems are associated with low hormone levels, and women want to take the opportunity of staying healthy for the rest of their lives."

Komer said that the science of aging is changing rapidly, and he switched the emphasis in his practice to menopause because his patients were aging with him.

"There are a lot of things we can do not to age quickly. We've come a long way with vaccinations and anti-biotics; the potential is for people to live 125 to 150 years."

Among the cornerstones of anti-aging, he said, are a low glycemic diet, hormonal manipulation, and an optimization of other blood parameters such as cholesterol.

"A high glycemic diet is a person's enemy, because if blood sugar goes up, insulin goes up, and then blood sugar drops. With low glycemic food, sugar goes up slowly, and insulin goes up slowly. You don't get the peaks and valleys."

Included in the supplements he suggests: is a low dose of children's aspirin which decreases blood clotting; a calcium supplement; a good multi-vitamin; omega-3 fatty oil, which decreases heart disease; grape seed extract, which provides anti-oxidants; and soy, which could decrease breast cancer in women and prostate cancer in men.

Baycrest heading in new direction, says president

Through the individual and co-operative efforts of several organizations, particularly the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Circle of Care and the Bernard Betel Centre, the Jewish community of Toronto has extensive and generally affordable services for the elderly.

The CJN takes a look at these three agencies.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Probably the best-known provider of care for the elderly in Toronto is Baycrest centre for Geriatric Care. Its array of services include the Apotex Centre-Jewish Home for the Aged, the Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition, the Baycrest Hospital Complex Continuing Care Program, the Baycrest Terrace retirement home, the Elm Ridge Group Living Residence and Two Neptune Drive, an apartment building.

Baycrest offers assessments, dental care, pastoral care, day care programs, rehabilitation, counselling, mental health services, caregiver support and relief, palliative care and social work services.

Its clinics deal with neurology, hearing, cardiology, dermatology, osteoporosis, incontinence, skin integrity, urology and other fields. Home-care services and meals on wheels are available through the centre.

Stephen Herbert, Baycrest president and CEO, told The CJN that the facility is heading in a new direction.

"The most pressing need is for leadership in the field of mental health," he said. Four out of 10 elderly have some form of dementia, and that number is increasing, he said. Depression is also a major problem.

Baycrest has developed strengths in this area, he added, especially dealing with such problems as Alzheimer's disease, stroke and depression.

As well, he said, as the aging population increases, there is a need to identify new techniques of prevention and treatment, with the ultimate goal of creating a better quality of life for the elderly.

"Our vision is to transform how people age, and enhance the quality of life to a new level, through research and education."

This doesn't cancel out Baycrest's current focus, he added: to care for the frail elderly and those needing special services.

Baycrest recognizes that "the Jewish community built Baycrest, and we will be true to that heritage.

"We are committed to improve the health of tomorrow's elderly, while caring for today's," he said.

The centre plans to build on its strengths, he said. "We are recruiting clinician scientists, especially in the fields of stroke recovery, Alzheimer's disease and mood disorders."

The goal is to "integrate care, research and education," so as to "improve the quality of care [that we give to our own elderly], and to share that information with organizations around the globe."

Baycrest is another organization that relies heavily on volunteers for many of its programs, including in-house services and meals on wheels.

For more information, call Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, 416-785-2500.

Camp prisoner made pact with the devil

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Kurt Gerron was a famous Jewish actor, movie director and cabaret performer in Weimar Germany. He sang Mack the Knife in the original production of the Threepenny Opera and co-starred with Marlene Dietrich in The Blue Angel.

A decorated World War I hero, he was at the top of his game when Adolf Hitler assumed power in 1933.

Hounded out of the country, Gerron moved to Paris, then to Amsterdam. But he was never really able to resurrect the brilliance of his old career.

In 1942, he was deported to Westerbork, a way station to Auschwitz for Dutch Jews. Since he was a celebrity, Gerron was dispatched to Theresienstadt, a show camp for prominent Jews.

There, on the orders of the Nazi regime, he directed a notorious propaganda film, The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, which completely whitewashed the wretched condition of Jews in Theresienstadt.

The depths to which Gerron had sunk, both as a human being and an artist, were pathetic.

And the fate that awaited him after directing this incredibly cynical documentary was nothing less than tragic.

The trajectory of Gerron's life and fate is the subject of Prisoner of Paradise, a stunningly riveting film by Malcolm Clarke and Stuart Sender now playing at the Empress Walk theatre.

Gerron, a physically large man with an enormous appetite for living, got his first break as an actor in 1921 in Berlin. Although he succeeded in theatre beyond his wildest dreams, Gerron's real metier was in film.

As an actor, he usually portrayed rogues and rascals, which is ironic since he was a warm, cuddly man. Behind the camera, he directed a dizzying succession of films, starring some of the greatest talents of the day.

Gerron's success enabled him and his family to enjoy a lavish lifestyle, as nostalgic file footage indicates.

As Germany lurched toward Nazi domination, Gerron closed his eyes to reality. Like some German Jews, he could not internalize the looming threat Hitler posed to the Jewish community.

Blackballed by the Nazis, Gerron fled to Paris, where he failed to make a mark, and then to Amsterdam. He was quite popular in Holland, playing to packed houses in theatres and cabarets.

Kurt Gerron

His friend, Hollywood actor Peter Lorre, tried to lure Gerron to Los Angeles, but Gerron was so busy that he let the offer lapse.

It was an egregious mistake.

He compounded it by making no real effort to reach the safety of Britain.

After the Nazis stormed into Holland, Gerron was rounded up and sent to Westerbork. There he staged cabaret shows.

In the winter of 1944, Gerron found himself in Theresienstadt, a camp near Prague filled with Jews who had distinguished themselves in various professions before the rise of the Nazis.

Relatively benign though it may have been compared to Treblinka, Theresienstadt was nevertheless a hellish place, rife with disease, hunger and congestion.

Familiar with his reputation, the camp commandant put Gerron to work as a director in cabaret productions.

In June 1944, a gullible Swiss Red Cross official visited Theresienstadt, which had been prettified for his benefit. The Nazis had invited him in the hope of convincing the West that they were not engaging in atrocities.

They achieved their objective. The visitor reported that Jews in Theresienstadt were well treated, which was a damnable lie.

Emboldened by the masquerade, Germany decided to make a film with a similar theme. Gerron was selected to direct it. Now all but a broken man, he accepted the offer, thinking it would be his ticket to survival.

The shoot was hard on him, but in The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, he transformed the misery that was Theresienstadt into a heaven on earth. After the film wrapped, 17,000 Jews were summarily shipped to Auschwitz.

Out of sheer necessity, Gerron had made a pact with the devil, but to no avail. He, too, was "resettled."

Prisoner of Paradise, which is up for an Academy Award for best feature documentary, tells this harrowing story with grace and dignity.

DAVIDSON CENTER OFFERS UNIQUE VIEWS OF OLD JERUSALEM

A fully interactive, virtual reconstruction of the Second Temple and adjacent sections of Old Jerusalem are on view in the Davidson Center, a museum that opened with little fanfare in Jerusalem almost two years ago.

These big-screen images of the holy city of 2,000 years ago are generated by the amazingly powerful Silicon Graphics Onyx 2 supercomputer, a close cousin of the machine that produced the cinematic wizardry in the Academy award-winning film Gladiator.

If you were impressed by the highly realistic street scenes of ancient Rome in Gladiator, chances are you'll be dazzled by the visuals here.

A guide sits beside the screen in the 35-seat theatre and uses a keyboard and mouse to navigate through the streets and monumental architecture of ancient Jerusalem as he provides a detailed description. The demonstration lasts about 40 minutes.

The project is the result of an extensive collaboration between the Israeli Antiquities Authority and the Urban Simulation Team at the University of California in Los Angeles. Every detail has been authenticated by a wealth of biblical, talmudic, archeological and other sources. Many visual textures were photographed around the Old City and interpolated into the virtual reconstruction.

"We believe that this is the most exciting way to explain to non-archeologists – and even to archeologists – what an archeological site looked like," said Jacob Fisch, an IAA spokesperson.

The demonstration begins with an elevated approach to the ancient city from the lofty vantage point of an eagle, with the buildings of its oldest quarter, the City of David, shifting in perspective below.

Soon we descend for a pedestrian-level look at the Temple and vicinity as they appeared in the time of King Herod. The streets are populated by merchants, rabbis, Roman soldiers and other Biblical era figures whose images were borrowed from old film stills supplied by Universal Studios.

Visitors who attain a first dramatic glimpse of the Temple may appreciate why it is sometimes considered one of the wonders of the ancient world. According to a Talmudic saying, "He who has not seen the Temple of Herod has never seen a beautiful building."

Robinson's Arch and the monumental staircase connecting the Herodian Street to the top of the Temple platform.

Key features of the virtual reconstruction include the street that formerly ran beside the Western Wall and the large bridging causeway that once led up to the Temple from the western side, joining the wall at the feature now known as Robinson's Arch. In olden times, Jerusalemites purchased food and drink and sacrificial animals in the market stalls beneath the bridge.

To the north, we glimpse the Antonia fortress where the Roman 10th Legion was garrisoned. To the south are the monumental steps by which worshippers entered the Temple after purifying themselves in nearby ritual baths.

The steps are spaced so as to require a slow and reverent climb. Ascending them, we pass through the Hulda Gates and the huge manmade platform known as the Temple Mount. Soon we are standing in the Royal Stoa, a colossal Roman-style public building that resembles an enormous pillared arcade.

The Holy of Holies, the Temple's most sacred precinct, was considered the main earthly point of contact between man and God. In Biblical times, only the Jewish high priest entered this mystical chamber and only on Yom Kippur, the holiest day of the year.

Built near the southwestern corner of the Temple Mount, within the remains of a 7th-century Umayyid palace, the Center displays a range of artifacts from the Second Temple era. Items include keys, inkwells, candles, ceramic jars and stone vessels. A coin stamped during the Bar Kochba period (about 135 CE) bears the image of an ark within four pillars – the first known artistic depiction of the Temple.

The Center also features artifacts from the late Roman period (70 - 324 CE), the Byzantine period (324 - 628 CE) and the early Islamic period (638 - 1099 CE).

Almost 1,000 years after King Solomon built the First Temple, Rome's 10th Legion destroyed the Second Temple in 70 CE. Another 600 years would pass before early Islamicists constructed the Dome of the Rock, the famous golden-topped structure which is the most prominent building on the Temple Mount today.

The Center lies within the Jerusalem Archeological Park, a vast swath of terrain surrounding the southern Temple Mount, encompassing some 5,000 years of archeological history. Admission is by advance reservation only. Phone 02-6277550, fax 02-6277962.

Klezmer band Beyond the Pale is beyond ordinary

By LEORA BERESKIN
Special to The CJN

Beyond The Pale perform klezmer in a unique style, combining many musical genres.

The klezmer band Beyond the Pale performed at the Artword Theatre last month, and I loved them so much that I went to see them again at the Free Times Cafe two weeks later.

It was my chance to rediscover klezmer – a style of music that's innovative and funky, combining such diverse musical genres as reggae, rock, funk, ethnic folk and Yiddish.

Members of Beyond the Pale, which was formed five years ago, are Eric Stein on mandolin and cimbalom, Martin van de Ven on clarinet, Bogdan Djukic on violin, Milos Popovic on accordion and Bret Higgins on the bass.

In both concerts, the band members showcased their massive talent and obvious love for music. And Beyond the Pale has a great stage presence. They make jokes with each other, interact with the audience and even dance a little on stage. Their songs, both original compositions and traditional tunes creatively arranged, are wonderful.

One of the things I most enjoyed about Beyond the Pale was their ability to combine different musical genres to make a unique sound. I never would have thought that reggae could be played on accordion and violin.

I was a little surprised that not only were there many non-Jews in the audience, but four out of five of the band members are not Jewish.

Stein, the band leader, explained: "I think that really speaks for the quality and sophistication of the music. Klezmer has always been multicultural. It's always been heavily influenced by other traditions."

Klezmer band revitalizes music and makes it relevant

It was interesting to see Beyond the Pale in such different venues. The Artword Theatre show was more formal, a concert with nothing else in the room to detract from the music, while the casual ambience at the Free Times Cafe allowed for a more relaxed performance.

I enjoyed the Artword performance because the band played some experimental music. We got to listen to their characteristic upbeat songs, but we also heard several of their more inventive creations.

Josh Dolgin was the guest vocalist, and in addition to singing – and rapping! – marvelous songs in Yiddish and English, he also performed a magic trick on stage, which the audience clearly loved. It was a great evening, and I didn't think anything could match it, until I went to the next concert.

The Free Times Cafe combined two of my favourite things: music and food. The music was again excellent. The group got off to a roaring start, instantly grabbing the audience's attention and never letting go until the end of the show, a little over an hour later. Because this was a casual venue, the band interacted a little more with the audience.

I had the pleasure of sitting near Mel Korn, who recently produced a Jewish music series (check out its information at http://members.rogers.com/aliveand well/). He kept yelling "faster, faster!" and the band complied, to my amazement, because I didn't think it was possible to play any faster.

Some women got up and started to dance in the small areas between tables, blocking the paths of the waiters, but having a ton of fun.

At Beyond the Pale concerts, people of every age and culture can join together to appreciate new versions of music that our Jewish ancestors played hundreds of years ago. The band revitalizes that music and makes it fun and just as relevant as it was in the past.

For more information about Beyond the Pale and their upcoming concerts, go to www.beyondthepale.net.

Sherman's League of Nathans asks 'What makes a good Jew?'

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When a play prompts questions and debate, it's worth the price of admission and the trip downtown.

The League of Nathans, written and directed by Toronto playwright Jason Sherman, confronts deep issues with broad comedic brushstrokes. Running until Mar. 23 at the Factory Theatre, the play asks a question often posed by doubtful Jews: Am I a good Jew?

In this rewritten revival of Sherman's 1992 debut work, three boyhood friends wrestle with issues of Jewish identity and friendship. Depicted at age 12, each character is distinct: Nathan Abramowitz (Michael Schultz) is an introspective boy who listens to his zaide's Bible stories with rapt interest; Nathan Glass (Rami Posner) is a stringent Zionist, adamant that action, not words, ensures peace in Israel; and Nathan Isaacs (Ben Carlson) is the goofy jokester who ignores his friends' reflections.

They form a club called League of Nathans, complete with tallitot, Manischewitz wine and ancient blessings. Lying on a field with flashlights, the boys discuss weighty matters such as Kabbalah and Israel-Egypt relations, each developing a perspective on righteousness.

The play cuts from present-day adulthood to childhood snapshots. The time shifts flow seamlessly, even when the lighting has to flash off abruptly to signal a return to the present.

Now 33 years old, protagonist Abramowitz gets a call from Isaacs, who summons him to a synagogue in Spain to reunite with Glass (who has been away for 13 years) for the final meeting of the League of Nathans.

The room darkens momentarily, the lights flash on, and Abramowitz is a boy, talking to a distraught Glass, who decides to leave the country after a horrific event.

The childhood scenes are often the most entertaining, while still provoking thoughtful reflection. Studying for his bar mitzvah, the young Abramowitz mutters a line to his zaide that many parents have heard: "C'mon, do I hafta have a bar mitzvah?" The wisdom imparted by the grandfather, played adequately by Ken James, reminds apathetic youth of the ritual's deeper significance.

Sherman depicts three Jewish archetypes: Abramowitz is a Jew adrift in indifference, despite his spiritual connection to the Bible; Isaacs believes he's fulfilled his role by sending his kids to Hebrew school and attending synagogue, although his passion lacks sincerity; and Glass battles his enemies in a hawkish life, settling in the West Bank with an Uzi gun and steely determination.

Yet Sherman courts controversy by painting portraits that border on the cliché — the middle-of-the-road shul-goer as ignorant boor, or the vengeful settler as anti-Arab soldier — although the characters are fascinating to watch.

The actors show their personal struggles by moving from anxiety to anger without making the emotional turns look forced. Posner, as Glass, is particularly powerful with his glowing eyes and vein-popping neck as he voices his pro-Israel beliefs. Schultz, as Abramowitz, plays a troubled soul with the perfect amount of quiet tension, while Carlson gives Isaacs a vulgarity that's accompanied by a longing for the good old days.

Whether in the childhood scenes of Act 1 or the present-day Spanish setting of Act 2, the comedy will resonate best with Jewish audience members. Sherman throws many cultural references into the mix, from sneaking Manischewitz into a liquor flask to lines such as "Shofar so good" and "Jews always answer two questions with three questions."

With Middle East tensions still stalling peace, The League of Nathans remains a potent theatre experience. The play shapes itself into a question, avoiding a comfortable ending that would tie together all its loose ends. When the final light goes out, the answer to the question of how to live a righteous Jewish life remains unanswered.

Editor exposed Swiss dealings with Nazi Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hans Werner Hirsch, the crusading editor of Die Nation, a muckraking Swiss weekly newspaper that exposed unpleasant truths about Switzerland's cozy relationship with Nazi Germany and its attitude toward Jews, is the subject of the He Called Himself Surava.

This hard-hitting 90-minute film, directed by Erich Schmidt and released in 1995, will be screened on March 18 at 8:15 p.m. at the Goethe Institut,163 King Street W.

It's a chilling, thought-provoking documentary about political expediency, anti-Semitism, censorship and freedom of the press.

Hirsch, born in Zurich in 1912, was appointed editor of the Bern-based, left-of-centre Die Nation in 1940.

Upon his appointment, the editorial board asked him to change his surname. Hirsch sounded too Jewish. Hirsch, who is actually not Jewish, renamed himself Surava, after a picturesque Swiss village.

Little did he know that his real troubles were about to begin.

Surava antagonized the authorities by printing a story alleging that the Red Cross had excluded foreign Jewish children from a Swiss holiday camp program. The government, having imposed tight censorship, ordered him not to revisit the topic.

Behind his back, Red Cross officials branded him a Jew, the worst possible insult insofar as they were concerned. He learned about this after the war by delving into government files.

Surava angered the powers-that-be yet again by publishing a photograph of Nazi atrocities in Poland. Switzerland dismissed the photo as "Polish propaganda."

Being neutral, and fearing a German invasion, Switzerland had no wish to jeopardize its cordial ties with Germany.

To add insult to indignity, the government next forbade Die Nation to print stories about the unfolding Holocaust. Why? Switzerland did not want to create an "anti-German atmosphere" within its borders.

Surava ran afoul of the government again after he published a questionnaire asking readers whether they thought refugees should be allowed into Switzerland.

Surava, who was on the Gestapo's blacklist, never lost the confidence of his readership. Under his stewardship, circulation rose steeply, from 8,000 to 120,000.

Surava also alienated the government by running a damaging expose of the president of the Red Cross and by printing an article about child labour abuses in Switzerland.

All the while, Surava was denigrated as a crypto-Jew and an irresponsible editor in a government-inspired campaign of defamation.

After the war, Surava was fired from Die Nation on the flimsiest of pretexts. Then, incredibly enough, Die Nation sued him on spurious grounds.

Thrown out on the street and facing impoverishment, Surava turned to freelance journalism. But he could only earn a living by using pseudonyms.

As if had not suffered enough, the village of Surava pressured him to stop using its name.

The succession of indignities Surava was subjected to beggar the imagination. Schmidt's film should not be missed by anyone who cares about freedom, tolerance and democracy.

Girl goalie wins Leafs' skills competition

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Calleigh Plener's commitment to anything she puts her mind to reminds her father of golfer Tiger Woods, because she's got the same kind of focus when she plays hockey.

The 10-year-old goalie put that determination on display in front of more than 17,000 hockey fans at the Air Canada Centre last month in winning the Bell Skills Competition for atoms (nine- and 10-year-olds). The province-wide event sponsored by the Toronto Maple Leafs attracted 1,700 players when it began five months ago and Plener was one of the eight remaining finalists who got to take part in the skills competition.

She was named top 10-year-old goalie.

"It felt amazing," said the Grade 5 student at Yorkview Public School in North York. "I was really excited."

Plener was ecstatic after getting to meet the Leafs in their dressing room and receiving sticks from both Leafs' goalies, Ed Belfour and Trevor Kidd. But she wasn't nervous in the competition, unlike her parents cheering her on from the stands.

Plener's success is an astounding feat considering she only took up the game two years ago and has only played in goal for the past year. Her brother Ellis got her involved when he needed someone to practise on.

"Calleigh, being as daring as she is, put on the goalie pads, and her brother would take shots on her and get her out to play with his friends," said Calleigh's father, Barrie.

"What sets her apart from most people is that her passion for the game is just unbelievable. I'm not surprised she does well; her work ethic is impeccable."

Plener is often on the ice five days a week, practising and playing for two different teams. She suits up for the Willowdale Red Wings, an atom AA all-girls club, and also plays for the Goulding Park Rangers, a minor peewee boys select team, who are a year older than she is.

Away from the rink, Plener is studying for her bat mitzvah, while Ellis, a former Goulding Park Ranger, took the year off hockey to prepare for a bar mitzvah.

No single card has a greater impact on the outcome of a contract than the opening lead, but it is a sad fact of life that learning to make good opening leads is one of the most serious challenges that the aspiring bridge player faces. Entire books have been written on this subject, but making successful opening leads remains more of an art than a science. In today's deal, my partner was truly an artist.

This deal comes from a recent tournament in Monterrey, California. I had the pleasure of playing with Billy Miller, one of America's strongest players and the author of the popular "Dear Billy" column that appears monthly in the official magazine of the American Contract Bridge League (ACBL).

Even casual bridge players are familiar with the maxim "4th from your longest and strongest" that is used as a guideline for selecting an opening lead. That maxim would suggest the opening lead of the ♦6 from Billy's hand. More experienced players are familiar with another guideline, "Never underlead an Ace against a trump contract." That guideline would suggest a club lead rather than a diamond lead in this situation.

Of course, Billy, being a world-class player, is familiar with all of these guidelines, but he also knows that the words "never" and "always" do not apply very well to the game of bridge. He listened carefully to the bidding and what he heard was that North's strong sequence suggested interest in playing in slam. Given that the opponents had stopped in game, Billy knew that desperate measures were called for if there was to be any chance to defeat their contract.

He therefore chose to underlead his ♦A, even though there is a maxim that suggests that this is something one should "never" do. The declarer very reasonably played low from the dummy. I played the ♦Q which won the trick and returned a diamond to Billy's ♦A (as the declarer gave my partner a dirty look).

North ♠ Q973 ♥ AKQJ10 ♦ K8 ♣ 53		East (Fred) ♠ 2 ♥ 98763 ♦ Q432 ♣ K96
West (Billy) ♠ K6 ♥ 52 ♦ A10765 ♣ Q872		South ♠ AJ10854 ♥ 4 ♦ J9 ♣ AJ104

The bidding:

South	North

Billy now found the necessary club switch and my ♣K forced the declarer's ♣A. Try as he might, there was no longer any way for the declarer to make his contract and Billy eventually scored tricks with his ♣Q and ♠K. It turned out that our defense (not that I deserve much credit for it) was the only sequence of plays that would defeat 4♠.

Fred Gitelman is one of Canada's most successful tournament bridge players. His Las Vegas-based company, Bridge Base Inc., is a world leader in the development of educational software for bridge. You can find out more about Fred and his company through www.bridgebase.com. Jewish accountability and lashon hara

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I once read a thesis that stated Jews have generally refrained from scholarly critical analysis, evaluation and selection of authentic source materials in the development of Jewish history in order not to spread lashon hara – bad talk/gossip – about the figures who played a role in our past.

In essence, this theory holds that the Jewish people have rarely pursued historiography in a Jewish context so as not to tarnish the reputation of other Jews. It is an impressive thought and speaks volumes about the Jewish consciousness and acute belief in protecting the reputations and feelings of others.

Recently, I considered that maybe lashon hara might also be the reason why the Toronto Jewish community is reluctant to discuss our controversies in a more open and meaningful manner and to hold ourselves, our leaders, organizations and community members more accountable for their actions.

Perhaps the Jewish imperative of refraining from speaking lashon hara might be the rationale used by this publication and other Jewish newspapers for rarely expressing critical comments about local Jewish schools, rabbis, organizations – even when controversies are raging and our community might benefit from a healthy (yet sensitive) public exchange of ideas.

As an example, I am familiar with cases of sexual impropriety in our community in the past between young students and adults that were not dealt with appropriately. When such indecencies occur in other communities, most Jews likely feel that they should be dealt with openly and diligently to bring those responsible to justice. Yet the same openness has never been demanded within our own community. The consequences must have been dismal for those who were affected.

In essence, we did not speak lashon hara against the perpetrators, and ultimately we saved their reputations.

The question remains, however: how can the Toronto Jewish community refrain from speaking lashon hara and at the same time grapple with our challenges in a more healing, brave and open manner, thereby saving the abused from mental anguish? (Gauge your personal response to the preceding example. If it offended you, you'll relate moreso to my point.)

The Jewish community in Toronto is changing. Its mindset is moving toward an alternative approach to prayer, education and management. This generational change likely has to do with time and distance from the Holocaust, as well as a diminished fear of expressing ourselves openly, regardless of "what the goyim will say."

Although the post-Holocaust Jewish leadership's approach was often reasonable in light of their experiences, I believe subsequent leadership philosophies will include an understanding that the laws of lashon hara also state that one must speak loudly within the community when travesties are being committed.

I think this possibility exists because of the impact of our host society, which demands greater access to information, personal and collective introspection, and more accountability of its leadership.

As we move down this evolutionary path, the Toronto Jewish community will no doubt review our past more openly and with greater intensity, as well as stare more closely at our present and stand taller and healthier as we look at our future. We will likely find ourselves in an environment more conducive to pursuing and maintaining a balance between protecting our community members from lashon hara and the threats from the outside world, while pursuing justice from within.

Lashon hara is a very serious thing. Judaism says it can kill. We should therefore be vigilant about the damage that openness can create, but at the same time we must weigh that against the colossal importance of upholding justice and protecting our community members, especially those who are the weakest among us.

What do you mean it's impossible?

If you believe you can spoil, believe you can fix. – Rav Nachman of Breslav.

PURIM LEMON-POPPYSEED CAKE

6 tblsps. unsalted butter
1/4 cup white sugar
4 egg yolks
1 1/4 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/8 tsp. salt
1/4 cup poppy seeds
1/3 cup milk
2 tsp. grated lemon peel
2 tblsps. lemon juice
1/2 tsp. vanilla
1/2 tsp. lemon extract
confectioners/ sugar

Cream butter in mixing bowl. Gradually beat in sugar until light & fluffy. Beat egg yolks in separate bowl until light and lemon coloured; blend yolks thoroughly into butter mixture.

Sift together flour, baking powder & salt. Add poppy seeds. Add flour mixture to butter mixture alternately with milk, blending well. Beat in lemon peel, lemon juice, vanilla and lemon extract.

Pour batter into well-greased, lightly floured loaf pan. Bake at 350°F, 40 min. or until loaf pulls away from sides. Cool on rack. Dust with confectioners' sugar.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Last week my friend and I decided to venture out of suburbia, so we went shopping in downtown Toronto.

As we were walking along Queen Street, we saw two young teens panhandling and looking very cold. I instinctively took out some money and dropped it into the hat in front of them. My friend murmured something derogatory and a debate ensued about whether I should have given them money. He said they would just buy drugs and I was enabling them to do so. I thought they would buy food or shelter, but my friend said I was being very naive, that they steal their food and have access to free accommodations. He left me feeling very uncomfortable. What's your take on this situation?

Possible Enabler

Dear Possible Enabler

I'm sure the experts have debated this subject in great depth and I'm not sure there is a clear answer. Personally, I have always been one who does first and thinks later.

I remember being in the car with my husband once when he pulled over and, without a word to me, jumped out of the car, ran across the street into a fast-food restaurant and came out with a big bag of food and a large drink. He walked past the car and over to a teen and his dog who were crouched in the nook of a building and handed him the bag and drink. They exchanged smiles and that was the end of the incident.

All I can say is that what he did left me feeling very warm that day. I would never have thought of doing that.

Your friend may or may not be right about giving them drug money, or enabling them to live on the street rather than seeking help, but it is difficult to watch a fellow human being hungry or freezing regardless of their age.

It is a sad fact that we live in a society with homeless people, and you have to do what's in your heart. If handing out money bothers you, there are other ways to help. Try working with any of the organizations that help the homeless. You'll be glad you did.

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

What you need to know about West Nile Virus

West Nile virus is spread by the bite of infected mosquitoes that have feasted on the blood of infected birds and can infect people, horses, and some other animals. Symptoms usually appear 10 to 14 days after someone has been bitten by a mosquito that has the virus. Most people who become infected with West Nile virus will have either no symptoms or only mild ones. However, West Nile virus infection can sometimes result in severe and fatal illnesses. Although most people fight off the virus, about one in 150 suffer serious illness, primarily meningitis (swelling of the lining of the brain) or encephalitis (swelling of the brain).

Q. If I live in an area where birds or mosquitoes with West Nile virus have been reported and a mosquito bites me, am I likely to get sick?

A. No. Even in areas where the virus is circulating, very few mosquitoes are infected with the virus. Even if the mosquito is infected, less than one per cent of people who get bitten and become infected will get severely ill. The chances you will become severely ill from any one mosquito bite are small.

Q. Who is at risk of being infected?

A. In general, wild birds are the largest population infected with the West Nile virus. Birds do not normally show signs of infection–they merely act as a host for the virus; however, humans can also become infected with the virus. People living in an area where there are virus carrying mosquitoes are at risk of getting bitten. However, not everyone who is bitten by an infected mosquito will develop West Nile–most cases are very mild with flu-like symptoms or no symptoms at all.

At risk are:

- the very young
- individuals >50 years of age
- individuals with weakened immune systems
- individuals with other medical conditions including diabetes, heart disease or individuals on dialysis

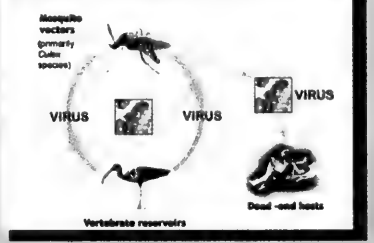
West Nile Virus Transmission Cycle



Q. What can I do to reduce my risk of becoming infected with West Nile virus?

A. Here are some preventive measures that you and your family can take to protect yourself from mosquito bites:

* Apply insect repellent to exposed skin. The more DEET a repellent contains the longer it can protect you from mosquito bites. Choose a repellent that provides protection for the amount of time that you will be outdoors.
* Spray clothing with repellents since mosquitoes may bite through thin clothing.
* When possible, wear long-sleeved shirts and long pants whenever you are outdoors.
* Place mosquito netting over infant carriers when you are outdoors with infants.
* Consider staying indoors at dawn, dusk, and in the early evening, which are peak mosquito biting times.
* Install or repair window and door screens so that mosquitoes cannot get indoors.
* Help reduce the number of mosquitoes in areas outdoors where you work or play by draining sources of standing water.
* At least once or twice a week, empty water from flower pots, pet food and water dishes, birdbaths, swimming pool covers, buckets, barrels, and cans.
* Check for clogged rain gutters and clean them out.

Patriots in north Tel Aviv

The U.S. army last week deployed a battery of Patriot missiles north of Tel Aviv. This latest deployment around the greater Tel Aviv area completed the ring of Patriot and Israeli Arrow missiles set in place to destroy any incoming Scuds or unmanned aircraft that might be launched from Iraq or any other hostile countries. [Israeli photo]

Anti-Israel mood spurs new UIA action

'We had to become more proactive'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The emergency cabinet of UIA Federations Canada, a project that began quietly last spring, has allocated a total of $1.5 million to two programs, one called Jewish Campus Life and the other designated for Israel missions.

UIA is a national fundraising body formed in 1998 as a result of a merger between United Israel Appeal of Canada and the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada. The cabinet was formed by a group of lay leaders who felt UIA needed to make a greater investment in advocacy-related activities, said Maxyne Finkelstein, the organization's executive director.

"We had to see what we could do to become more pro-active," Finkelstein said.

After the current wave of violence began in Israel in September 2000, people became aware of a rise in anti-Israel rhetoric and its impact on the Jewish community, she added.

The cabinet, a three-year initiative, is chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum of Toronto and Stephen Cummings of Montreal. Other members include Sylvain Abitbol, Yoine Goldstein, Senator Leo Kolber and Stephen Reitman of Montreal; Israel Asper of Winnipeg; Brent Belzberg, Dennis Bennie, Leslie Gales, Julia Koschitzky and Heather Reisman of Toronto; and Ron Stern of Vancouver.

Israeli star has Canadian roots

JERUSALEM — Tali Rubin is no ordinary 21-year old. In a few short years since leaving school, she has, in more ways than one, taken flight.

Rubin, whose parents are from Toronto, was chosen from several hundred other aspiring young actresses for the female lead in Wings, one of the most popular Israeli television series of recent years. The show tells the story of the first Israeli woman fighter pilot from the time she enters the air force flying school until she receives her wings two years later.

Even with this success, Rubin still has her feet firmly on the ground and continues to study her craft, perhaps because she knows she has more to learn.

The News in Brief

Canada

Mel to Visit Israel

TORONTO — Outgoing Toronto mayor Mel Lastman has announced he will lead a delegation of Canadian politicians and business leaders to Israel from May 10 to 16 to study municipal government in the region. He will be joined by, among others, Tory MPP Tina Molinari and Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. The delegation will meet Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and be briefed on the military situation.

Israel

A Passage to India

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Medical Cadet (IMC) organization will take a group of 16 Israeli teens to India to teach basic medical treatments to their peers. They will teach the basics of first aid, how to maintain personal hygiene and the importance of health awareness. The IMC organized the trip in co-operation with Magen David Adom, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Israel's Department of Education and local Indian authorities.

Arafat Sued Again

JERUSALEM — The families of seven of the 11 people killed in a suicide bombing at Jerusalem's Moment Café last year filed a $27 million (US) lawsuit last week against Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority. It claims the terrorists who carried out the attack were following the PA president's orders, and that since then, they suffer from trauma and nightmares. Last week, Israel arrested a Palestinian suspected of involvement in the terror cell that carried out the attack.

Arab Deputy Mayor

TEL AVIV — A former soccer star became the first Israeli Arab to be appointed a deputy mayor of Tel Aviv-Jaffa. Mayor Ron Huldai called the appointment of Jaffa-born Rifat "Jimmy" Turk "historic." Turk, a former player on Hapoel Tel Aviv, was elected to city council on the left-wing Meretz list. In 1976, Turk was the first Israeli Arab to represent Israel in the Olympics, as a soccer player at the Montreal games.

Haifa Chip Debuts

JERUSALEM — Intel Corp. has kicked off its $300 million (US) ad campaign for its new Centrino chip for notebook computers, which was designed at the Intel Israel design centre in Haifa. The campaign will be even larger than the company's effort for its flagship Pentium chip for desktop computers. It targets 11 countries, including the United States, Britain, France, Germany, South Korea and Australia.

World

Djerba Suspect Nabbed

PARIS — French anti-terror police arrested a man last week in connection with an explosion last April on a synagogue on the Tunisian island of Djerba. The man, who has yet to be identified, is suspected of providing documents and other items to Nizar Ben Mohammed Nawar, who is suspected of carrying out the attack. Three men, including Nawar's brother, have already been charged by French police in connection with the attack. Nineteen people were killed last year after a gas truck rammed a wall protecting the Ghriba Synagogue.

Transsexual Admitted

CINCINNATI — The Reform movement's main seminary has accepted a transsexual into its rabbinical program. The Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati said last week that Reuben Zellman, 24, an Oakland, Calif., a man who was formerly a woman, will enter the school this fall, opening the door to the first ordination of a rabbi who has changed genders. The student, who belongs to a largely gay synagogue in San Francisco, said he wants to work for peace and justice.

Cartoon Probed

LONDON — Britain's official media watchdog demanded that a newspaper answer allegations of anti-Semitism after a recent cartoon depicted Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon eating a baby. The Press Complaints Commission acted in response to a complaint from the Israeli Embassy in London made with Sharon's knowledge. The cartoon, which ran in The Independent just before Israel's January elections, showed Sharon crouched in the ruins of a village, biting the head off a baby as helicopters broadcast the message "Vote Sharon." Sharon asks in the drawing: "What's wrong… You never seen a politician kissing babies before?"

Alabama Torah

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — A New York rabbi earlier this month began what is believed to be the first Torah ever written for Alabama's Jewish community. Rabbi Yochanon Klein, 22, a fourth generation sofer (scribe), started the Torah in Birmingham with the first few verses of Genesis, then sent the scroll on to a scribe in Israel who will finish most of it. Rabbi Klein said he will return to Birmingham in June to finish it just before Shavuot. The Alabama Jewish Community Torah will be housed in Birmingham's Bais Ariel Chabad Center once it is completed.

Rabbis Seek U.S. Lawmaker's Resignation

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Six Virginia rabbis have asked for the resignation of Rep. James Moran after the Democrat suggested the Jewish community is behind the Bush administration's push for war against Iraq.

"As leaders in the Jewish community of northern Virginia, we have reached the end of our patience with Congressman Jim Moran and his treatment of the Jewish community and its concerns," they said in a statement, referring to Moran's past troubles for pro-Palestinian statements.

Speaking to constituents last week, Moran reportedly said, "If it were not for the strong support of the Jewish community for this war with Iraq, we would not be doing this." He said Jewish leaders were spurred by discussions they have had with Israeli Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the hawkish former prime minister.

In a statement, Moran said he mentioned the Jewish community because a woman asking a question identified herself as Jewish. "By no means did I intend or believe that members of the Jewish community are united in their support for a possible war with Iraq," he said. "And I certainly never meant, nor do I believe, to imply that the Jewish community is responsible for or should be blamed for this war."

Moran, 57, whose daughter is in the process of converting to Judaism for an August wedding, said last week he felt "hurt" and would not resign.

Senator's bill addressing anti-Semitism languishes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A few weeks ago, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) met in Vienna to discuss the troubling growth of anti-Semitism in Western democracies. Around the same time in Washington, D.C., the U.S. House of Representatives adopted a "sense of the Congress" resolution that pledged action against the age-old scourge.

France, meanwhile, recently passed a bill that doubles penalties for anti-Semitic and racist violence, while a Russian delegate to the same OSCE meeting denounced the anti-Semitic rhetoric that too often mars the legislative sessions of the Russian Duma.

All these developments point to a gathering of momentum, an international effort by legislators to address anti-Semitism in a variety of venues, said Sen. Jerry Grafstein, treasurer of OSCE's Parliamentary Assembly and a participant in the Vienna meetings.

"It's starting to catch fire," Grafstein said.

In Canada, however, things are moving more slowly. Inertia has set in and the Senate has for months been sitting on a resolution introduced by Grafstein that would, in effect, Canadianize the measures to address anti-Semitism adopted last July by the 55-member OSCE .

The snail's pace of the Senate is something that has the Toronto-area lawmaker frustrated and somewhat envious of his colleagues in other democratic jurisdictions.

Grafstein would like to move his resolution to a Senate committee where hearings will be held, witnesses called, and the whole unsavoury resurgence of Jew-hatred be given a public airing.

Too many of his colleague are unaware of the attacks Jews have been experiencing, including arson assaults on synagogues, he said.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION IN JAPAN: Rev. Makoto Otsuka, the founder and director of the Holocaust Education Centre in Fukuyama City near Hiroshima, recently visited the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus. The only Holocaust education facility in Japan, the centre is dedicated to teaching Japanese young people about the Shoah. Rev. Otsuka spoke in Hebrew to four classes, and described the work of his centre, which has received more than 60,000 visitors in seven years. He is seen here with the Grade 9 Jewish history class.

An ambassador for us all

From the editor's desk

Most Canadians do not know that the oldest symphony orchestra in our country is the Orchestre symphonique de Québec, the Quebec Symphony Orchestra (QSO). It was founded in 1903 and this year celebrates its centenary. To mark the occasion, the orchestra embarks on its first-ever cross-Canada tour.

With the help of the Canada Council for the Arts, the orchestra will start its 10-day tour in Vancouver March 31, with stops in Banff, Regina, Winnipeg and Ottawa and concluding in Toronto April 9.

The key aim of the tour, the orchestra's conductor and artistic director, Yoav Talmi, told The CJN last week, is "to provide a chance for audiences to know something about the City of Quebec. For we feel we are ambassadors of the city."

The members of the orchestra will indeed be musical and cultural ambassadors of Quebec City. Their maestro, however, the 60-year-old Talmi, is not only an ambassador of the city but also of a great deal more. For when he steps onto the stage, he expresses the historic, national and cultural identity that is embedded deeply in his soul.

"I am always a proud Israeli," Talmi said. He was born on Kibbutz Merchavia in what was then Mandatory Palestine. The eldest of three children, he and his siblings were taught, in the spare household of the kibbutz, to understand and love music. Their father, a new immigrant to the still-pioneering yishuv in 1936 from Sosnowice, Poland, was their teacher.

Talmi's prodigious talents were evident at an early age. While still a young teenager, he left the kibbutz for Tel Aviv to study music at the Rubin Academy. At the age of 18, he was already conducting. After he completed his studies at the academy, he went to New York to further his education as conductor and composer at the Juilliard School of Music.

Recognition of his unique abilities came quickly. He won the Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize at the Tanglewood Festival in 1969 and won the Rupert Conductors' Competition in London four years later.

Talmi's experiences as maestro are extensive, having conducted leading symphony and chamber orchestras in every major European city, in more than a dozen of North America's largest cities, and the Israel Chamber and Opera Orchestras . In addition to his role with the QSO, which he has held for four years, Talmi is also the chief conductor of the Hamburg Symphony, conducting as many as eight concerts annually there.

In an open, friendly interview, Talmi reflected upon his life and the career path that has been his satisfying pleasure to walk for more than four decades.

His approach to the art of conducting was influenced by the great maestro Bruno Walter, who, Talmi said, achieved results "out of love – love for music and for composers." The warm Walterian approach was reinforced in the rising, young Israeli musician by his close observation of Istvan Kertesz, a Hungarian-born conductor who was in Israel at the time the clay of Talmi's philosophy of conducting and style as a maestro were still being formed. "In every detail of his work," Talmi said, "Kertesz worked in a collegial way."

That collegiality, and a togetherness with the musicians under his baton, permeates Talmi's approach to conducting.

Yoav Talmi

In near-poetic terms, he described how he interprets his role standing between the audience and the orchestra. "I trust my musicians. I do not want to be a policeman, directing the traffic of their music. Rather, I want to inspire them so that together we can help lift the music high into the air."

Talmi's reverence for the music and the musicians is unreserved. "All performances are messengers for the composer. The text of the music is my bible. We try to bring that text to life keeping in mind the intentions of the composer. How happy it makes me when we are performing an inspirational piece and the audience is on the edge of their chairs listening and enjoying."

Talmi spoke of one occasion where, it seemed, the audience sat the entire performance "on the edge of their chairs."

In 1987, immediately after the fall of the Iron Curtain, Talmi took the Israel Chamber Orchestra to Budapest for two concerts. They were the first Israeli musicians invited to play there after a long boycott. The political atmosphere was still raw with potential and not inconsiderable anxiety for the future. As a result, Talmi was told by Hungarian authorities not to perform either the Israeli or the Hungarian national anthems.

The first concert, held in the concert hall of Budapest, was a rousing success. The second concert was performed in Budapest's Great Synagogue. It was filled beyond capacity. People from all over the country poured into the synagogue to hear the musicians from Israel.

At concert's end, the applause unceasing, Talmi and his musicians emerged to play an encore. At encore's end, the applause increased in intensity. The Israeli musicians then played a second encore. Like an awakening giant whose long dormant body is infused with the electricity of spirit, the cheering of the audience grew stronger. But with their repertoire of prepared music exhausted, the orchestra had nothing left to play except one piece.

As the sounds of Hatikvah rose in the air, the audience's emotions welled over, and they burst into song and tears, reclaiming a sensation and a connection to something precious and ethereal deprived to them for so many years. The musicians and their conductor cried along with the audience. "It was an unbelievable moment that I will never forget," Talmi said, his voice trailing off.

Yoav Talmi, to be sure, is an elegant, talented ambassador of the City of Quebec. But, in a very profound way, he is also an ambassador for us all. He and the Quebec Symphony Orchestra will be in Toronto performing at the Roy Thomson Hall on April 9.

Eleven teams representing six schools – Beit Rayim Hebrew School, Bet Sefer Solel, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Kol Ami Religious School and United Congregational School – participated in a very close competition. Bet Sefer Solel placed first, Beit Rayim second and United Congregational School third. Members of the winning team, pictured from left, were Alexandra Bottner, Jordan Tannenbaum, Aaron Hakim, Dan Minchom, Greg Bundus. The students are standing with their coach, Simon David. The team competition took place after students completed the written portion of the contest. Those who passed the written test will head to the National Bible Contest in Montreal in May.

CRRF leader speaks up against anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For 12 years, Karen Mock was responsible for putting together B'nai Brith's annual Audit of Anti-semitic Incidents, so when she read about the 60 per cent surge in incidents involving Jews in 2002, she was not particularly surprised.

Karen Mock

But she said one comment by spokespeople for her old employer did bother her, and that was the statement that asked why the anti-racist community in Canada remains silent about anti-Semitism.

As executive-director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation (CRRF), a position she took up about two years ago, Mock is deeply immersed in anti-racism education. Part of her work includes co-operating with other groups and agencies to fight racism in Canada, which allows her to see first-hand the kind of behind-the-scenes discussions that go on among anti-racism advocates.

Mock agrees with B'nai Brith that more could, and should, be said by others in the field. The CRRF, for its part, practises what it preaches, she said.

It criticized native leader David Ahenakew when he praised the Nazi murder of Jews, it sent its condolences to the family of murder victim David Rosenzweig and it has condemned Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel's ongoing attempt to gain refugee status in Canada.

But, she said, in the post-Durban climate in which anti-Zionism has often turned into anti-Semitism, some in the anti-racist community have not spoken out as they should against anti-Semitic incidents.

"Some people in the anti-racism movement do not see anti-Semitism as a form of racism, but some do."

What's more, Mock said she has been told by some in the field that they don't feel comfortable pointing out incidents of anti-Semitism.

"They feel intimidated from speaking out for fear of losing their constituency, or being denounced for speaking out," she said. "I've had Jewish colleagues in the anti-racism world tell me behind the scenes that some are increasingly reluctant to speak up, because in their workplaces and organizations, it gets tense."

Mock attributes much of the problem to a particular way of analyzing racism. "In some circles, if an anti-oppression model is used, the new generation is not learning that anti-Semitism is a prototype of racism."

Mock is careful to point out she doesn't mean to tar everyone in the anti-racism movement with the same brush. Not all anti-racist activists are ignoring anti-Semitic incidents, she said.

Much of the tension in the movement stems from disagreements over whether criticism of Israel and anti-Zionism can be considered anti-Semitic. "I agree that if people are concerned with the situation in Israel, that doesn't make them anti-Semitic. On the other hand, it's a travesty that our friends in the anti-racism world don't recognize when the line gets crossed," she said.

There are tensions now in anti-racist circles on this topic, she said. Some – and she stresses it's only some – see Jews as "white, colonial oppressors who don't fit into the anti-racism model."

Ironically, she continued, this in itself is an example of generalizing and stereotyping.

Still, Mock said, people of good will are willing to listen and come around to her description of anti-Semitism as a form of racism.

Government cutbacks to anti-racist education programs and inter-cultural contacts exacerbate the problem, she said, as young people see anti-racism programs in their schools cut, while programs geared to adults have also been slashed.

As this group of young people enters university, a lack of sensitivity to anti-Semitism is felt on campus, she said.

Commenting on the B'nai Brith audit, Mock said "what's so worrisome is how silenced and marginalized Jewish students are feeling on campus and how vulnerable Jewish people are – in not identifying in work places that they are Jews. It's reminiscent of a frightening time in our country."

Seniors protest BJCC paid parking

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Three months ago, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) cordoned off a portion of the parking lot adjacent to the building and began charging a $2-a-day parking fee. Today, some members are preparing a petition asking that the lot's entry gates be raised during the day to let seniors park close to the facility and avoid the walk from a nearby overflow lot.

$2 daily fee called too costly for people on fixed incomes

Seniors are "angry" at the BJCC's new policy, especially since it has always been difficult to find a spot close to the facility, said one member who declined to be identified.

Because of the new closed-off area, choice parking spots are at a premium, forcing seniors into an overflow lot across a bridge at the south end of the BJCC.

And for many seniors on fixed incomes who use the facility every day, even a $2 fee is too costly, said Goldie Wiesblatt, the longtime member who is circulating the petition.

Twice, elderly members have fallen while walking to the building from the overflow lot, she said. For seniors, the longer walk, particularly in the winter months, is a big disincentive to using the centre, and rather than make the walk, some have turned around and headed home, Wiesblatt said.

Some members are so upset, they are saying they may not renew their memberships and will instead look elsewhere, the unidentified senior said.

BJCC executive director Sherry Kulman said she is aware of the complaints about the new paid parking. But, she said, only 50 spots to the south of the Leah Posluns Theatre are part of the paid lot.

There are still 200 "choice spots" adjacent to the building, she said, including areas alongside the children's play area and the outdoor swimming pool. Plus, there are another 400 spots in the overflow lot, for a total of 650.

Prior to introducing the paid parking area in December, Kulman said, the BJCC carefully considered the implications of the proposal, and the decision was made to go ahead because "we need to generate revenue for programs and services."

While Kulman would not say how much is being raised through parking fees, she said revenues have been growing steadily each week. (If all 50 spots are rented once per day for 300 days every year, potential revenue could be $30,000.)

But Wiesblatt and the second senior said they never see much more than a handful of cars in the lot. With the loss of potential members due to unhappiness over parking, it doesn't make financial sense to continue the program, they said.

"Some seniors are thinking twice about renewing their memberships," Wiesblatt said.

Kulman said the centre has tried to accommodate its members on the parking issue. On very cold days when the temperature dips into the minus double-digit range, the parking gate is left open.

"Our goal is not to upset the membership. We try to be sensitive to their needs," she said. "Sometimes, change is difficult."

Kulman said centre management plans to look at issue "again in June and assess its success."

Heinz Canada trims kosher product line

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Kosher shoppers were shocked recently to discover that Heinz Canada has removed kosher certification from all but a handful of its products.

According to company spokesperson Anna Relyea, the move stemmed from a desire to "keep costs down while continuing to provide kosher products to our customers."

COR officials say consumer response indicates the decision may have been a mistake, one which they say Heinz may reverse in the foreseeable future.

Only a few Heinz products remain under supervision, including ketchup, infant cereal and tomato juice.

Items that are no longer kosher include staples such as tomato sauces and paste, vinegar and mustard.

Heinz jarred baby foods are also no longer kosher, and Heinz – as the federal Competition Bureau noted three years ago when it investigated the company for anti-competitive practices in the sector – is the sole supplier of jarred baby food in Canada.

As a result, many parents will be forced to buy more expensive imported kosher baby foods, such as Beech-Nut. (Heinz "Pablum" dry baby foods remain kosher.)

The decertification decision follows a deal last year between Heinz Canada's parent company in the United States and Del Monte that saw Del Monte acquire a number of leading Heinz brands, including Starkist tuna. But "the Del Monte deal has nothing to do with this... decision," Relyea said.

"This was done after a lot of careful consideration," she said. "Only when there were no other options available did we decide to remove the designations."

In the 1920s, Heinz products in the United States were the first to carry national kosher certification under the "OU" hechsher, which still certifies many American-made Heinz products.

Company cites variety of factors for decision

Heinz Canada has also discontinued supervision on all domestic beans, including those formerly manufactured under the Libby's label. Libby's was acquired by Heinz Canada in 1996, and at that time, the changeover did not compromise the longstanding certification of products, including the vegetarian Deep Browned Beans variety.

Products were cut from the kosher line based on a variety of factors, Relyea said, including "how complex the manufacturing is, what the savings were and so on."

The size of a product category was also a major factor, she said. "For example, in the case of ketchup, [the category] is huge, so maintaining kosher made sense."

Ending the certification on beans was more of a logistics issue, given the complexity of producing a product with pork and a kosher vegetarian product at the same time.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, COR's executive director, said there are "definite problems there. They're making kosher and non-kosher products on the same equipment."

Based in Toronto, Heinz Canada is one of 40 worldwide subsidiaries of its U.S. parent. It employs 2,000 full-time salaried and hourly employees and more than 500 seasonal staff.

Relyea called the Canadian marketplace a "very competitive retail trade environment," one that keeps the company "under continual pressure to keep costs down to remain competitive."

However, she was unable to substantiate company claims that the move will save money.

In 1991, a Heinz spokesperson, quoted in an Anti-Defamation League document arguing against claims that kosher supervision "taxes" non-Jewish consumers, said the per item cost [of supervision] is "so small we can't even calculate it," and that kosher labelling actually makes products less costly by increasing the market for them.

Relyea says the de-listing hasn't affected any Heinz products in the United States.

Mandate abused

No one will gainsay that there is an element of theatre in the proceedings of the legislature, especially during the cut, thrust, parry and insult of question period, even quite histrionically enhanced after television cameras were introduced into all the legislative assemblies across the country. But the opposite is equally true. No one will assert that there is any element of legislative assembly in the electronic theatre of a television show.

And yet, incredibly, the government of Ontario has decided to effectively supplant the political, constitutional, legal, cultural, governmental customs and traditions of the legislative assembly with the plastic, entertainment, video world of the TV studio. On March 27, Ontario Premier Ernie Eves will "introduce" the formal provincial budget in front of a live Conservative party-friendly television studio audience rather than in the legislature.

Eves defended his decision by saying that "the budget itself will be delivered in the community to the people of Ontario." It both saddens and disappoints us to observe that the premier's defence is a shallow trough in which is reflected with blinding clarity his poor grasp of the importance of his role as premier and his utter failure to understand that the elected members of the legislative assembly are the people of Ontario. In truth, by avoiding the legislature, he is, in a very profound way, avoiding the people. He is trivializing the budgetary process. He is marginalizing and degrading the legislative assembly. And worst of all, he is educating the younger generation of Ontarians, whose relationships and civic associations with our institutions are still being formed, that the television converter is more important to our democracy than the legislature. We urge the premier to reverse his decision.

Mandate sought

Quebecers will elect a new provincial government next month on April 14. Premier Bernard Landry has decided to place his record and his vision for the future before the voters of the province and to submit to them his right to stay on as premier.

It would undoubtedly be a great relief to the majority of Quebecers if they could vote for the party of their choice merely on the basis of who can provide the best government. But that relief, alas, is not at hand. For Landry made plain his plan. "In my mind, the real change is settling the national question once and for all."

In other words, once again, the election is really about separatism. And once again, the separatist Parti Québécois will try to bend the process to serve its will and its will alone. The PQ speaks about "once and for all." But what it really means is "until we finally win." The people of Quebec, having twice rejected the separatist option, thought they had settled the question "once and for all." But "once and for all" seems not to work both ways; it applies only to Landry's party.

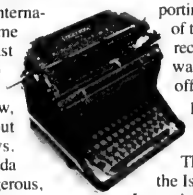
Silence is acquiescence

Barely 50 years after the unprecedented genocide of the Jewish people in Europe, anti-Semites are crawling out again from under the rocks.

At Montreal's Concordia University, students are afraid to wear anything that identifies them as Jewish. At Toronto's York University, the head of the Centre for International and Security Studies cancels a lunchtime program with David Pipes of the Middle East Forum, effectively making someone who speaks out for fairness for Israel not welcome on that campus. Native leader David Ahenakew, who was given an Order of Canada, spews out the most vile and despicable lies about Jews. Windsor NDP MP Joe Comartin criticizes Canada for outlawing Hezbollah, one of the most dangerous, murderous terrorist organizations in the world.



What we see is a cancer attacking Jews. How are we responding? Most of us are doing nothing. We think it will go away. But is this not the same brain-dead thinking that turned Europe into a slaughterhouse for our people? Where are our talented lawyers, teachers, professors? Where are our well-educated Jews? Why are we not writing letters of protest to our members of Parliament, joining in protests, boycotting and writing to embassies in European countries, whose hateful policies put Israel in jeopardy? Let us tell the supporters of the new Nazis we will not tolerate these vicious attacks.

The media were to blame?

According to Gadi Wolfsfeld, a Hebrew University "media specialist," the Israeli media played "a destructive role" in reporting on the "now-defunct Oslo peace process" ("Israeli media helped kill Oslo, professor says," CJN, Feb 27).

If so, then I and many others mistakenly thought that what killed Oslo were atrocities such as the murder by Palestinians of eight civilians at a bus stop in Afula, the suicide bombing of a bus in Hadera that claimed five lives, and the suicide bombing of a bus in Tel Aviv that resulted in 22 civilian fatalities. These murders took place within months after Oslo, while Yitzhak Rabin was still prime minister and the Israeli media was feeding public speculation on the myriad blessings of the approaching peace, as taken from The New Middle East, the book written by that eternal optimist, former prime minister Shimon Peres.

Following Wolfsfeld's logic, we should conclude that had the Israeli media not made such a big to-do about all those atrocities because of its insatiable need "to turn events into a soap opera," the public would have remained serene and fully supportive of the blood- drenched peace process.

Evidently, we were wrong to blame the government-controlled Arab media for agitating against the peace process, for calling for more acts of "martyrdom" (suicide bombings) and for expelling from its ranks and professional associations any journalist who dared visit Israel or associate with Israeli journalists, the great majority of whom ardently support the peace process.

Obviously, Wolfsfeld and other media mavens know better.

One final point. Wolfsfeld insinuates that negative reporting by the Israeli media contributed to the failure of the Camp David negotiations. If I remember correctly, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat walked away from Camp David, where he was offered substantial concessions by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, instead of continuing to negotiate, as both former U.S. president Bill Clinton and Barak urged him to do.

The intifadah followed in short order. Why should the Israeli press be blamed for this chain of events? Leave it to the "media specialist."

Israel advocacy cannot be only focus

I very much enjoyed Anna Morgan's recent piece about the proliferation of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism on Canadian campuses and its detrimental effect on Jewish students ("Anti-Israel environment on campus creating identity crisis for many students," CJN, March 6). Many people have asked me what I meant when I said that campus organizations "have to be careful not to forfeit our Judaism for the sake of Israel." What I meant was that Jewish campus organizations need to ensure they do not forsake appreciation and celebration of, and learning about, Judaism for the sake of defending Israel, and that Israel advocacy cannot become the only focus of Jewish life on campus.

Objects to CJN war coverage

Why does The CJN only run pro-war editorials and articles that attempt to prove a U.S.-led attack on Iraq is justified? The Jewish community is not united on this issue – many Jews are opposed to this war and are active participants in the anti-war movement. The idea that the protesters sympathize with Saddam Hussein is completely ludicrous, yet The CJN repeats this myth in issue after issue.

The vast majority of the anti-war protesters believe Saddam is nothing but a murderous gangster. However, they do not believe that a war would be justified. There has been no credible evidence that Saddam possesses biological and chemical weapons. The issue is certainly not worth the lives of thousands of Iraqi civilians. As well, an attack on a sovereign nation without the approval of the UN Security Council would be a violation of international law.

The CJN should reflect the diversity of opinion that exists in the Jewish community on this issue.

Is War with Iraq justified ?

War against Iraq necessary and just, according to Jewish law

By RABBI IRVING GREENBERG

One cannot answer the question of whether going to war with Iraq is morally justified without first establishing the state we are in.

The truth, which many North American Jews find too bitter to swallow, is that we are already in a state of total war. We face an implacable enemy who has struck and killed Jews repeatedly, who has vowed to wipe out the state of Israel while making clear – in Tunisia, in Kenya, in Pakistan – that all Jews worldwide are targets.

The same enemy is at war with the United States. Sept. 11 represents open warfare and mass murder, but this war has been waged, overtly and covertly, for decades. It includes relentless indoctrination of hatred against Americans, aid to America's enemies, bombing of U.S. embassies and terrorist violence against U.S. allies and interests.

The co-incidence of war on America and the Jews is not a co-incidence. America is seen as the source of economic dynamism that is sweeping away traditional hierarchies and of cultural transformation that is undermining authoritarian faiths and inherited structures. The West, modernity, media, "uppity women," homosexuality, unlimited cultural choices and the decline of Islamic civilization in the arts, science and human rights are all lumped together and blamed on the "Great Satan," America.

'The Iraq situation is a classic case of a permitted war'

These hated values are further stigmatized by blaming them on Jews and Israel, the "Little Satan."

Anti-Semites have charged that Jews introduced modernity and capitalism in western Europe. Other anti-Semites have blamed Jews for communism in eastern Europe. Now Islamic Jew-haters blame them for purveying the evils of western capitalist democracy.

Arabists have recently claimed that America is hated because it supports Israel. In fact, the opposite is closer to the truth. Israel is hated as an outpost of Western civilization on land seen as divinely ordained for Muslim rule.

Some argue that the war is being waged by Al Qaeda, not Iraq. But this 50-plus-year war has been waged by a loose, shifting collection of states and groups, frequently divided and fighting among each other, but all drawing on Arab cultural resentment and radical Islamic fundamentalism.

The question is whether our overt war against Al Qaeda should be extended to Iraq. The answer: Iraq, by its behaviour since 1990, has confronted the United States and made war a needed response. Iraq invaded Kuwait. After losing the 1991 Gulf War, to avoid invasion, it promised to disarm. Instead, Iraq frustrated and expelled inspectors while renewing its effort to acquire nuclear arms.

In conjunction with chemical and biological weapons, these instruments are intended to conquer Israel, to subdue Iraq's neighbours, and to intimidate and drive out the West. Should Iraq succeed in rearming, it would not hesitate to use these weapons (or to supply them to Al Qaeda or other terrorist groups and regimes) for use against the United States, Israel or Jews anywhere, or against other populations.

Here we come to the core questions: Maybe Iraq can be hamstrung or delayed? Maybe, even if armed, Saddam Hussein will not strike in fear of U.S. retaliation – just as he has held back since 1991?

This is precisely the judgment call. Unlike a situation in which we have been openly attacked and a strike in self-defence is self-evidently justified, the Iraq situation is debatable. Maybe Saddam will never attack and we can get by without a war.

My personal judgement is:

• The risk of not imposing disarmament is intolerable. No dictator so vile and dangerous should be allowed to become a nuclear-biological threat. We need only remember the massive loss of life due to the world's initial appeasement of Hitler and Stalin.

• If the United States strikes pre-emptively, it risks inflicting limited deaths. If we allow Saddam to strike first, the death toll will be staggering. The calculus of risk tilts overwhelmingly toward pre-emptive action.

Jewish tradition values peace as the highest good. It envisions a messianic age in which war will disappear. Until then, however, Jewish law rules there are two legitimate types of wars.

The first is a war of self-defence. As Maimonides said, "save the people of Israel from an enemy coming at them." Self-defence is considered a milchemet mitzvah, a commanded war.

The second type of legitimate war is in a situation when it's unclear the enemy will definitely attack, but the government feels a pre-emptive strike is warranted for greater security or for expanded boundaries to yield defensive depth against a possible future onslaught. Since the war is not definitively one of self-defence, it can't be labelled a mitzvah. However, the ruler is authorized to pursue this action by his definition of national security. This war is called a milchemet reshut, a permitted war. Since this war is not self-evidently justified, extra restrictions are placed on the government:

• Going to war must be approved by the Sanhedrin (a legislative/judicial body);

• There are a range of exemptions from service, including those people who are afraid (which I interpret to include those who morally object to the war);

• The permitted military tactics are more tightly regulated. Maimonides rules that in both kinds of war, one must first offer peace to the enemy. Only if the enemy refuses to surrender can one proceed.

In my judgment, the Iraq situation is a classic case of a permitted war.

Saddam Hussein

The Bush administration has decided that U.S. security demands pre-emptive action. Since the justification is not self-evident, it is right that Congress has been asked for, and given, its approval, and that a wide range of exemptions (and expressions of opposition) be allowed.

The likely loss of life on both sides, both military and civilian, will be heartbreaking. But given Saddam's cruel and barbarous reign, many more lives will likely be saved by his overthrow.

Smashing this dictatorship will erode terrorists' standing everywhere, encourage moderates and unleash forces of democratization throughout the region.

Of course, this could fail. If so, the forces of terror would be strengthened. This is the risk of freedom. There are no guarantees in history. But the cancerous growth of violence and terror cannot be stopped any other way. If we fail, we must take responsibility for our actions. If we succeed, democracy and human dignity will take a giant leap forward.

Pursuing peace, pursuing justice: The Jewish obligation in this hour

By RABBI ARTHUR WASKOW

Two profound teachings of Jewish tradition should be guiding Jews today regarding war with Iraq.

The first is "Tzedek, tzedek, tirdof," or "Justice, justice, shall you pursue." The ancient rabbis asked, "Why 'justice' twice? They answered: "Seek just ends by just means; seek justice for ourselves, justice for all others."

Certainly it is a "just goal" to make certain that Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction and cannot pour death upon Israel or the rest of the world.

But war against Iraq is not the just means of accomplishing this just end. Instead, it is likely to endanger many Iraqi, American, Israeli and other lives. It is also likely to endanger Israel – bring on, as U.S. intelligence experts have said, the danger of a last-ditch chemical/biological attack on Israel – and endanger moderate Arab governments that have made peace with it.

'Jewish groups should support the efforts of Jewish anti-war groups'

A war will also take hundreds of billions of dollars from America's own people – from health care for our seniors, schools for our children, healing for the earth. An attack on Iraq will increase the unaccountable power of the oil companies and regimes that have provided money to both Al Qaeda terrorists and the Bush administration, that have corrupted American politics and robbed American stockholders, and that have befouled the seas and scorched the earth.

It will also worsen already deeply wounded human rights and civil liberties – not only for Arabs and Muslims in America but even for Persian Jewish immigrants who were rounded up along with Muslims – and it will increase the use of torture on prisoners held overseas by the CIA, as reported recently by the Washington Post.

So what is the practical alternative to war? What would "just means" be?

North American Jews could:

• Support the Franco-German plan to intensify and prolong the UN inspection regime in Iraq, for months or years if necessary, while a totally different American and world approach to Iraq, the Middle East and Islam takes hold;

• Encourage a multilateral "Marshall Plan" for massive relief and rebuilding in Iraq before war, not waiting until afterward when there will be hundreds of thousands more dead and perhaps millions more refugees, beyond those already suffering and dying under the misapplied sanctions. The world Jewish, Christian, and Muslim communities, the European Union, and many non-governmental organizations should supply food, medicine and clothing to Iraqis – and they should do this on the ground to make sure both that the effort does not just feed the ruling dictatorship and that it is not used as a tool by the United States or other hostile powers;

• Urge a worldwide treaty to eliminate weapons of mass destruction held by all nations;

• Urge the United States to insist that all Arab countries sign peace treaties with Israel, and insist on a peace deal between a secure Israel and a viable Palestine;

• Call a world conference of religious leaders to end the use of traditional texts and contemporary fears to justify violence against other religions (such as the effort in some Christian communities during the past generation to eliminate anti-Semitic interpretations of Christianity);

• Urge the United States to join the International Criminal Court and broaden its jurisdiction to include international terrorism as well as governmental war crimes;

• Urge the United States to begin an all-out effort to conserve energy and bring renewable energy sources on line to minimize the use of oil and coal.

These specifics are strands in a larger weave of planetary community, and we need to imagine that weave in all its wholeness. Then we can choose what aspects of this future we can begin to embody in the present.

The second crucial Jewish teaching for this hour comes from Psalm 34: "Bakesh shalom v'radfayhu," or seek peace and pursue it." Again the rabbis asked, "Why both 'seek' and 'pursue'?" They answered that most mitzvot can be done by sitting (to eat) or standing (to pray) or even walking (to converse). But for the sake of peace, we must not only seek it, but if it is running away, we must chase after it.

Most of the official North American Jewish leadership has been paralyzed while peace runs away from us all. They should join those "peace-seekers" of the anti-war movement who take Jewish concerns seriously.

To do this, the mainstream Jewish community should learn to distinguish between anti-Israel and pro-Israel/pro-peace strands of the anti-war movement.

Mainstream Jewish groups should support the efforts of such affirmatively Jewish anti-war groups, and they should make sure their own staff and leaders meet and talk with Jewish anti-war organizers.

But this is only "seeking" peace. To "pursue" it, the larger liberal and progressive parts of the mainstream North American Jewish community should join such natural allies as the National Council of Churches, the NAACP and the Sierra Club, that have already formed a third anti-war coalition – Win Without War.

For Jews to be absent from this table not only betrays Jewish values and interests, it also fails to represent Jewish concerns when some of the most important North American public groups are creating a new centre of moral and political energy. It is as if mainstream Jewish groups had refused to take part in the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights in the 1950s and 1960s because some black groups were anti-Semitic.

During the late 1960s and early 1970s, progressive Jewish political groups, Jewish feminists and teachers such as Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi seeded change that sprouted in the mainstream Jewish community during the 1990s.

In much the same way, anti-war Jews today are seeding change that mainstream Jewry needs to learn from. As we now face the dangers to humanity and earth from reckless, unaccountable economic greed and reckless, unaccountable military power, they are drawing on, and appealing to, Jewish values.

Only at deep peril to itself will mainstream Jewry fail to hear these prophetic voices.

Gifts and gift givers

On Purim, Jews customarily give gifts of food to their neighbours. Traditionally, mama prepared and assembled the goodies, while papa and the kiddies delivered the gifts.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

In the Jewish calendar, Purim is a minor festival that celebrates the victory of the Persian Jews over their enemies. The story of Esther's strategic and courageous defeat of Haman concludes with a command that Jews celebrate the event annually, that "they should make them days of feasting and gladness, and of sending portions from one to another, and gifts to the poor" (Esther 9:22).

There are only four ritual acts we are commanded to undertake: recall and read the story of Esther (Megillat Esther), send food gifts to friends (mishloach manot), give presents to the poor (matanot le'evyonim), eat a festive meal (seudat Purim). Prominently, three of the four are food-related, and two are gifts.

Note the distinction between the two types of food gifts: one is for the poor and one is not. The second, quite separate action requires delivering food to a friend or neighbour. With this gift, the rabbinic requirement for two cooked foods means that the gift should be ready to eat. Everybody, even the poorest Israelite, was bound by this custom.

But this exchange of food is not to be confused with charity.

These gifts create a sense of peoplehood. They act as reminders of a shared history and destiny, establishing social relationships and boundaries. Gifts communicate status, obligation, freedom, identity, self-worth, and mutuality. They emanate from a sense of joy and forge an acceptance of friendship. The giving of home-made food generates intimacy and shared privacy, and it forces reciprocity and affective relationships.

These gifts quite literally reflect, construct and solidify community. And women direct, dominate and create these ritual exchanges.

Aside from Temple sacrifices and tithing practices, there are few other examples of directed food giving in Judaism. After a death, meals are prepared by neighbours – usually female neighbours. But for the most part, food for human consumption has not been perceived as a gift in Judaic lore and tradition.

Moreover, a woman's role as gift giver has not been seen as religiously crucial. Her sacred role and productive power is lost in the observers' gaze.

Yet, food appears to play a profound part in Jewish communal identity and religious life, but the woman's responsibility and religious power is concealed even on Purim, which associates the hiddenness of God with the leadership of one woman, Esther (whose name means hidden).

Holidays such as Passover also embrace food as a central element, not an incidental or supportive one. The same can be said about women: they are neither incidental nor merely supportive factors in Jewish religious life.

Let them hate, so long as they fear

Generally my column is about Jewish life in Canada, in all its glorious diversity. But there is a twisted theology spreading among us, manifest mostly in Israel but lurking in many hearts here as well, that needs to be treated before it kills the patient.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I am talking about the movement of extremist settlers in the occupied territories from their already controversial towns to new hilltop settlements, and the philosophy that sends them there.

These so-called illegal (but largely condoned) settlements are a symptom of a deeper problem that threatens all of us who love Israel.

These settlements are being built by young people, raised in the territories, who have imbibed a vicious mix of ultra-nationalism, hatred of Arabs, and messianic expectations.

One symptom of this illness can be seen in statements quoted recently in the New York Times from a "27-year-old shepherd" living on the Maon Farm (which last year sent a thuggish group to blow up an Arab school in Jerusalem).

He said he would like to see a "Jewish Taliban" that would run Israel according to Torah. "This is my land, but not my nation," he is quoted as saying. "I am waiting for King Messiah, a serious leader, to take out the Knesset, to say 'The army is mine.'"

Or this from another settler: "The Torah says we should kill all the Arabs. Not just Arabs who maybe help terrorists. Everybody."

Or this – and pay close attention to who said it: "Everybody has to move, run and grab as many hilltops as they can to enlarge the settlements, because everything we take now will stay ours... Everything we don't grab will go to [the Palestinians]."

Who said that? Ariel Sharon as foreign minister of Israel in 1998.

These young settlers cannot be blamed entirely for their attitudes. Egged on by people like Sharon and settler radical (if there can be such a thing) Moshe Zar, the hilltop settlers agree on a philosophy that can be summed up as "let them, the Arabs, hate us as long as they fear us."

How did we get here from the dream that Israel would broadcast the idea that nation should no longer rise up against nation? That out of Zion would come a vision of justice? How did we get to the place where young Israeli soldiers die protecting settlements that exist for no other reason than to provoke – since there is plenty of work to do in Israel to make a better homeland? How did Zionism become a stick to beat others? How did the messiah come to be perceived as a terrorist who destroys the democratic state of Israel and institutes a Taliban-type rule? Will we go back to the trial of women by ordeal? To slavery? To the time of the judges, when every man did what was right in his own eyes?

These hilltop people are the extrusion of a festering hatred: the feeling that Jews are not only chosen for duty, but for domination. That Palestinians are a "non-people," barely human, and our eternal enemies. That a dictatorial, vengeful messiah will solve it all, and in the meantime Jews have a duty to beat and terrorize those who would oppose this vision, without regard for other wasted lives.

The hilltop was traditionally a place of pagan sacrifice and orgy. Over and over again, prophets warned Israel against building pagan altars on the hilltops, or in the sacred groves where fertility rites were carried out with much human sacrifice and sexual misconduct.

How did the grab for land, now considered by the radicals as more holy than human life, become a value in Israel? How is it that the lives of Israeli soldiers, themselves mere children, become less important than the hardscrabble dirt of the territories? Must we become what is most despicable in others?

No, this is not the way. I thought the worst Israel could endure from its own people was the odd belief in amulets and magical rebbes, but those remedies for stress seem benign by comparison.

As the philosopher of Jewish history Amos Funkenstein wrote in Perceptions of Jewish History, "Depersonalization of the Palestinians, denial of their personal and political self-identity, has become an oppressive political reality. As a Zionist and as a historian, I fear these developments and abhor their consequences. By destroying the identity of the other, we, too, will destroy our own. It need not happen. It must not happen."

And who said, "Let them hate as long as they fear us?" Caligula.

Explaining Haman, explaining Hussein

Explaining Purim to a young child can be a fairly straightforward endeavour. A bad man wanted to kill all the Jews. It didn't work out. Instead, the villain and his 10 sons were hanged. To celebrate, we dress up as Teletubbies or puppies or princesses, make noise in synagogue and eat triangular, dough-wrapped prune pastry.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

It's not quite that simple, of course, but in essence, we have turned an old story of hatred, threats and capital punishment into a fairy tale for our kids. Granted that the themes of divine intervention and the triumph of good over evil are critical to explore, but the basic plot of the story isn't exactly pretty (even with the happy, good-for-the-Jews ending).

Still, it's a relatively easy story to tell – even to a child. Perhaps it's the passage of time, but it seems odd to me that it is so easy to say the words "a bad man wanted to kill all the Jews."

Fast-forward about 2,400 years to today as the world faces the challenge of dealing with Saddam Hussein. The story of the impending conflict is a harder one to explain. Regardless of the outcome, there will be no celebratory pastries. And the gas mask is the only special apparel associated with this tale.

My wife and I don't watch television or listen to the radio when the kids are around. But if war erupts – which seems almost certain as I write this – it is likely that the news will be on a great deal. Our four-year-old daughter will want to know what's going on. She'll want to know why we're so concerned and distracted. She'll catch a glimpse of the occasional CNN footage of bombs lighting up Baghdad's night sky. She'll want to know why we're calling our Israeli relatives so often.

I'm not sure yet how I will answer her questions. Will we explain what a bomb is when she sees the bright flashes of light descending on Baghdad? How will we explain what a gas mask is when she sees images of nervous Israelis? And what will we say when CNN airs interviews with wounded soldiers, crying relatives of the deceased and embattled civilians?

A child of four won't understand why some people might identify a grieving Iraqi widow as an enemy and won't be able to conclude that that woman is an unfortunate victim of an international struggle launched to disarm her tyrannical leader. My daughter will just want to know why the lady is sad.

If I do try to explain what a war is and why many people support it, will she be able to differentiate the idea that some wars are justified from the fact that it's never okay to hit her little brother? Not likely.

It is so easy, on the other hand, to talk about the story of Purim because we've specifically packaged it for youth consumption. There's a story with identifiable heroes and a party atmosphere with costumes, songs and treats. It happened long ago. It's in a book.

So, as war looms and my daughter turns four, I find myself thinking in old-fashioned terms. I suspect I'll say things such as, "You're too young to understand," "The news is only for grown-ups" and "This doesn't affect us." It's a bit of a cop-out and an easy way to deal with it. And perhaps it's the right way for now.

The way we celebrate Purim lets us all be like kids. But the impending war will age us all. I guess I don't need my kids to try and understand war just yet. Unfortunately, there will be plenty of opportunities for them to do that throughout their lives. For now, we should pray for a day when all tyrants become characters in stories, like Haman, and not figures on prime-time television, like Saddam.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Moscow

Off Red Square last week, Vladimir Volfovich Zhirinovsky, the clownish Russian politician who has acquired notoriety for his incendiary barbs, was clad incongruously in a tight-fitting red apron. Standing on a stage, his platform of choice, he struck a populist pose of bonhomie, talking loudly into a cordless microphone, his words reverberating in the cold night air and bouncing off the fairy tale, floodlit St. Basil's Cathedral. Every so often, he tossed freshly baked blinis into the crowd, clearly savouring the stunt.

Sheldon Kirshner in Russia

I was in Moscow for Malenitsa (Pancake Week), a holiday dating back to pagan times. I had been invited to Moscow by the Committee for Tourism and Sabra Tours of Toronto. By chance, I left Canada on March 5, the 50th anniversary of Josef Stalin's death. As I flew toward my destination, I read a newspaper story reiterating that Stalin's sudden demise had forestalled a diabolical plan to ship Soviet citizens of Jewish descent to camps in the Siberian wilderness.

Several hours after the Aeroflot flight touched down smoothly in Moscow, I found myself in Red Square, listening to Zhirinovsky, a practised rabble-rouser. Zhirinovsky, whose original name was Edelshstein, is the founder and leader of the far-right Liberal Democratic party, one of the largest factions in the Duma, the Russian Parliament. A divisive figure who offers voters a "third path" between communism and democracy, he has praised Nazi Germany's ideology, accused Jews of bringing the Holocaust upon themselves, cozied up to Saddam Hussein and referred to U.S. presidential aspirant, Pat Buchanan, who once infamously described Congress as "Israeli-occupied territory," as a "brother-in-arms."

Zhirinovsky is a slippery character. Some years ago, when asked about his parents, he elicited guffaws of ridicule by declaring that his mother was a "Russian" and his father a "lawyer." But in a book published in 2001, he finally admitted that his father had been a Polish Jew. And by way of repentance, he mourned the murder of six million Jews in the Holocaust.

Exhausted by jet lag, I cut short my visit to Red Square and returned to the Cosmos Hotel, a four-star hostelry expressly built for the Moscow Olympics. The smoke-filled lobby swarmed with young, slim, pretty women in skin-hugging skirts who lasciviously eyed unattached men.

Having woken up at 4 a.m. to watch President George W. Bush's speech on Iraq, I overslept, and was rudely jolted out of my slumber by Elena, the guide. Moscow, a sprawling city of broad boulevards, stolid pastel buildings, Stalinist wedding-cake skyscrapers and heroic statues, basked under a sunny sky. As birds chirped and soldiers in greatcoats shovelled away mounds of snow and broke up ice formations, I sensed that spring was not too far off.

Moscow's main thoroughfares were choked with cars, local and foreign. When I was last here, in 1993, less than two years after the collapse of communism, traffic jams were rare. Now, also, privately owned shops, cafes and restaurants had sprung up, underlining the fact that capitalism and consumerism have firmly taken hold. Flush with oil revenues, Russia's economy is on a roll after the crashes of 1992 and 1998. As a symbol, the gigantic Ikea furniture store – opposite the crossed steel girder monument marking the Germans' furthest advance toward Moscow in 1941 – is a compelling testament to changing times.

Yet the spirit of communism, though now generally discredited, lingers on. A large bust of Karl Marx, apparently the last remaining one in Moscow, glowers from a square near the ornate Bolshoi theatre. In the northern part of the city, a lonely stretch of road is named after Vladimir Lenin, who lies in state, doll-like, in a Red Square mausoleum.

Still other stalwarts of Soviet and pre-Soviet society – from Nikita Kruschchev and Andrei Gromyko to Anton Chekhov and David Oystrakh – are buried in Novodevichy. The cemetery is next to a beautiful snow-bound walled convent brimming with gold and silver onion-domed Russian Orthodox churches.

Back at Red Square on a bright, chilly morning, a gaggle of communists clutched old hammer-and-sickle flags, posing glumly for photographs. Most strollers ignored the Reds, making a beeline for the refurbished neo-classical TsUM department store, which dominates the left side of Red Square.

The famous landmark was crowded with sober, sartorially conscious Muscovites, but here and there, the occasional inebriated Russian could be seen walking unsteadily. They reminded me of Elena's good-natured joke: What's the difference between a Russian wedding and funeral? One less drunk.

The Kremlin, historically a centre of temporal and ecclesiastical power, was synonymous with communism for much of the 20th century. Even today, a glowing red star beckons from the top one of its most illustrious structures, the red-brick Trinity Gate Tower. In truth, however, the Kremlin owes much of its mystique to its ensemble of exquisite white-washed onion-domed cathedrals.

The Assumption Cathedral, finished in the 14th century, is replete with priceless icons of saints, prophets, biblical figures and holidays. The Archangel Cathedral, the venue of Romanov coronations and weddings, is the final resting place of 46 czars and czarinas from the 14th to the 18th centuries.

The Chorale Synagogue

The Romanov dynasty, which foisted the Pale of Settlement on Russia's Jewish community, was rarely well-disposed toward Jews. In the late 19th century, after an outbreak of pogroms, Jews by the millions fled to western Europe and North America. Inspired by the siren song of Zionism, some Jews settled in Palestine, an Ottoman backwater.

The 1917 Bolshevik Revolution opened up avenues of equality for Jews. But by the end of the 1940s, a dark curtain had fallen as a dictatorial one-party system embedded itself in the soul of the nation. Jewish institutions, schools and theatres were closed, the instruction of Hebrew was banned and Jews in senior positions were gradually eased out of government service and the armed forces.

Paranoiac and xenophobic to the core, Stalin accused Jews of "rootless cosmopolitanism" and Jewish doctors of evil deeds. Camps in Siberia were readied for Jewish deportees. If Stalin had lived longer, who knows what terrible fate would have awaited Soviet Jews?

With Stalin's passing, a brief political thaw brought a rash of bracing reforms to the Soviet Union. But state anti-Semitism, fused with a virulent form of anti-Zionism, entrenched itself. Not until the late 1980s, with glasnost in the air, were Jews able to breathe easier and rebuild a functioning community.

On my first visit to Russia nine years ago, I witnessed this incredible metamorphosis, which coincided with a religious reawakening touching all Russians. (The massive Christ the Saviour Cathedral in central Moscow, demolished by Stalin in the 1930s and rebuilt by Mayor Yuri Luzhkov in 1997, speaks eloquently to this phenomenon.)

Despite the mass migration of Jews since the 1990s, mainly to Israel, the United States and Canada, Russia is still home to hundreds of thousands of Jews and Russians of partial Jewish ancestry. But precise demographic figures are hard to come by.

Much to my regret, I was unable to meet with Jewish personalities. Assurances to the contrary, none of my requests for interviews materialized. I did, however, manage a visit to the Chorale Synagogue – with its yellow brick facade and 10 white columns – on Arkipova Street. There, in a mixture of Yiddish and Hebrew, I spoke to a middle-aged man who talked about the resurgence of Jewish weddings and bar mitzvahs in the wood-panelled synagogue.

Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, has expressed support for the renaissance that is transforming the Jewish community. Last year, he invited 21 Lubavitch rabbis to the Kremlin, taking note of Jewish contributions to Russia and promising to combat anti-Semitism, the bane of Russian history.

It is no secret that Russia opposes the United States' strategy of disarming Iraq by means of war if diplomacy fails. This point was vigorously conveyed by Vladimir Lukin – the deputy speaker of the Duma and former ambassador to Washington – at a press conference I attended. In an incredible remark, Lukin claimed that the imminent war in Iraq has nothing to do with Saddam and his regime and everything to do with commercial gain, a code phrase for oil.

Wonders never cease, even in Moscow.

Shouldn't Purim be on Pesach?

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

It has often been said that "one who controls the calendar controls the community." The Jewish people, perhaps more than other nations, live by the calendar. Our focus of awareness centres on what we are called to do at any particular time – and this, in turn, is based upon the specific circumstances of the hour.

Jewish holidays are imbued with special sanctity that do not just reflect the theme or message of the day. Rather, each holiday embodies the very essence of its identity. We don't just observe our holidays by commemorating events that happened long ago, we re-experience those events as active participants. This is most vividly seen with respect to Pesach.

In the Haggadah we are told: "B'chol dor vador chaiv adom lirot et atzmo ke'ilu hu yatzah miMitzrayim" – each of us in every generation must see ourselves as if we had been personally redeemed from slavery in Egypt.

This concept is more easily understood if we are precise in the way we understand time. Most people think of time as linear, as beginning at a specific point and "marching forward" into infinity. Jews view the passage of time differently. While time does indeed move forward, our sages see this progression as a spiral staircase – with each point on the curve identified with a different season, time or holiday. Thus, a vertical line drawn through the spiral staircase would connect Rosh Hashanah this year with every Rosh Hashanah celebrated in the past and every Rosh Hashanah that will be observed in the future. The time we are at on the spiral staircase today is connected vertically because of the essence of the season at this particular point on the cycle.

Every holiday has its own distinct season. Yet the question, shouldn't Purim be on Pesach? is relevant and valid. As described in the Megillah, the story of Purim covers a period of approximately 10 years. Not only are the years of these proceedings recorded but, in some cases, we are also given the specific dates of particular events.

For example, after receiving royal permission to proceed with his "Final Solution," Haman summoned the king's scribes on the 13th day of the first month (Esther 3:12). This was the month of Nissan, which is described as the first month of the Jewish year.

Further, we are told that on the same day, Mordechai became aware of the plot and sounded the alarm, calling for the Jews to pray and for Esther to intercede with the king. She then proclaimed a three-day fast (Esther 4:16), which refers to the 13th, 14th and 15th of Nissan. On the third day, Esther went to the king, risking her life to invite him and Haman to a meal she prepared that day. That night (the eve of the 16th of Nissan), the king could not sleep, and the next day (the 16th of Nissan), during Esther's second meal, Haman was sentenced to death and hanged.

Note these dates: the 15th day of Nissan is the first day of Pesach; on that day, Esther went to the king. The night of the second seder was the king's sleepless night. On the second day of Pesach, Haman met his deserved doom on the gallows he had built for Mordechai. Thus, we see that 11 months before the designated day of destruction for all Jews (the 13th day of Adar), Haman had been eliminated.

However, pockets of die-hard anti-Semites remained and the Jews were still forced to defend themselves. Only when the danger had completely passed, on the 14th day of Adar, did they celebrate and this is the day we, too, observe as Purim.

It should not be forgotten that the events of Purim took place on Pesach. Indeed, we sing two songs at the Pesach seder that make reference to Purim (Vayechi bachatzi ha'lailah and va'amartem). As well, we are told by the Magen Avraham, "One should add something to the meal of the second day of Pesach to commemorate Esther's meal, for on that day Haman was hanged" (Introduction to Orach Chaim, 490).

Should Purim be on Pesach? No. But it should be remembered then, and indeed, it is.

Rabbi Weiss is the director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto.

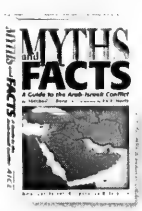
Israel paid dearly in Gulf War

MYTH:

Israel benefited from the Gulf War without paying a price.

FACT:

It is true that Israel benefited from the destruction of Iraq's military capability by the United States-led coalition in 1991, but the cost was enormous. Even before hostilities broke out, Israel had to revise its defence budget to maintain its forces at a heightened state of alert. It kept its air force flying around the clock as a result of Iraqi Scud missile attacks. The war required the defence budget to be increased by more than $500 million (US). Another $100 million (US) boost was needed for civil defence.



The 39 Iraqi Scud missiles that landed in Tel Aviv and Haifa caused extensive damage. Approximately 3,300 apartments and other buildings were hit in the greater Tel Aviv area. Some 1,150 people who were evacuated had to be housed at a dozen hotels, at a cost of $20,000 per night.

Beyond the direct costs of military preparedness and damage to property, the Israeli economy was also hurt by the inability of many Israelis to work under emergency conditions. The economy functioned at no more than 75 percent of normal capacity at the time, resulting in a net loss to the country of $3.2 billion (US) (Near East Report, Feb. 4, 1991).

The biggest cost was in human lives. A total of 74 people died from Scud attacks. Two died in direct hits, four from suffocation in gas masks and the rest from heart attacks (Jerusalem Post, Jan. 17, 1992).

In 1999, a UN committee dealing with reparations claims against Iraq, the United Nations Compensation Commission, approved more than $31 million (US) to be paid to Israeli businesses and individuals. That judgment stemmed from a 1992 Security Council decision calling on Iraq to compensate Gulf War victims (JTA, April 14, 1999).

In 2001, the UN commission awarded $74 million (US) to Israel for the costs it incurred from Iraqi Scud missile attacks during the war. It rejected most of the $1 billion (US) that Israel had requested (JTA, June 21, 2001).

Enthusiasm for genius

Genius: A Mosaic of One Hundred Exemplary Creative Minds*, by Harold Bloom, Warner Books, 2002, $55.00.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Harold Bloom, perhaps the most celebrated of modern American literary critics, is close to indefatigable. His more than 25 books cover an impressive range of subjects. Some of the more familiar titles: The Western Canon, The American Religion, How to Read a Book and Why and Kabbalah and Criticism.

Feisty and outspoken, Bloom is vastly learned and often eccentric in his opinions. One critic has called him the "Zero Mostel" of Yale University's English department. He has long argued in favour of a canon of literature that consists mainly of famous, dead, white authors. This view is opposed by the new wave of critics who are eager to dethrone the old favourites and replace them with lesser known writers – often women or black writers hailing from Asia, Africa and South America.

In Genius, Bloom presents critical and biographical evaluations of 100 "makers and shakers" of the western mind. This figure, he admits, is completely arbitrary. This arbitrariness is also true of the authors he has selected. The essays run to five or six pages each, often with apt quotations from the author's work. Included in Bloom's pantheon of non-living authors are 12 women, no Canadians and four Jews: Franz Kafka, Sigmund Freud, Isaac Babel and Paul Celan. (Michel de Montaigne, who had a Jewish mother, might also be counted.)

Of course, the expected giants are here: William Shakespeare, Virgil, Chaucer, Samuel Johnson, Henrik Ibsen, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Mark Twain, Walt Whitman, Charles Dickens and William Blake. But one is surprised by such names as Walter Pater, Flannery O'Connor, Willa Cather, Iris Murdock, F. Scott Fitzgerald and Garcia Lorca.

What constitutes genius? According to Bloom, this slippery concept includes the ability "to recognize and hallow the God within us, and the gift of breathing life into what is best in every living person."

The following is a typical Bloom utterance – of special Jewish interest: "I do not know what the destiny of the Jewish spirit in the United States will be. The best American-Jewish poet remains Moshe Leib Halpern, who wrote in Yiddish; American English has yet to bring forth a Kafka or a Celan. But Kafka is of the eminence of Proust and Joyce, and Celan shares the greatness of Valéry and Mandelstam, both of whom he translated superbly. Though he is so difficult for the common reader, Celan is an essential poet, and hardly for Jews alone. His severe formalism teaches what poetry is: at once a rejection of barbarism and an assertion (however qualified) of the power of mind over every universe of death, whether natural or Nazi."

Turning to Kabbalah, Bloom divides his catalogue of authors into 10 Sefirot, or divine aspects of God – from Keter and Chochmah to Yesod and Malchut. Ten writers are placed in each category. None of this seems to make much sense and serves largely as an indication of his hermetic knowledge and idiosyncrasy.

In the end, what matters most is Bloom's contagious enthusiasm, his exuberant appreciation of enduring literature. After reading this book, the determined person will set off on his or her own voyage of discovery.

Buy Israel on Passover

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Passover is just weeks away, and as you gear up for the holiday, think about the difference your holiday purchases could make if you support Israel's economy. The Internet is like having an Israeli mall at your fingertips. And even if your local store carries Israeli products, you can use the Internet to send gifts to family in Israel. Today, a Pesach guide to shopping Israel on the Web.

Before shopping on the Web, always take a few precautions. Any page asking for credit card or other private information should be "secure" – that is, it should have a web address that begins with "http://." If you still nervous about ordering on the Internet, try fax, phone or mail. Always note duty and shipping costs and a Web site's privacy and return policies. If you have any doubts, ask for references. And don't be afraid to comparison shop. Many of the products mentioned below are for sale on several different Web sites. Note that I have not had commercial dealings with the sites in this column, so my mention of a site should not be considered an endorsement.

Where to start? There are sites that have scoured the Web to identify Israeli sites that ship abroad. Shop in Israel has links to dozens of sites that sell food, wine, honey and non-edible treats, [http://www.shopinisrael.com/] as does Austin's Shop Israel page. [http://www.israelaustin.com/israelnow/shopisrael.asp] The IsraelShop sells lovely glass, pewter and wood seder plates, and silk and embroidered matzah covers. [http://www.israelshop1.com/passover.html] OnlyIsraeli has beautiful kiddush cups if you (or Elijah) want something new at the seder. [http://www.onlyis raeli.com/]

Do you have friends or family in Israel you would love to surprise with a gift basket? Kosher 4Passover offers mouth-watering packages, from a chocolate-themed assortment (chocolate flakes, chocolate covered walnuts, etc.) to the magnificent "Connoisseurs' Selection," which includes three bottles of superior wine, a decanter, crystal glasses, corkscrew and a tablecloth. [http://kosher4passover.com/shop/israelbaskets/cat8.html] And here's an idea for someone in Israel you don't know. On the DashCham site, you can send a soldier a toiletry kit that includes shampoo, foot cream and a note that you are thinking of them this holiday. [http://www.dashcham.com/idf.html]

If you never have enough Haggadot at your seder or are looking for a new commentary, check out Books International. [http://www.booksinter national.com] You'll find more than 40 different Israeli Haggadot, both Hebrew-only and with translations – from traditional editions with commentary by Rashi to a reproduction used by prisoners in the Gurs Camp, France, in 1941, to a "pop-up" Haggadah based on the famous 14th century German "Birds' Head Haggadah" now in the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. [http://www. jhom.com/topics/birds/haggadah.htm] For something different, another site will sell you original Haggadot published by the Israel Defence Forces. [http://geocities.com/haggadot/armypage.htm]

If you can't stand the idea of cleaning and switching your dishes for Passover, dozens of Israeli hotels and resorts would love to do the work for you. The Totally Jewish Travel lists packages throughout the country including Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Tiberias and Ashkelon. The Orchid Tropical Resort in Eilat, for example, not only boasts round-the-clock Passover kashrut supervision, it also offers an Olympic-sized pool, classes in Judaica and a spa. [http://www.totallyjewishtravel.com/passover_resorts/israel/] Because of economic and security uncertainties, hotels are slashing prices, as you'll see Israel Travel.net. [http://www. israel-travel.net/special.html]

Whether it's a trip or a Kiddush cup, marketing professional Jeff Dunetz says now is the perfect time to fight the boycotts against Israel. [http://www.aish. com/jewishissues/jewishsociety/Buy_Israel.asp] "[Passover] is a holiday that remembers that God took us out of slavery, unifying us as a people and ultimately gave us the Torah. As a people we will sit with our families at the Seder table, just as we did the night before our redemption. We need to continue to act as a people when we leave the Seder table. One way is to help Israel fight this economic war. It is up to us in the Diaspora to make a concerted effort to support the Israeli economy. We must seek out and purchase Israeli made products. BUY ISRAEL."

Israel Mall returns to Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto is hosting its second Israel Mall, a four-day shopping fest, at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) from March 23 to 26.

"The need is so great," said co-organizer Anne Maurer, referring to Israeli businesses that have been hit hard by Palestinian terrorism.

More than 75 Israeli vendors will be present or represented at the event. None of them took part in last August's Israel Mall here, which Maurer said was the most successful of its kind in North America, with an estimated 10,000 shoppers on the first day alone.

People line up to get into the Israel Mall in Toronto last summer.

Maurer, a board member of the Toronto Zionist Council, is working on the project with Izzy Kaplan, owner of Israel's Judaica Centre, and Eli Poch of Poch Parties and Events. The mall is a project of the Toronto Zionist Council and the Israel Now Consortium of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Vendors will be selling food products and giftware for Passover; silver, ceramic and wood Judaica; books; puzzles; sportswear; skin-care products; posters; and architectural glass pieces, among other items.

"We're trying to have things that are exciting and different," said Maurer.

She added that organizers have taken into account the vendors' needs. Vendors will be billeted locally, local volunteer staff will be available to help, and vendors' food will be provided by Rachel's Café at the BJCC. Their only cost will be the flight from Israel, said Maurer.

The Israel Mall will run on Sun., Mar. 23 from 9 a.m. to 10 p.m. and on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday from 11 a.m. until 10 p.m.

To volunteer or help sponsor the mall, call the Israel Mall hotline at 416-631-5851 or e-mail israelmall@sympatico.ca.

Toronto surgeon Ginsberg a cancer treatment innovator

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Thoracic oncologist Robert Ginsberg died earlier this month of cancer. He was 62.

Ginsberg was chief of thoracic surgery at the University Health Network and chair of thoracic surgery at the University of Toronto. He had also served as chief of thoracic surgery and surgeon-in-chief at Mount Sinai hospital.

In the past, he served as professor of surgery at Cornell University Medical College and chief of thoracic service at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York.

Ginsberg developed many innovations in the treatment of lung cancer.

Shaf Keshavjee, professor of surgery at U of T and chief of thoracic surgery at the University Health Network, called Ginsberg "an extraordinary physician and extremely gifted mentor to so many."

Ginsberg was known as a talented and effective teacher of leaders in thoracic surgery in North America, and elsewhere around the world. A student recently praised him as "an inspiration as a surgeon, a teacher and as a man" who made his students "better clinicians, better scientists and better people."

Dr. Robert Ginsberg

Last year, his colleagues organized a symposium and dinner in his honour, which highlighted major advances in thoracic oncology and Ginsberg's contributions to the field. Participants came from four continents, five countries, 21 U.S. states and five Canadian provinces.

The University Health Network and U of T are establishing the Robert Ginsberg Chair in Thoracic Surgery in his memory.

Ginsberg was born in Toronto and educated at U of T's faculty of medicine.

In spite of his many professional obligations, he loved cooking and was said to know "all the best restaurants in all the best cities," according to a media release.

Ginsberg is survived by his wife Charlotte, children Karyn, Jordan and David, brother Stephen, his wife Susan, and his sister Linda Pelt. He was predeceased by his sister Sandra, wife of Joseph Rose.

Sniffer dogs sought to boost defence in Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Mike Freedland is hoping Israel goes to the dogs.

More accurately, Freedland wants Canadians to help provide Israel with a simple, innovative and relatively inexpensive way of bolstering its civilian defence.

The 41-year-old Toronto software salesman is the new Canadian campaign chair of Pups for Peace, a non-profit group that buys, trains and deploys explosive-sniffing dogs throughout the Jewish state.

"It's something many people wouldn't think of, but sniffer dogs are very effective," says Freedland. "Rather than watch terrorist atrocities on television, we now have a practical and easy way to help right here in Canada."

Pups for Peace was founded a year ago, in the wake of the Passover massacre at a hotel in the seaside resort of Netanya, in which a Palestinian suicide bomber murdered 21 people attending a family seder, and injured over 100.

Since then, more than 900 donors in several countries have contributed $1 million (US) to the group. There are currently between 200 and 300 trained sniffer dogs deployed throughout Israel, and the goal is to add 1,000 more in the coming year.

Supporters say the animals aren't intended to stop terrorist attacks, only to save innocent lives.

Freedland says the dogs are deployed in public places, such as crowded markets, bus stops, shops – anywhere a terrorist might strike.

Israel already has bomb-sniffing dogs in military and police units, but as terrorist threats increase, so too does the need for creative approaches to preventing attacks. The idea behind this effort is that strategic deployment of dogs and handlers could prevent some attacks, reduce the extent of others, and ultimately save lives, Freedland explains.

Each dog and handler team costs about $10,000 (US) to deploy, including the purchase price, veterinary care, kennel costs, travel and related expenses. The training period is three months.

The Canadian launch kicked off this month with the Pups for Peace Mitzva Challenge, which calls on individuals, schools, synagogues and companies to raise funds. Any group or individual that raises the amount needed for one dog and handler team will be allowed to name "its" animal and will receive a photo and a copy of the canine's graduation diploma.

The Canadian committee is composed of a core group of eight volunteers to date.

The dogs, limited to certain high-energy breeds, can be purchased in North America. Over the past year, the group has built a 60-dog training facility in the Los Angeles area, and another at an army base in the Golan Heights. The first pilot project graduated 16 dogs from the California facility last October, trained by Israeli handlers.

A Pups for Peace sniffer dog is trained at the Los Angeles facility.

It's all done with the blessing of local police, private security companies and the Israel Defence Forces' canine unit (Oketz), which has co-ordinated dog-buying trips to Europe with Pups for Peace.

Jewish-Protestant relations explored in new book

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A recent two-day conference on anti-Semitism at the University of Toronto focused extensively on the fact that the strongest Christian support for Israel today comes from religious as well as political and economic conservatives, as well as on what has been a complete reversal in the source of anti-Jewish and anti-Zionist sentiment and activity from right-wing nationalists to unions and the anti-globalization movement on the left.

But those of a certain vintage don't need to be reminded that in Canada, the Protestant left failed Israel a long time ago, and continues to do so. In a nice twist, an Israeli historian has now shone a light on a particularly sour epoch in relations between Canada's Jews and Protestants.

In The Holocaust, Israel and Canadian Protestant Churches (McGill-Queen's University Press, 320 pages, $49.95), Haim Genizi, a professor at Bar-Ilan University, paints a dispassionate, almost dry picture of the often painful relations between Jews and the four largest non-Catholic denominations in Canada.

Beginning with the churches' relative silence during the Holocaust and their critical reaction to the creation of Israel, Genizi proceeds to the main course: the bitter quarrel between the Jewish community and the United Church of Canada, the country's largest and most liberal Protestant church, during the late 1960s and early '70s.

Genizi examines the Anglican, Baptist and Presbyterian churches' relations with Jews and Israel, but zeroes in on the controversy that swirled around Rev. A.C. Forrest, editor of the influential United Church Observer, whose relentless and scathing anti-Israel editorials and articles helped stoke a firestorm of protest among officials of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, as well as leading rabbis, professors and other journalists.

Community advocates had hoped all along that Forrest, a good writer but the most vigorous purveyor of anti-Zionist journalism in Canada, was simply expressing his personal opinion. But to the dismay of many Jews, although perhaps not to their surprise, Forrest eventually received the backing of the church's hierarchy.

Genizi shows that the seeds of the conflict between Canadian Jewry and the mainline Protestant churches had been planted before and during World War II, but were nurtured after Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War and the subsequent plight of Palestinian refugees. While imploring Arab countries to recognize Israel and cease their threats to destroy the Jewish state, Forrest was squarely on the Palestinian side, and his shrill anti-Zionism and classically ugly imagery was often a cover for his anti-Semitism (though he denied it). For one thing, he believed that Jews and Zionists controlled the western media, and that this bias justified his stance.

Forrest refused to knuckle under to his Jewish critics, and things came to a head in the early 1970s with the publication in the Observer of an openly hateful article, "How Zionists Manipulate Your News" by an American anti-Semite. Libel lawsuits between the church, the magazine, Forrest and B'nai Brith were duly filed, until cooler heads prevailed and a truce, of sorts, was declared in 1973.

Genizi's meticulous research (he scoured church archives, correspondence, speeches, news clippings and minutes of meetings) reveals the United Church to have been sometimes sympathetic, sometimes disinterested, but usually hostile to Jews and Israel. The explanation, believes the author, applies to other Protestant churches and resides in deep-rooted anti-Jewish Christian teachings. From these teachings spring conflicting feelings of guilt for Christian inaction during the Holocaust, and sympathy for Palestinians, many of whom are fellow Christians.

The United Church, for its part, has come a long way. In 1998, it issued a landmark document that called on members to completely re-examine their relations with Jews, and to stop interpreting Scriptures in a way that could lead to anti-Jewish stereotypes.

However, Genizi's book came out just a few months after statements made last spring by the heads of the United and Anglican churches that blamed Israel unequivocally for the current turmoil and prompted another rupture in Jewish-Christian relations. Perhaps a subsequent printing will address that – until the next tussle.

"I want to reassure people that [for] the products that are currently kosher American products, this decision doesn't affect them at all… there's a whole range of beans available that remain kosher in the U.S., because it's a much larger market."

Regarding consumer feedback, Relyea said, "we've done as much as we can to retain the kosher designation where possible." She downplayed the change, saying "it's a small percentage [of products] that were 'de-koshered.'"

Rabbi Levin said Heinz simply "didn't do their homework very well. Consumers are complaining that there are no baked beans, or that other products that they're accustomed to using aren't available any more."

The move has caused confusion in the Jewish community, he said, and rumours have been circulating that the products are still under COR certification, but packaged without the kosher symbol.

Rabbi Levin said there is no truth to the rumour. "We don't endorse anything without the COR on the label, especially something that sensitive… only products bearing the COR label are acceptable."

He said he is optimistic some Canadian Heinz products may become kosher again soon.

"We've asked Heinz to revisit [the decision]," he said.

Relyea said she is unaware of efforts that might have been made to find alternatives to de-certifying and wouldn't comment on possible future changes.

Meanwhile, COR is asking consumers to continue contacting Heinz to express their concerns.

"Hopefully," said Rabbi Levin, "we can get some of the products back on line."

Reva L'Sheva: setting the stage for a spiritual revolution?

By MEREDITH HERMAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Jews from across the denominational spectrum recently packed the Reverb in downtown Toronto for a special concert by Israeli rock group Reva L'Sheva. Israel's spiritual rock gurus entertained the capacity crowd with hours of their electrifying Hebrew music.

Energized by the group's powerful lyrics and intense rhythms, both teens and adults let loose and felt their spirits soar. The purpose of the concert was not only to entertain, but also to raise money for "The House," a newly renovated storefront venue in midtown Toronto where young adults can gather for meaningful and compelling study, holiday and Shabbat celebration and to carry out a wide range of social action projects. (For more information about "The House," call 416-569-6647 or visit www.checkoutthehouse.com.)

While our community is filled with educational programs for high school students, singles and adults, those between the ages of 17 and 24 seem to be neglected. This is problematic, as it is during these crucial years that serious thought, or the lack thereof, takes place.

Today it seems that most Jewish teens view Judaism as a dated tradition that must be continued for its own sake. Few recognize that for a tradition to be intrinsically and eternally valuable, there must have been something of worth in it at the time it began. In order to re-ignite the lost passion for Judaism, we must delve deep into it and begin to discover the richness that has sustained our people for generations, as well as the many ways in which it is relevant in contemporary society.

While my generation is privileged to have learned from knowledgeable rabbis, teachers and community leaders, we are known for our apathy and ignorance vis-à-vis Jewish practice and belief. I attribute this partially to our having been fed Jewish facts and answers all our lives without ever being challenged to delve into the big questions about the purpose of our existence.

In the words of Richard Niebuhr, "There is nothing more irrelevant than the answer to a question nobody asked." The purpose of "The House" is not to spoon-feed us, but to get students to ask the big questions. Only when an individual asks the question and searches for an answer will it affect the way that individual chooses to lead his or her life.

I find it quite ironic that in such an uncertain and confusing era, we have lost our ability to be perplexed, and the art of asking questions. Countless numbers of my peers are travelling halfway across the world on spiritual quests in attempts to "find themselves." But is it really necessary to travel such great distances to infuse one's life with meaning? Will they find what they are looking for or will they simply return with an awareness of what they are missing? As the Beatles once said, "The farther one travels, the less one really knows."

It seems to me that there is a great need for "The House" among today's creative, energetic and idealistic, yet spiritually bankrupt, young adults. As I have heard nothing but rave reviews from my peers, I am confident that the Reva L'Sheva concert was the perfect start to a spiritual revolution.

Meredith Herman is a Grade 12 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

But so far, the senate has been cool to the idea. "People haven't been stalling it, but they haven't been moving on it," Grafstein said. "The Senate just moves slowly. I'm trying to light a fire."

Grafstein is hoping committee hearings will be scheduled by later this month.

Doing so would be consistent with the pledges adopted last July in Berlin by OSCE members. At the time, the OSCE's Parliamentary Assembly (PA) unanimously urged all member states to condemn anti-Semitism and take concrete measures to oppose it.

Delegates to the OSCE PA's Vienna winter meeting agreed that OSCE states "must play a strong, proactive role in combating anti-Semitism and anti-Semitic violence…We commit ourselves to work within our respective parliaments to promote specific measures to combat anti-Semitism and will remain in touch with our colleagues from other parliaments…We intend to use [the upcoming] annual meeting [in Rotterdam] to demonstrate that the participating states of the OSCE have developed a series of concrete measures to oppose anti-Semitism in all its form and that we are determined to continue this fight."

Centenarian judge honoured in Torah dedication

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For Judge Abraham Lieff, who celebrated his 100th birthday on Mar. 5, Jewish values and his career have long been intertwined.

He believes "with all my heart" in the spiritual side of judgeship, he said at a recent Torah dedication ceremony in his honour at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Sharing his thoughts in a 12-minute speech, Lieff discussed, among other things, the Jewish value of "rachmones," which he said he kept in mind during his career as the first Jewish Ontario Supreme Court judge.

The word rachmones can be translated as compassion, Lieff noted, but its root means "womb, and we are to understand that we treat another human being as if I personally had carried him in my womb. Isn't that more sensitive than saying pity or compassion?"

Drawing another connection between Judaism and the law, Lieff said that Moses "commanded us with the Torah, and that was the charter of rights, and here it is for all mankind."

Babylonian scholars wrote the Torah commentary known as the Talmud Bavli – the "charter of rights for mankind" – in what is now Iraq, "where we lived in peace for 500 years" while the commentary was being written, Lieff added.

The new Torah was presented in a traditional ceremony called a Siyyum HaTorah, which began with a chupah procession up the aisle of Beth Tzedec's sanctuary. The honorees – including judges, synagogue officials, and finally Lieff – each symbolically added a letter to the Torah, fulfilling the mitzvah for every Jew to complete a Torah in his or her lifetime.

Rabbi Avraham Kubayov, the scribe, dipped his quill in glistening black ink , completing individual letters only after each honoree recited a prescribed statement of intent and touched the quill or his hand to fulfil the mitzvah.

Joseph Kerzner, a friend who along with his family donated the Torah in Lieff's honour, noted that the new Torah mantle donated by Wolfe and Millie Goodman was adorned with four crowns, three of which represented the words "Tzedek tzedek tirdof" ("Justice, justice, shall you pursue"), the same words found on the Torah cover.

Other Torah accessories were donated by Lieff family members, and his daughter Lois commissioned a new rendition of Etz Chaim He by Beth Tzedek's Cantor Meir Finkelstein, which was heard for the first time during the siyyum.

Lieff is a remarkable man who dedicated his life to tzedek (justice) and to serving as an exemplar of Judaism, said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec's senior rabbi.

He added that the Torah would be used not just at the synagogue, but at Camp Ramah. "The judge said it's for the 'kinderlach,'" Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said as Lieff nodded in agreement. "I hope that they will be told of your work," the rabbi said. "And I hope there will be some young man or woman at Ramah who will be inspired by your story."

Lieff, the oldest of six brothers and one sister, was born in 1903 in Belarus – the horse-and-buggy age, noted event chair John Pollock, who also said that Lieff pioneered much of what is now known as pre-trial mediation in divorce law and helped establish the family law division of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Following his mandatory retirement from the bench at age 75, Lieff continued to conduct mediation sessions until he stopped working full-time at age 88.

In addition to his legal career, Lieff – who immigrated to Canada with his mother at age one to join his father, a Hebrew teacher, in Ottawa – led the movement in 1948 to establish Ottawa's Agudath Israel Synagogue as the city's first Conservative congregation. He was instrumental in seeing that a Hebrew school was instituted at the synagogue, and also served as a president of Ottawa's Jewish federation.

An active member of Beth Tzedec since moving to Toronto in 1963, Lieff met his late wife Sadie, also a lawyer, at a Canadian Young Judaea weekend. At his Supreme Court swearing-in ceremony, he was the first judge to wear a kippah and to use a Chumash for the ceremony.

U of T professor is retiring after a long satisfying career

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toward the end of his first year as an engineering student at McGill University, Henry Auster made a life-altering decision to specialize in English literature.

"I was slow to catch on," explained Auster, who retires this year as a professor of English literature at the University of Toronto.

"My father, an avid reader himself, was skeptical, but he went along with my change of plans."

Auster switched course because he thought the arts would be infinitely more fulfilling.

"I got the idea that literature could give me more than pleasure or entertainment. It occurred to me that it could engage the feelings, deal with ideas and challenge the mind at least as seriously as science and math, and over a wider range of experience."

After 37 years in the field, at both Harvard and the University of Toronto, he is leaving on a high note, exulting in the knowledge that literature has given him a "constant sense of discovery and intellectual excitement."

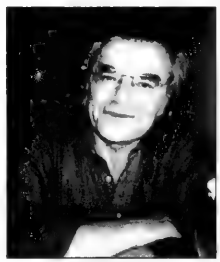
As an academic, Auster has explored a wide variety of topics, from Victorian fiction and the theory of the novel to the history of modern English criticism and Jewish writing in North America.

A member of the Victorian Studies Association of Ontario, he wrote his Harvard PhD thesis on the 19th century British novelist, George Eliot, the pen name of Mary Ann Evans.

"I came to George Eliot rather late, when I read The Mill on the Floss at Harvard," he said. "I was excited by her ideas about realism in fiction."

Auster was also impressed by her "remarkably thoughtful and systematic attention" to the social forces that shaped her fictional characters.

"She has a special feeling for the thin line between fulfillment and disappointment in life," he added. "I agree with the now-common view that she is one of the greatest novelists in English."



Henry Auster

Auster considers Daniel Deronda, which is suffused with Jewish themes, her finest work in parts. Eliot's treatment of Jews in that novel was serious, sustained, well-informed and sympathetic.

Jewish characters also frequent the novels of her contemporaries, Charles Dickens, William Thackeray and Anthony Trollope. "But they don't show anywhere near as thoughtful or sympathetic an interest in Jews or their lives as Eliot," Auster said.

Benjamin Disraeli, in his role as a novelist, took an interest in Jewish matters and in his own Jewish background. But in the final analysis, Auster said, Disraeli was always more interested in Britain's condition, "which, of course, led to his extraordinarily successful career as a politician and statesman."

In his quest to better understand North American Jewish novelists, Auster has focused on, among others, Henry Roth, Philip Roth, Bernard Malamud, Mordecai Richler, Saul Bellow and Cynthia Ozick.

Speaking of this stellar group, he observed: "They consistently engage with Jewish themes at a high intellectual and stylistic level. Their prose is lively, and at their very best, they are fresh, inventive, sophisticated, irreverent and very funny."

In his view, North American Jewish writing as "a distinct, self-conscious cultural phenomenon" is disappearing from the scene. The reason is self-evident: acculturation.

Auster is a fan of the late Nobel Prize laureate Isaac Bashevis Singer. "He is a genius as a storyteller, but his works have to be read in translation by those who don't know Yiddish."

Auster, whose parents arrived in Canada from Poland in 1951, finds that the Holocaust literature he appreciates most takes the form of memoirs and reflections. "I have no doubt that Primo Levi is the most powerful author in this genre."

The best Holocaust novels, he believes, turn on its aftermath. "To succeed artistically with this subject, a writer with talent and commitment needs to find a strategy to make its familiar horrors seem fresh again and moving to readers increasingly remote from them."

Auster admires the Israeli novelist Aharon Appelfeld, a Holocaust survivor. His retrospective and reflective novels "skirt the Shoah in order to approach it from the margins, though in ways that lead the reader back to the centre."

At the moment, Auster is working on a long-neglected task.

"I want to polish up for publication a little project on literary feasting and fasting that I've had on the backburner. It's provoked by an interest in some modern writers who use food in sacramental and festive ways and in some others, especially Jewish ones like Franz Kafka and Philip Roth, who use it as a sign of smothering material excess."

Auster, whose second language is English, was born in in Stanislavov, Poland, in 1938. The town is now in Ukraine and is called Ivano-Frankivsk.

Auster's father, Philip, drove Polish army petrol trucks that supplied tanks in the Allied assault on Berlin. After settling in Montreal, he earned a living as a taxi driver.

Rivkah, his mother, fled to the safety of the Soviet Union, his younger sister Nelly and himself in tow.

Auster's first wife, Ethel, is an academic. Their son, David, is in theatre management in New York. Auster's second wife, Jane Widerman, runs a communications company.

Auster is retiring because of the University of Toronto's mandatory retirement policy. But he can't really complain, he said, because he can look back on a career that engaged him and led to satisfying friendships.

Greater Toronto Area

A conspiracy theory that won't go away

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Bill Keller's article "Is it good for the Jews?" (New York Times, March 8) deserves careful attention.

Keller dealt with the conspiracy theory that the United States is planning to unleash a war on Iraq to benefit Israel. Acknowledging that the idea "has received only fleeting attention in the mainstream discussion," Keller cautioned that, in fact, the notion the United States is doing Israel's bidding "is more persistent and more widely held than you may think."

On NBC's Meet the Press (March 8), host Tim Russert raised the topic with New York Times columnist Tom Friedman. Russert referred to a position paper co-written by U.S. defence advisor Richard Perle in 1996 for then-Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu that advised "removing [Iraqi leader] Saddam Hussein from power."

Russert wondered whether the 1996 report may be a factor provoking the present theory that an "elite" is pushing America toward war. Friedman replied, somewhat obliquely, that this war is indeed being pursued by an "elite of an elite," without naming anyone.

Keller's article fills in the details: The three American defence planners – Perle, Doug Feith and David Wurmser – who prepared the 1996 paper, happen to be Jewish. So is U.S. deputy defence secretary Paul Wolfowitz, who is well known for his hawkish views on Iraq.

Conspiracy theorists play on this coincidental fact, but they ignore the truly salient point that it is U.S. national interests, and not Israeli or Jewish interests, which drive U.S. foreign policy. Bush administration cabinet members Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice, Donald Rumsfeld and Colin Powell, who shape policy but who are not Jewish are typically ignored.

As Keller puts it: "A less conspiracy-minded observer might point out that longstanding Bushite animosity toward Iraq is complex and hardly secret, and the fact that our interests coincide with Israel's does not mean that a Zionist fifth column has hijacked the president's brain. But that would not satisfy the yearning for a simple story" – or a malicious one either.

"No one wants to feed the dangerous idea," says Keller, "that this is, as the jihad propagandists claim, a war of Americans and Zionists against Arabs and Islam."

There is no doubt about it: Israeli polls revealed late last month that a majority of Israelis favour war with Iraq. They do so not because they savour war for its own sake – indeed most Israelis are at the same time apprehensive about war. Israelis favour military action against Iraq because they face the reality that Saddam – who struck the country with 39 Scuds in the 1991 Gulf War, who supports terror and pays families of Palestinian suicide bombers to murder Israeli civilians, and who threatens to strike Israel with non-conventional weapons, including biological and nuclear arms – is a menace that must be eliminated one way or another.

After the trauma of Sept. 11, the United States has its own reasons for wanting to rid the world of Saddam and other state-sponsors of terrorism, both in the Middle East and beyond. Accordingly, a majority of Americans support the war effort for their own reasons.

There is a coincidence, but not a causal connection, between U.S. and Israeli interests. Once again, some cautious, careful thinking would go a long way to restoring some desperately needed clarity to the discussion about Iraq.

Concordia student arrested for making threats

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A pro-Palestinian student activist was charged last week with uttering assault and death threats at Concordia University's downtown campus March 11.

Three Jewish students and a visitor, who were manning a Hillel information table on the mezzanine of the Henry F. Hall Building, testified that Nidal Al Alul told them that in "two days, two weeks or two months," he was going to be recruited by Hamas and "become famous" as a suicide bomber, said Concordia Hillel co-president Noah Sarna.

Al Alul, 19, a commerce student, appeared before municipal court the following day, after spending the night in a police lockup. He is a member of the Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) executive.

Al Alul was released under conditions that included keeping the peace and not communicating with any of the complainants, and with the promise to reappear in municipal court April 7 for a possible trial date.

Sarna was on the scene about five minutes after the alleged threats were made. The four witnesses told him Al Alul had been trying to "bait" one of the Hillel members with personal taunts. Apparently frustrated when he was ignored, Al Alul put his finger in the face of the student and made the remark about Hamas, Sarna said.

The university's security was called and police later picked up Al Alul off campus, according to Sarna's information.

Concordia spokesperson Chris Mota said university security called the police after a complaint was made about the incident. "Security acted upon the complaint as it is required to do, but it was not our decision to go to the police and Concordia did not make the complaint to the police," she said.

"We are not saying anything further while the matter is under police investigation," she said.

"Even if he had not said anything about becoming a suicide bomber, it is implied that when you talk about joining Hamas, a terrorist organization, and becoming famous, it means blowing yourself and civilians up," Sarna said.

Hillel is disturbed that SPHR and Concordia Student Union (CSU) representatives quickly came to the defence of Al Alul. Hillel is calling on the two organizations to condemn Al Alul's remarks.

Sarna said the March 11 incident is "symptomatic of the hostile extremism of the anti-Israel leadership on campus and has to stop."

In other developments, four Hillel members have formed a slate to run for the executive of the CSU in the election March 25-27.

Justin Levine is president of the slate, which calls itself Aspiring Students Promoting Educational Responsibility. Running as vice-presidents are Benjy Levine, Josef Serfaty and Patrick Amar, a past Hillel president.

Justin Levine, a second-year arts and science student, said, "I just want to see some changes around the school and get our voice heard." He could not provide details about his slate's platform.

He did insist that this is a serious bid, despite the fact that the slate's acronym is ASPER. "It's just a coincidence," Levine said. CanWest Global head Israel Asper was the main sponsor of former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's appearance last September at Concordia, which was cancelled when a demonstration turned violent.

There's no doubt ASPER is using satire. The three VP posts are for "establishing a third floor," "public appearances" and "academic awareness."

A total of six slates for the CSU leadership entered their bids by the time nominations closed March 11. Levine said the one calling itself Clean Slate is the most closely identified with the current student government. Its president, Youri Cormier, represents students on the senate and board of governors this year.

Levine said he did not know at this stage if ASPER would form a coalition with other slates to defeat Clean Slate.

Sarna agreed that Clean Slate "seems like the same old clique."

Hillel, he said, is not taking any side officially in the election, because it is abiding by a rule that student clubs must be neutral. Hillel is urging all students to vote. The turnout for CSU elections is usually less than 10 per cent. All of Concordia's close to 29,000 undergraduates are eligible to cast ballots.

The other slates and their presidential candidates are: Evolution, Not Revolution (Natalie Pomerleau); Free Thinkers Parliament (Simon Reader); New Vision (Joseph Burchill); and Renaissance Concordia (Marc St. Martin).

Elections are also being held for the 30 seats on the CSU Council of Representatives. Several Hillel members are in the running, including Sarna, his sister Naomi Sarna and Steven Rosenshein.

The other Hillel co-president Noah Joseph is seeking one of the two student seats on the board of governors.

Temple to share, then buy, church building

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Temple B'nai Tikvah is about to purchase its own home – and at the same time embark on a journey of interfaith co-operation and tolerance that is unprecedented in Calgary.

A plan to buy the Living Spirit United Church won the overwhelming support of temple members in a vote March 2. The church, previously known as Riverview United Church, is housed in a 34,000-square foot-building.

According to an agreement in principle reached with the church, the temple will share the facility with the United Church for three years beginning this July. At the end of that time, the temple will assume full ownership.

"This is such an exciting day in the history of our synagogue," said Temple B'nai Tikvah Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman. "I'm thrilled that our membership is as enthusiastic as I am, as we move, after 24 years, into our first home."

If all goes according to plan, he said, Temple B'nai Tikvah will hold Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services this year in its own building for the first time.

For close to 20 years, Temple rented office space and the auditorium of the Calgary Jewish Centre for Shabbat services, while High Holy Day services were held at other facilities. A third location, the Calgary Jewish Academy, was rented for religious school classes on Sunday mornings.

As Rabbi Voss-Altman describes it, "in the past, the three pillars of a synagogue have been separate – that is, a beit midrash, a house of study; a beit knesset, a house of assembly; and a beit tfillah, a house of worship. From July 2003, those elements will come together as one."

Temple president Adam Singer was equally excited.

"This is a watershed for Temple, for the Calgary Jewish community and for the city of Calgary," he said.

From a purely financial perspective, sharing the building for the first three years gives the temple time to raise the $2.6 million purchase price, and gives Living Spirit United Church time to build a new home to accommodate what is essentially a new congregation, resulting from the amalgamation of three separate United Church congregations.

"This is a win-win all around," said Rev. Gordon Churchill, one of four clergy at Living Spirit United Church. "It is good for the temple because it gives them a permanent home, and it's good for our congregation because it allows us to plan with security for the next step in our future."

But the benefits of the relationship will go far beyond dollars and cents – and its significance is not lost on anyone involved.

"We believe this partnership with the United Church of Canada speaks volumes," Rabbi Voss-Altman said. "After centuries of discrimination against the Jewish people, the United Church stands tall with us as partners.

"Both Living Spirit and Temple B'nai Tikvah are proud to learn about each other, participate in social action together, and to demonstrate to the city of Calgary that religious groups can share space in an atmosphere of respect, tolerance and good feeling."

Rev. Churchill agrees.

"This allows the Jewish congregation and the Christian congregation to make a positive comment to the larger community that religious people of a reasonable mindframe can work and thrive together."

Singer sees the partnership as a way to build bridges and improve the world.

"We are pursing a new kind of Christian-Jewish relationship through action. The symbolism of two faith communities co-habitating – not trying to convert each other, but supporting each other and learning from one another – sends a positive message to the Jewish community and the wider community."

So far, those involved in the negotiations between the two faith communities say they have been conducted in a spirit of tolerance and goodwill, and some potentially difficult issues have been resolved with ease.

For example, it has been agreed that the cross over the front door and the steeple and large cross outside the building will be removed (the steeple was found to be structurally unsound). And when the sanctuary is used as a synagogue, Christian religious symbols will be covered by curtains or tapestries.

"At no time will Temple B'nai Tikvah and Living Spirit hold joint services," Rabbi Voss-Altman said. "Religious services will be entirely separate according to our own calendars."

In resolving various issues, Rev. Churchill said, the clergy has already had "fascinating conversations," exploring the "philosophical building blocks of our world views.

"We view the world differently. It's not bad to be different. We just have to be sensitive to those differences."

He said both sides will have to work hard at "building relationships of understanding that work. But with goodwill and energy, we can do it."

While religious services will be separate, the two congregations hope to co-operate on social action projects, such as the "In From the Cold" program being run by the church.

Under this program, 15 to 20 homeless people are given a place to sleep and access to showers at the church once a week. They are also given supper, breakfast and a bag lunch before they leave. Once the sharing arrangement begins, Rabbi Voss-Altman said temple members will help out with the program and when the three years are up, he expects the temple to continue on its own, which would make it the only synagogue in Calgary to offer this service.

UIA responds to anti-Israel sentiment

Recently, Hershell Ezrin – a public policy expert and chair and CEO of GPC International, a government and public relations consulting firm – was apppointed as a consultant.

"I am deeply honoured to have the opportunity to work with the business and community leaders that have volunteered for the emergency cabinet," he said in a news release. "I am, like all of them, highly committed to meeting the challenge of countering the disturbing trends in anti-Jewish and anti-Israel sentiment that has emerged in Canada over the past two years."

The cabinet was implemented to support existing institutions, not to organize its own programs, said Finkelstein. Funding comes from UJA/Jewish federation campaigns as well as from individual donors across Canada.

The missions program funded a Canada-Israel Committee trip to Israel for members of parliament last January. "It's really to bring people of influence to Israel," said Finkelstein. "It's not something new that we haven't done before. We just need to do a lot more of it."

Campus funding is geared to "strengthening the infrastructure" (staff and programming) of Jewish student organizations, said Finkelstein.

CJC tries to build new relationship with students

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has compiled a resource guide for Jewish university students nationwide to help them foster coalitions and counter rising levels of intolerance on campus.

The 18-page manual, called A Resource for Canadian Campuses, was written because of the surge in anti-Israel and anti-Semitic acts and theories on campus, which has left many Jewish students feeling "isolated and alone," said Brandi Epstein, director of CJC's public affairs department in Ottawa.

The publication says that following such events as 9/11 and the violent protests at Concordia University last September that forced the cancellation of a scheduled talk by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, "all sides have the right to speak and be heard, but no one should be permitted to incite violence or preach racism."

Epstein said the guide will allow CJC to foster a more "substantive relationship" with Jewish students and to raise their awareness of how CJC can help them.

An example of CJC's interaction with students, Epstein said, was when the organization was granted intervener status in the lawsuit launched by Montreal's Hillel against Concordia University and its student union.

Epstein said she hopes the guide will also help build (or rebuild) a climate of trust and mutual tolerance among students, even if they disagree on issues such as the Middle East.

The CJC publication speaks of "the importance of being able to differentiate legitimate criticism of particular Israeli policies from slanderous attacks on the State of Israel or the Jewish people.

"It is fair and important to consider Israeli government policies and make judgments accordingly, but it is not fair and is in fact anti-Semitic if the intent or the effect is to deny the Jewish people its right to sovereignty in its ancestral homeland," the guide says.

"Similarly, there is a difference between fair speech and hate speech."

Epstein said Jewish students have felt "overwhelmed" and uncertain about which Jewish organization to approach for support or advice.

Copies of the guide, which CJC compiled with Jewish student groups such as Hillel, have been sent off to CJC's regional offices, with 300 additional copies to be distributed at campuses across Canada.

The core of the manual, Epstein said, is a "tool and tips" chapter, which advises students to "use" CJC by getting to know its staff people and by asking the organization for help.

CJC can help Jewish students and groups "recognize and combat anti-Semitism, build interfaith and cross-cultural dialogue and coalition-building; monitor and assist with responses to campus media, [and] bring people together to counter anti-Semitism or bias from staff or students," the guide states.

Among the ideas included in the guide are to start a lecture series, become active in campus political affairs, establish a "diversity committee" with other campus organizations and host discussion groups.

Other ideas are monitoring the media, staging rallies and writing letters to the editor.

The guide also includes lists of CJC resources, campus groups and leaders, Jewish federations, online resources and other Jewish organizations and Web sites that could be of practical use. Although Israel is mentioned several times, Epstein said it is not the manual's primary focus.

She said it is more about anti-Semitism, legal rights and protections, responding to media bias and building coalitions.

"It's about learning to anticipate things before they arise and being pro-active," she said.

Y applauded for staying closed on Shabbat

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Community leaders and rabbis applauded the YM-YWHA for deciding to maintain its current policy of closing on Shabbat.

"I, together with the entire rabbinate, applaud the decision of the Y. It's in the best interest of the Y and of the Jewish community," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, on behalf of the interdenominational Montreal Board of Rabbis.

"I hope this process has laid to rest an issue that has been the source of unnecessary divisiveness."

In an advertisement in The CJN last week, the Y announced that, after consulting widely with the community, its board of directors has endorsed the Shabbat policy review committee's recommendation to make no change to the current practice.

The committee was struck last May, "at the urging of some of [the Y's] members," and followed the multimillion-dollar renovations the Y has undergone in recent years.

"Notwithstanding the minority who might have wished to avoid discussing the issues, the review was conducted and completed in a manner of which we can all be proud," the ad stated.

Rabbi Poupko, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, said he would like to see greater co-operation between the rabbinate and the Y to "strengthen its Jewish character."

Now that the Y has "demonstrated its sensitivity" to the community's concerns, he said, the rabbinate and synagogues should do what they can to help the Y, including encourage their congregations to become Y members.

Joseph Gabay, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) president, said the Y has made "a very wise decision" and he commended it "for opening up the debate to the whole Jewish community."

Gabay disagreed that the decision represents a victory for the more observant elements in the community.

"Keeping the status quo is good for the integrity and integrality of the entire community. It's also important for the public face of the community."

Put some sparkle in your baked apples

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

When kids like baked apples, you know you're catching a break, because not only can baked apples be served warm for dessert, they can be eaten cold for a quick and easy breakfast. In many ways, depending on the recipe, they are just as good for them as cereal and milk.

Baked apples can also be made pareve, and all of these recipes can be adapted for Passover. Just substitute Passover cookies where a recipe calls for regular cookies, and make cashew butter to replace the peanut butter in the peanut-butter-filled baked apple.

Make sure to score (make an X at the bottom of) the apples before you bake. Don't cut all the way through to the scooped section. This scoring will prevent the skin that remains on the apple from splitting by allowing some of the steam that comes from the baking process to escape.

ALMOND COOKIE APPLES (pareve)

You can substitute pears for the apples and crushed gingersnaps for the almond cookies.

6 baking apples
2 tbsp. of honey
1 cup of crushed almond cookies
½ cup orange juice
½ cup water

Preheat oven to 375. Core apples from the top without cutting to the bottom. Place the apples in baking dish. Combine honey and crushed cookies. Stuff the mixture into the cored apples. In another bowl, combine the orange juice with the water and pour the mixture over the apples. Bake for approximately 40 minutes or until apples are soft. You can serve the baked apples with ice cream, a spoonful of vanilla yogurt or sweetened whipped cream. Serves 6.

MAPLE BAKED APPLES WITH DRIED FRUIT AND NUTS
(pareve or dairy)

This is a simple, delicious dessert that also makes a warm and special brunch dish or breakfast.

⅓ cup firmly packed dark brown sugar
3 tbsp. roughly chopped dried cherries
3 tbsp. chopped dried figs
2 tbsp. roughly chopped sliced toasted almonds
2 tbsp. roughly chopped toasted pecans
6 large, firm baking apples, such as Cortlands, cored but not peeled
3 tbsp. margarine or butter, cut into 6 pieces
½ cup apple cider
2 tbsp. maple syrup

Preheat oven to 400. In a small bowl, mix together the brown sugar, dried fruit, and nuts. Place the apples in a baking pan or casserole dish and stuff their cavities with the fruit and nut mixture. Place a piece of butter on top of the stuffing. Pour the apple cider and maple syrup into the bottom of the baking pan and bake the apples, basting every 5 to 7 minutes, until they are tender, and bake for 25 to 35 minutes. When the apples are tender, transfer them to a serving platter and cover with foil to keep warm. Pour the pan juices into a small saucepan and bring to a boil over high heat. Simmer the mixture until it becomes syrupy and reduces to a sauce, about 10 minutes. Serve over the apples. Makes 6 servings.

BAKED APPLES
(dairy or pareve)

This easy-to-prepare recipe makes a great treat for kids or adults.

6 baking apples
½ cup peanut butter
1 tbsp. butter or margarine
¼ cup raisins
¼ cup miniature kosher marshmallows

Preheat oven to 350. Grease the bottom of a large baking dish. Core each apple, making sure not to cut out the bottom. In a mixing bowl, combine peanut butter, butter or margarine, raisins and miniature marshmallows together in a mixing bowl. Stuff each apple with equal portions of the peanut butter mixture. Place all the stuffed apples in the prepared baking dish. Bake the apples for 30 minutes or until brown and bubbly on top. Remove, cool and serve. Makes 6 servings.

PEACHY BAKED APPLES

6 apples
¼ cup peach preserves
¼ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup apple cider or apple juice
¼ cup crumbled chewy oatmeal cookies

Preheat oven to 350. Cut apples in half and core. Place in 13 x 9 x 2-inch baking pan, cut side up. Combine preserves, cinnamon and apple juice or cider. Drizzle over cut sides of apples. Cover pan tightly with foil. Bake for about 35 minutes or until apples are just tender. Sprinkle crumbled cookies over cut surface of apples and drizzle with preserves mixture in bottom of pan. Bake 5 minutes longer, uncovered. Serve warm or cold with whipped topping, whipped cream, ice cream or frozen vanilla yogurt, if desired. Makes 6 servings.

BAKED APPLES WITH CHEESE TOPPING
(dairy)

4 small apples, cored
¼ cup chopped dates
¼ cup water
2 oz. cream cheese
½ tsp. vanilla
3 to 4 tsp. skim milk
Ground nutmeg or ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Cut off strips of peel from the top of each apple until its peeled approximately ¼ of the way down the apple. Arrange apples in a 9-inch pie plate. Fill apples with dates. Add water to pie plate. Bake, covered for 40 minutes or till apples are tender. Cool slightly. Meanwhile, for topping, in a small bowl combine the cream cheese, and vanilla. Stir in enough skim milk to make of thick frosting like consistency. To serve, dollop apples with some of the topping and then sprinkle the top of the sauce lightly with nutmeg or cinnamon.

Microwave directions: Prepare as above, except arrange apples in a microwave-safe 9-inch pie plate. Add water to pie plate. Cover with vented clear plastic wrap. Microwave on full power/high for 3 to 7 minutes, turning the plate once. Makes 4 servings.

Ready to rid the chametz

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Now that Purim is over, our thoughts turn to Passover. We have exactly one month to rid our homes of chametz: bread, bread crumbs, crackers, pasta, most breakfast cereals, etc. Although not required by Jewish law, many people give their homes a thorough spring cleaning while they're at it, and it's a hectic time.

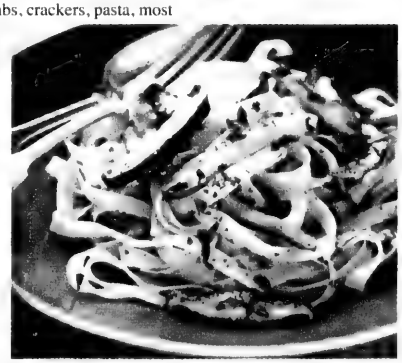
Now's the time to use up or "get rid of" that half package of oatmeal lurking in the pantry, the breakfast cereal that no one will touch, and the stale crackers and instant couscous.

Barley, oatmeal, or most other grains can be stirred into soups for added nourishment and for thickening. Use your pasta for cold salads as well as the usual spaghetti and cheese or meatballs. It doesn't matter if there are different types of noodles in one tuna casserole; use up all those half-packages (or am I the only one who has such things…)

Use any kind of crackers or even salty snack foods in place of breading for chicken schnitzel or fish fillets (use your judgment regarding saltiness). Toast those odd pieces of bread, rolls and pita and no one will know that they were from the freezer.

We feel conscientious when we use up, rather than throw out, don't we? Here is one recipe to help. Happy scrubbing!

This noodle dish can be a side dish alongside roast chicken or goulash. It could also be a main course with the addition of cottage cheese: stir it in at the last minute of cooking, until heated through.



SIMPLY DELICIOUS SIMPLE NOODLES

Quick, easy and pleasing.

2 medium onions, peeled
1 tsp. oil
1½ lb. canned mushroom pieces, well-drained
½ lb. thin noodles salt, pepper to taste
paprika
½ lb. cottage cheese

Chop onions finely. Heat oil in a medium-sized skillet.

Stir-fry onions until golden brown. Add mushrooms and continue to stir-fry for a few minutes.

Add noodles and stir-fry carefully for 2-3 minutes. Add water to cover and salt and pepper to taste. Lower heat, cover and simmer for approximately 8-10 minutes or until noodles are cooked through. Check water level periodically.

Sprinkle with paprika and serve immediately. 8 side dish servings or 4 main course servings.

Senior donates books to help Jewish day school

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Lew Sherman, 88, the driving force behind a successful online bookselling business, has donated books worth more than $15,000 to a book sale sponsored by Kehila Jewish Community Day School.

Among the books he has donated are 150 out-of-print collectibles to be sold at silent auction. They include Everybody's Boswell, published in 1930, featuring illustrations by E.H. Shepherd, who is famous for his images of Winnie the Pooh; The Sorcerer's Apprentice, published in 1948; Wise Encyclopedia of Cookery, published in 1946; and Cathedral Cities, published in 1911.

Lew Sherman

About 1,000 books will be for sale March 23, 10:30 a.m. to 4 p.m., at the Burlington Art Centre, 1333 Lakeshore Rd., Burlington. All proceeds of the sale will be used to support students on bursaries at the Kehila Jewish Community Day School.

Sherman has turned a passion for reading into a lifelong venture. In a recent interview, he reflected on how long he has been collecting books.

"Eighty years," he said, with a twinkle in his eye.

He now runs Lewis Sherman Books and Art out of his home in Burlington, with an entourage of assistants, including a librarian and two secretaries. The ongoing demand for books is constant, requiring him to stock more than 8,000 books of all kinds, from out-of-print collectibles to current fiction and non-fiction.

He has collected "seriously" for about 50 years, initially buying books by authors he enjoyed, such as Graham Greene, Edna St.Vincent Millay and Gertrude Stein. He never considered buying books as an investment, he said; it was the love of reading that spurred him on.

When Sherman retired as co-owner of Allan Candy in 1986, he devoted more time to collecting books. He and his wife Ruth, who died in 2001, travelled all over the world, buying books at auctions and book fairs. They occasionally bought duplicates and triplicates because, since they had so many books, it was difficult to keep track of the ones they already owned.

Ruth's experience as a librarian at McMaster University provided her with the skill to catalogue the 8,500 books they eventually collected. She produced 17,000 cards for cross-referencing.

Buying a computer was a saving grace, although there was still a significant amount of work to be done. Ruth needed to download information on 8,500 books.

Now Sherman has five computers, and customers worldwide, from the United Kingdom to Tokyo. The number of books in his collection remains at about 8,000, because he buys as many as he sells.

The son of Russian immigrants, Sherman was born in the United States. He grew up in a "family of readers." Later he and his wife Ruth, to whom he was married for 65 years, instilled the value of reading in their five children.

Sherman has supported numerous Jewish institutions in Hamilton. His financial contribution was integral to the establishment of Kehila Community Day School. He established the Ruth Sherman Centre of Shalom Village, the local seniors' nursing home and residence, and he has donated funds for the purchase of two ambulances for Israel.

Hearing loss usually a gradual process

By MARILYN J. PIKE
Special to The CJN

Statistics provided by Health and Welfare Canada indicate that 50 per cent of Canadians 60 years and older have a significant degree of hearing loss. By age 80 the statistic is almost 100 per cent. Yet less than 30 per cent of people who could benefit from a hearing aid ever get one.

When is the best time to start thinking about hearing? By the time you reach age 60, it is a good idea to have a hearing test as part of a routine physical examination. If you also have difficulty answering questions or following a conversation without repetitions, then it may be appropriate to ask if your family notices that you are having difficulty hearing.

Since hearing loss related to aging comes on very gradually over a number of years, most people are not aware of their difficulties and attribute them to the way other people talk. Often they will wait until they are well into their 80s to try a hearing aid. But by then, it may be too late for optimal intervention.

Since we need to hear to communicate with others and stay in the mainstream, it is important that hearing aids be considered sooner rather than later. Adults between 50 and 65 who are still in the workforce are often much more motivated to consider hearing aids, because hearing loss can affect job performance and livelihood.

Hearing aids restore sounds and speech to more normal levels; as a result, it can take people time to adjust. Using a hearing aid effectively can be an exercise in retraining the brain as well as the ear, so the sooner one gets started the better the outcome.

In the last five years, hearing aids have become so sophisticated that even a very basic model can provide a measure of benefit and satisfaction for people with mild, moderate or severe hearing loss. If a hearing test indicates that you have a hearing loss, you will see an audiologist for a hearing aid evaluation to discuss your communication needs and the benefits that can be expected from a hearing aid.

Marilyn Pike is director of audiology at Hearing Solutions, a company that provides hearing health-care services in Toronto.

An Urgent Campus Facility Takes Shape

CHALLENGE:
Anti-Semitism, anti-Israel rhetoric combine

Sometimes, swastikas are crudely scrawled in hallways. Sometimes, bathroom walls are defaced with anti-Jewish slurs. Often, campus newspaper articles decry Israel as a brutal oppressor. And most recently, a Jewish student at York University has alleged an assault at the hands of protesters denouncing war with Iraq. These are just a few of the incidents that have left their mark on Jewish students at Toronto universities this year.

Since the eruption of the Palestinian campaign of violence against Israel in September 2000, reports of vandalism and graffiti on university campuses have escalated. "One particular elevator had to be painted every two weeks for months," says Shayna Allen, Director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University. At Ryerson, students were chilled to see their sukkah sprayed with the words "How many more children are you going to kill?" An investigation into the incident by campus police led nowhere.

As troubling as these incidents are, those occurring inside the classroom can be even more challenging for students. "A handful of professors and teaching assistants have dropped offhand derogatory comments," says Lisa Isen Baumel, Allen's counterpart at the University of Toronto. "Students are very sensitive to it now."

Inside and outside the lecture halls, Jewish students are often placed in the awkward position of confronting their teachers, while others shy away for fear it will impact their grades.

The unease Toronto's Jewish students are experiencing on campus is symptomatic of a larger ill that is pervading academic institutions across North America. Hating Israel has become acceptable, as sympathy for the Palestinian cause gains momentum. And, although some pro-Palestinian academics have protested that criticism of Israel is too readily labelled anti-Semitism, the two are often difficult to distinguish.

"Unfortunately, Jewish students now find themselves in a difficult position on campus. The new Wolfond Centre will help them to stand up for Israel now and later in life."

— Zac Kaye, Executive Director at Hillel of Greater Toronto

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow

AN IMPORTANT SOLUTION

Wolfond Centre at University of Toronto to open this fall

UJA Federation

What began as a dream is becoming, in the most literal sense, a concrete reality. With its foundation walls completed and ground floor fully framed, the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, a prized project of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, is emerging as a visible structure at the heart of the University of Toronto. As this remarkable building takes shape, so too does a strong solution to the challenges facing Jewish students today.

At a time when anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment is rising on campuses across North America, the Wolfond Centre will provide an educational, nurturing and supportive environment. Here the university's 4,500 Jewish students and faculty will be gathering to learn the latest Israel advocacy techniques at Canada's first-ever Israel Advocacy Centre on campus.

The Israel Advocacy Centre, a major Wolfond initiative, will provide students with multimedia material, allowing them to educate themselves on all aspects of Israel's culture, history and politics. The video library will contain instructional advocacy films. The media centre will be an informational hub for Jewish and Israeli communications, serving as a platform for workshops and seminars. The training and support provided by the centre will give students the confidence to not only defend Israel's interests, but also take a proactive stance on her behalf. Professionals at the Wolfond Centre will, in addition, track anti-Semitic incidents and keep students up to date on the latest trends confronting their counterparts around the world.

"Unfortunately, Jewish students now find themselves in a difficult position on campus," says Zac Kaye, Executive Director at Hillel of Greater Toronto, a UJA Federation-supported agency. "The new Wolfond Centre will help them to stand up for Israel now and later in life."

As the new 10,000 square foot building emerges at the northwest corner of Harbord and Huron Streets, its impact on the campus community is noticeable. "The structure itself is becoming something powerful to the students," says Kaye.

Construction began in late October, 2002. Despite unforeseen technical challenges and uncommonly bitter winter weather, Project Manager Jack Chisvin, a retired consulting engineer and past-president of UJA Federation, expects the building to be fully completed by mid-September, 2003.

"It's a wonderful, complicated little building that will make an environmental and physical statement. I can't over-emphasize its importance."

Masterfully designed by Toronto architect Susan Friedrich, the new facility will feature a fireside lounge, professional offices, a large multipurpose room, a library, and a spiritual centre. It's a lofty step up from Hillel's current quarters, a cramped basement lounge with two small offices.

The Wolfond Centre has come to life through generous donations and the dedication of volunteers. Still, additional help is needed. "The community understands the critical importance of this project," says Agi Mandel, Chair of Fundraising. "The Wolfond Centre has come a long way, but we have a lot more to do." A new committee of University of Toronto alumni, co-chaired by Dr. Howard Price, Zack Fuerstenberg and Jessica Pelt, is preparing to launch additional fundraising efforts geared to fellow Jewish graduates.

To find out how you can help build this urgently needed facility for Jewish students, please contact Hillel of Greater Toronto at (416) 785-1465.

CHALLENGE:
Standing up for Israel

The Palestinian wave of violence against Israel. Accusations of racism against Jews in Durban. Fierce anti-Israel demonstrations at Montreal's Concordia University. Events that have rocked the Jewish world — making Israel advocacy and a student centre to teach advocacy techniques more urgent.

At universities across North America, student groups and even respected academics continue to vilify Israel inside and outside the classroom. Support for the Palestinian cause has become increasingly vocal and, in some cases, more violent.

At the University of Toronto, York University and Ryerson University, many Jewish students have found themselves struggling to make sense of the issues and to speak out on Israel's behalf. Student participation in lunch-and-learns, lectures, retreats and other Hillel programs designed to promote Israel education and advocacy strategies has increased on all three campuses.

Jewish students are also sharing the messages they learn with the general campus community. They are deliberately foregoing demonstrations and rhetoric in favour of showcasing the positive aspects of Israeli life and culture. "People often have a view of Israel that's incorrect. It's our duty to correct it," explains Adam Cutler, Hillel's Student Coordinating Committee Chair at U of T.

As Israel continues to face its gravest challenges, Jewish students are refusing to stand idly by. Instead, they are seeking new ways of taking bold steps to stand up for Israel.

Jewish students protest NDP panel on Israel at UBC

By ARIEL ZELLMAN
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — More than 100 members of University of British Columbia's Jewish community attended the university's NDP club's forum, "Beyond the Headlines: Palestine/Israel" last week to demonstrate against a panel of outspoken critics of Israel.

The event was billed as a chance to get "beyond propaganda" to examine the causes of the current intifadah. The speakers were Khaled Barakat of the Palestine Solidarity Group, Gabor Maté of Jews for a Just Peace, Vancouver East NDP MP Libby Davies, and Burnaby-Douglas NDP MP Svend Robinson.

As a form of non-verbal opposition, the group of 100 Jews held up signs that said "I disagree" when a speaker made a contentious statement about Israel.

Robinson said the best way to oppose the "fundamentally illegal" Israeli occupation is to "go to a checkpoint, go to an Israeli soldier, and say that this is not your land."

Svend Robinson

The three other speakers echoed Robinson's view.

Maté said that while most Israelis are willing to leave the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the country's leadership "has decided that the pre-1967 borders are not enough [and that] they have a right, or even a duty, to colonize and take over what remains of former Palestine."

Davies spoke about her recent visit to the West Bank and Gaza Strip that was sponsored by Palestine House in Mississauga.

Barakat said no Israeli government has ever recognized a single path to peace other than "ethnically cleansing its Palestinian population."

Libby Davies

After Barakat spoke, some audience members yelled out, but no violence occurred.

Later, during a question and answer session, all the speakers said Israel's need for security against terrorism had nothing to do with its implementation of checkpoints.

Vancouver Hillel executive director Eyal Lichtman said he was upset with the lack of balance on the panel and felt it did not serve the students' interests.

"They had over one hour to speak, utilizing anti-Israel rhetoric, while we got approximately four questions. So we got four minutes in comparison to about an hour-and-a-half of anti-Israel rhetoric."

Naomi Frankenberg of the Vancouver Israel Action Committee said the speakers neglected to mention that the West Bank and Gaza Strip were defined under international law as disputed, not occupied, territories and that the Palestinians under leader Yasser Arafat refused a "very generous offer" for peace and statehood by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak.

Arash Ben Shaul, president of the UBC Israel Advocacy Committee, said he was highly disappointed by the "blatant partisanship" of the speakers and that "their lack of understanding of the fundamentals of history" were very misleading for an uninformed audience.

In response to Robinson's remarks, former Vancouver NDP MLA Bernie Simpson said, "I'm very disappointed in the NDP federally with how it has evolved, but I do not feel that Robinson has correctly stated the policy of the NDP in regards to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. I don't think it [NDP foreign policy] is as pro-Palestinian as he has stated it."

Muslim speaker discusses dangers of Islamic fundamentalism

By LEORA ISRAEL
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — At a time when Jews and Americans are being blamed for the situation in the Middle East, a voice from the Muslim community has a different opinion.

Fazil Mihlar, deputy editorial page editor of the Vancouver Sun, came to speak at the University of British Columbia as part of the Israel Advocacy Committee of UBC's Israel week on March 5.

In a talk to a small group of students on Stemming the Tide of Islamic Fundamentalism, Mihlar, who is a Sunni Muslim, argued that Islamic fundamentalism is a problem and outlined its source and the ways it can be eradicated.

Fazil Mihlar

Islamic fundamentalists, he said, represent only a small segment of the Muslim community and they have misrepresented and distorted Mohammed's true message.

They have created a "World Wide Web of terror," and they not only hate Americans, Christians and Jews, they also hate anybody who practises Islam differently from themselves, Mihlar said.

The source of this extremism, which "refrains from teaching critical thinking skills," comes from 18th-century Saudi Arabia. He said this version of Islam is called Wahabism, whose adherents spread their version of Islam through their vast oil wealth.

In Arab schools, a large portion of the curriculum is geared toward indoctrination, Mihlar said.

"Indoctrination is what passes for education in many Arab countries. That means kids get biased ideas without having the ability to express any skepticism or raise any questions. This kind of education is dangerous for not only them, but to us."

Mihlar disagreed with the notion that Arab poverty and western wealth are to blame for Islamic terrorism, citing studies that have found perpetrators of these terrorist attacks to be better educated and wealthier than most Arabs.

"For all those who still think that it is poverty and American foreign policy which is causing all of this terror, I have a simple question," Mihlar said. "Americans have intervened in Latin and South America. Income inequality and poverty is a much bigger problem there than in the Middle East. How come you don't see South and Latin Americans wanting to bomb the hell out of us?"

Contrary to popular belief, Mihlar said, it is not the West's fault that many in the Middle East are poor. The blame lies with those who are in power who "siphon off funds for their ostentatious living and build massive mosques rather than putting money into productive enterprises," he said.

The underlying problem in Arab countries, he argued, is that they lack political and economic freedom, modern education systems and women's rights.

On the latter point, Mihlar said, "When you have 50 percent of your population not being put to productive use, it is a problem."

Regarding the encouragement of violence by Arab leaders, Mihlar said, "We in the West should stop rationalizing this kind of barbaric behaviour. This is not the way to settle political differences.

"The short-term solution to this is simply a military one. We have to get to them before they get to us. The long-term solution is education and democratic reform, but military war will be for naught if we don't do something about the Arab education system, religious teachings and archaic political and economic structures."

Mihlar said reform in the Arab world will take time. "The West will have to take this on as a project. It's a massive project, this whole idea, changing people's minds about how they should look at the world. It sounds really daunting, but you have to reach for the moon."

Anti-Semitism report: Muslims carried out most attacks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry's annual report into anti-Semitic incidents around the world, published Sunday in Jerusalem, claims that most of the reported attacks on Jews and Jewish interests were carried out by Islamic elements.

The report says the most severe was the attack by the Al-Qaeda organization on the ancient synagogue in Djerba, Tunisia, in April last year. Twenty people were killed, among them German tourists and local citizens.

The report's authors also found that there was a marked rise in the number of anti-Semitic incidents in April and May, at the height of the IDF's Defensive Shield operation in the West Bank. This led to the conclusion that "in many instances criticism of Israel turned into unbridled attacks against Zionism and the Zionists, and implicitly against the Jews."

Prepared by the Co-ordination Forum for the Struggle Against Anti-Semitism, the report reaches three main conclusions from its analysis of anti-Semitic incidents during 2002: "that world jihad has set the Jewish world as its preferred target for terrorist attacks; anti-Semitic propaganda in the Arab world has become more extreme, frequently making use of classic anti-Semitic symbols; [and] the radical left and the radical right grant unqualified support to the Palestinian cause in its conflict with Israel."

In Europe, the document listed an increased number of reported incidents of anti-Semitism, and noted that France "stood out as the country in which the greatest number and most serious incidents occurred in comparison with other countries in the world."

In North America, the report said there was a "highly visible exacerbation of anti-Semitic and anti-Israel rhetoric," culminating in a call on academic institutions to divest from companies trading with Israel.

Violence, death mark weekend in Gaza

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Five Kassam rockets were fired from Gaza at Sderot and other towns in the Negev Monday afternoon, several hours after seven Palestinians were killed, among them a four-year-old girl, when 30 Israel Defence Forces (IDF) tanks and armoured vehicles supported by Apache attack helicopters, raided the Nusseirat refugee camp in the Gaza Strip.

One of the rockets hit a bus in Sderot, but there were no injuries.

In a separate IDF operation in Gaza, Palestinians reported that two residents of Beit Lahiya were killed as hundreds were rounded up for questioning.

Later on Monday, two activists from the military wing of Palestinian Authority (PA) president Yasser Arafat's mainstream Fatah movement were killed in an explosion in a warehouse east of the West Bank city of Tulkarm. Three others were also injured in the blast.

In Nusseirat, Palestinian sources said a four-year-old girl, Hanan Assar, two teenagers and at least two gunmen were among the dead, and that three of the wounded were in critical condition.

There were no reports of Israeli deaths and the IDF had no immediate comment.

Mohammed Saafen, 34, a camp leader of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a militant group affiliated with Fatah, was killed inside his home, which the forces later blew up, officials and witnesses said.

In the West Bank town of Jenin, troops backed by some 20 armoured vehicles conducted house-to-house searches for militants, residents and officials said. Gun battles erupted in the town's eastern neighbourhood, a stronghold for militants. No casualties were reported. Israel Radio reported that IDF troops arrested four wanted Islamic Jihad activists in the city.

The killing of an American peace protester, Rachel Corey, 23, from Olympia, Washington, on Sunday by an IDF bulldozer, was a "regrettable accident," an IDF spokesperson said.

Corey was killed when she ran in front of the bulldozer to try to prevent it from destroying a house in the Rafah refugee camp in the Gaza Strip.

This Passover, Remember the Modern Day Exodus
Pursuing Justice for Jews from Arab Countries

900,000 Jews were driven from their homes in Arab countries since the 1940s – many more than the number of Arabs who left Israel. This massive exodus abruptly ended 2,000 years of vibrant Jewish life in North Africa and the Muslim Middle East. As we approach Passover, we call on Rabbis and synagogue leaders to join the World Jewish Congress' international campaign and take this opportunity to include this important and overlooked chapter in Jewish history in their Shabbat sermons.

The story of the Jewish refugees from Arab countries must be told not only to restore them to history but to restore a sense of justice to the debate over the Middle East.

Extremist Muslim group spreads to Holland

By RACHEL LEVY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

AMSTERDAM — An anti-Semitic Belgian Muslim organization is spreading its influence in Holland, where it plans to run in local elections.

The Arab European League was established in Belgium in 2000 to "strengthen Arab and Muslim identity" and fight perceived discrimination against Arabs and Muslims.

Earlier this month, the league opened a branch in Holland. At the end of a week of lectures by the league's extremist leader, the Lebanese-born Dyab Abu Jahja, the league said it had signed up some 600 members in Holland and plans to run as a political party in local elections scheduled for 2006.

Abu Jahja, 31, aroused the suspicions of Belgium's government last year with his extremist remarks. Apart from advocating Arab rights and demanding that Arabic be recognized as an official Belgian language, the former Hezbollah fighter incited Moroccan immigrants to riot against local Belgians and Jews.

He also calls for the destruction of Israel and the end of what he calls the "Israeli-American imperialist world domination of the last 50 years."

Both Holland and Belgium have large Muslim immigrant populations, predominantly of Berber Moroccan descent. Some 1,000 people in Belgium have joined the league, officials claim.

The establishment of the Dutch wing of the Arab European League attracted broad attention among Holland's Moroccan community, as well as from society at large.

For more a week, Abu Jahja lectured at universities, community centres and debating halls around the country. His tour aroused heated debate from the beginning.

In a newspaper interview in the prestigious daily newspaper NRC Handelsblad, one of the league's board members, Naima Elmaslouhi, 23, expressed sympathy for slogans such as "Hamas, Hamas, put the Jews in the gas."

The slogan has been used regularly in recent years by Moroccan youths during riots and pro-Palestinian or anti-American demonstrations in Holland.

"Such expressions are not effective, but I cannot denounce them," Elmaslouhi said. Other board members expressed their wish that "Americans return in plastic bags from Iraq."

Abu Jahja refrained from commenting on such statements. During lectures, however, he sought to denigrate Zionism as racism, rejected the Jews' right to political independence and openly called for the "dismantling" of Israel.

On March 7, CIJO – the youth department of the Center for Information and Documentation Israel, the Dutch equivalent of the Anti-Defamation League – organized a demonstration against Abu Jahja.

About 150 Jews came to the University of Amsterdam, where he was to lecture.

"We came to protest against Abu Jahja and to try to talk to the AEL-sympathizers," said Irith Markens, 23, a psychology student and CIJO board member. "Unfortunately, we received very little willingness to talk from our opponents. They continued to call for the destruction of Israel and the establishment of one state of Palestine."

Markens said she had received at least 200 e-mails from Jews and non-Jews who couldn't come to the protest but wanted to express their support.

Abu Jahja refused to meet with the Jewish group, saying he doesn't talk to Zionists.

Inside the auditorium, when several Jewish youths tried to ask questions after his lecture, Abu Jahja refused to answer them, stating that Zionism was racism and that he would not answer Zionists.

"I think it's important not to ignore the AEL, but I think it poses a greater danger in Belgium and, once it is has been established over there, in France," Markens said. "They have larger and more violent Muslim communities than in the Netherlands."

CIJO, meanwhile, is making an effort to establish good relations with more moderate Muslim groups, meeting in Jewish or Muslim venues or restaurants.

"We talk about things like religion, but also regular things that are important to youths," Markens said.

"Ultimately, I think Jews have more in common with Muslims than with Christians. So we will do all we can to consolidate our contacts with them, and hope that not the AEL but the Muslim organizations we know and befriend are indeed the mainstream Muslim community."

Career of 'Canadian' Israeli actress takes off

"Two years ago, when I was 19 years old, I was at the Jerusalem Film Festival," she said. "I went there with my friends to see scores of movies, because I have always loved the cinema. I happened to find myself at the film festival awards and I saw a young [Israeli film] director named Rani Blair receiving one of the directors' awards. I looked at him and I thought to myself, 'He's the first director I want to work with.'

"He looked like a really nice man and I decided to go speak with him," Rubin said with a big smile. "I introduced myself and told him that I know he does a weekly television drama series on Israel's Channel 3 network called Shabbatot and Chagim and I said I would like to be in the series. He was rather taken aback, and I explained that I had just enrolled in two part-time acting schools, one in Jerusalem and one in Tel Aviv.

"He said, 'Let me have your phone number,' so I gave him my number. 'Who cares,' I thought to myself. What did I have to lose? I thought he probably wouldn't call anyway.

"The next day his secretary called and she said, 'Let's make a date for an audition.' A few days later, I came for the audition, which lasted three hours. The following day, [Blair] phoned to say I had got a part. I was really happy."

After her success at the audition, theatrical agent Ran Turgeman saw Rubin in Shabbatot and Chagim and was so impressed that he contacted her and asked to represent her.

Rubin was considering another agent at the time, but she said she had a good feeling about Turgeman and knew his reputation, so she signed with him on a trial basis.

A week later, Turgeman received the script for a new television series called Wings. He sent the synopsis to Rubin, who said, "I have to do it."

The auditions took about six weeks, because 300 other young actresses were also hoping to star in the new series.

"I was very excited when I heard that I had got the part," Rubin said. "Nobody knew that I had been for all these auditions, not even my family. I just didn't believe there was something to talk about if there was nothing to talk about.

"When I heard that I had got the part, I was on the way to meet my brother and my father at the beach in Tel Aviv and I couldn't wait to tell them. They were so happy for me."

Rubin's parents made aliyah from Canada 33 years ago. Until a year ago, her father, Ilan Rubin, was secretary-general of the Jewish Agency. She has two sisters, Dana, 26, who is her flatmate in Tel Aviv, and Lori, 13, who goes to school in Jerusalem. Her brother Moti, 24, is studying business administration at McGill University in Montreal.

"My whole family lives in Canada, mainly in the Toronto and Vancouver areas, and so we go there about twice a year. Although I was born in Israel, I grew up in a house where my parents had a Canadian mentality, as well as being strong Zionists.

"When I go to Canada, nobody guesses that I am from Israel. My grandmother, Berte Rubin, lives in Lower Forest Hill village [in Toronto] and she has been so enthusiastic about my success.

"My grandfather Alex Rubin, whom I was always very close to, passed away about three months ago. Every time I spoke with him on the phone, he was really excited and wanted to know all the details. He kept asking me, 'When are you going to send us the tapes?' I couldn't because it was still being edited.

"Unfortunately, the first episode was aired just two days after his funeral. At the shivah in Toronto, I told my family that in my heart I dedicated the series to him for all his love and support."

Once confirmed as the female lead in Wings, Rubin had to work hard to understand the part.

Because she suffers from celiac disease, a genetic digestive disorder that damages the small intestine and interferes with the absorption of nutrients, Rubin was not permitted to do regular army service, so she had no first-hand knowledge of the rigours of national service and had never been in uniform.

As she was unable to join the army, Rubin did voluntary service. "For a year I worked with blind and deaf children in Jerusalem, then I joined [Magen David Adom], took a medic's course and worked for three years on intensive care ambulances."

> 'I grew up in a house where my parents had a Canadian mentality'

Rubin also began working out more often to improve her fitness, as the part was physically very demanding.

The shoot for Wings lasted five months. "We were often up in the middle of the night, we were shooting in the water, out of the water – it was physically demanding and challenging, but I loved it," Rubin said.

She describes her desire to act "as an explosion from inside, with a huge passion to act and study. It was if it came from nowhere. That's when I signed up for acting school."

As part of her study program, she has written a play set in a mental institution. Its three main characters each have a mental disorder and must prove their sanity to a committee in order to be released. Rubin has made the audience the committee, leaving them to judge whether the characters have made their case.

Rubin is very focused on her studies, but she is keeping one eye open for a career in film and is thinking about looking abroad for work after completing her studies.

Yet, she said, "some great things are happening in Israel now, and there is a gathering momentum that is encouraging many new ideas in Israeli films."

Rubin treats her new star status with equanimity. She has gotten used to strangers coming up to her in the street and telling her how much they enjoy her in Wings. "The first time I saw my picture on the cover of a newspaper, it was very weird," Rubin laughed.

March 10

• The Palestinian Legislative Council approved the creation of the post of prime minister. Israeli officials welcomed the appointment of Mamoud Abbas to the position but cautioned they would wait to see the nature of his duties before passing judgment on the development.

March 11

• The toll from the recent bus bombing in Haifa rose to 17. Moran Shoshan, 20, of Haifa, died of injuries sustained in the attack.

• The Israeli army decided to increase its presence in Hebron. The decision followed a firefight with Palestinian gunmen Monday night in which Staff Sgt. Tomer Ron, 20, was killed on the road between Kiryat Arba and the Tomb of the Patriarchs. Five soldiers were wounded in the clash.

March 12

• Some 1,945 Palestinians have been killed since the current violence began two-and-a-half years ago, according to the Israeli army. Figures released by the Palestinian Authority put the fatalities at 2,929, including suicide bombers and people the Palestinians say died because delays at roadblocks held up medical care. The army said it was not clear in all cases that the civilian casualties were killed by Israeli fire.

March 13

• Two Israeli security guards, Yoav Doron, 22, from Jerusalem, and Yehuda Ben-Yosef, 22, from Ma'aleh Adumim, were killed in the Hebron area as a result of a mistake by Israeli Defence Forces troops who were scouting for terrorists, the IDF's senior commander in the area said.

March 14

• Eleven Palestinian gunmen were killed by Israeli army operations in the Jenin area over a period of 24 hours.

Mass murderers depicted as heroes by PA

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Media Watch

On March 11, 1978, Palestinians led by a female terrorist, Dalal Mughrabi, hijacked an Israeli bus. The hijacking ended with 36 Israelis being murdered, along with American nature photographer Gail Rubin, whom the terrorists shot when they spotted her taking pictures.

For Palestinians, the large number of Israeli civilians killed turned this act of terror into "one of the greatest successes of the struggle" [Al-Ayyam, March 9, 2000], and it turned Mughrabi into the Palestinians' heroic, ideal woman: "Dalal is a symbol for the Palestinian nation" [PA TV, Aug. 30 2000]. Summer camps, schools and colleges, police and military courses are now named for Mughrabi, and annual ceremonies and television broadcasts commemorate the day of her terror mission.

Last week, on the anniversary of her terror attack, the Palestinian Authority's daily newspaper again wrote an article glorifying Mughrabi's mass murder. The following is the text.

"On the morning of March 11, 1978, a woman Palestinian fighter [fedayeen], Dalal Mughrabi, created a legend that would be taught for many years when she and her fedayeen unit infiltrated the Palestinian coastal plain near Tel Aviv [Note:the Palestinians routinely define all of Israel as "occupied Palestine"], causing tens of killed and injured, after taking Israeli passengers as hostages on a bus along the coastal highway.

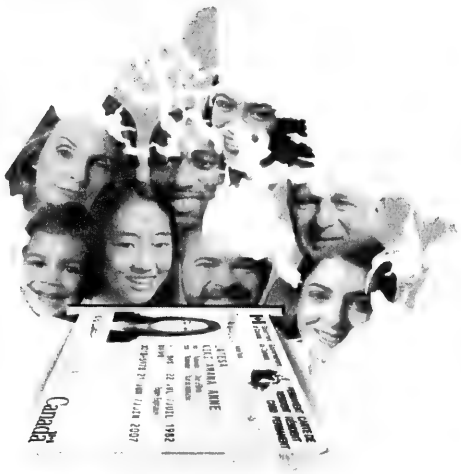
"She and her unit opened fire at the military vehicles in the vicinity, resulting in hundreds of injuries among the occupying soldiers, especially because this highway is frequently used by military vehicles transporting soldiers between the Zionist colonies in the suburbs and Tel Aviv. [Note: Palestinians define all of Israel's cities as illegal "colonies."]

"The army, headed by [Ehud] Barak, and with the assistance of tanks and helicopters, pursued the bus until it was finally stopped near the colony of Herzliya. A real battle took place between Dalal and her unit and the occupation forces... Journalists' cameras captured the blind hatred that overcame Barak and his soldiers during the operation...

"Twenty-five years after this heroine's death as a shahida [martyr for Allah], many Palestinian women are following in her footsteps every day. Examples include Wafa Idris [the first female suicide bomber] and Ayyat al-Akhras, [the second female suicide bomber], who performed acts of shahada [seeking] during the blessed al-Aqsa intifadah to protect the homeland. The shahida Dalal Mughrabi shall remain one of the symbols of the Palestinian national struggle" [Al Hayat Al Jadida, March 11, 2003].

Important Message for Canada's Permanent Residents

Permanent Resident Card will soon be mandatory.



Save time and money; obtain your Permanent Resident (PR) Card before you travel.

- Who needs the new PR Card? Permanent residents (landed immigrants) returning to Canada by airplane, boat, train or bus must have a PR Card. Canadian citizens do not need a PR Card.
- When does the PR Card become mandatory? Permanent residents returning to Canada as of December 31, 2003, by airplane, boat, train or bus, must show their PR Card to carrier personnel when boarding to prove their permanent resident status in Canada.

The PR Card replaces the IMM 1000 Record of Landing form, which will no longer be valid for travel purposes.

If you are a permanent resident returning to Canada without a valid PR Card as of December 31, 2003, you will not be permitted to board an airplane, boat, train or bus en route to Canada. You will be referred to the closest Canadian embassy or consulate to obtain a limited use travel document. This will result in travel delays and extra costs for you.

- Becoming Canadian. Many permanent residents who can become Canadian citizens are encouraged to apply for their citizenship.
- How can you get a PR Card? Application kits are available through Citizenship and Immigration Canada's web site (www.cic.gc.ca) or by calling the PR Card Call Centre (1 800 255-4541).

Applications are being processed based on your year of landing. Check the chart to see in which month you should apply, and apply early. For example, if your year of landing was 1998, you should submit your application in May 2003.

If you have missed your application period, please submit your application as soon as possible.

Swedish Wallenberg inquiry blames own gov't for hero's fate

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

For the first time, a Swedish commission of inquiry into the disappearance of World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg has blamed its own government for sealing the hero's tragic fate.

This month's report accused the Swedish foreign ministry of "a palpable lack of interest in the security of diplomat Raoul Wallenberg during the critical months after his disappearance in January 1945" in Budapest.

"The absence of activism is remarkable and extremely unfortunate," the report said.

The commission was appointed in late 2001 to examine Swedish efforts to solve the mystery of Wallenberg's fate. The report found Sweden could have taken action after the war to retrieve him from Soviet custody, but failed to act.

Wallenberg disappeared into the Soviet gulag when the Red Army invaded Budapest in January, 1945. He had been sent to the Hungarian capital in 1944 by the U.S. War Refugee Board to rescue as many Jews as possible from the Nazis. In six months, he issued some 30,000 fake Swedish passports and spirited their holders to safe houses. He also persuaded the Nazis to call off the destruction of Budapest's Jewish ghetto, with its 70,000 inhabitants.

The Soviets repeatedly said that Wallenberg, who was named Canada's first honorary citizen in 1985, died of a heart attack in 1947 while in prison, despite alleged sightings of him into the 1980s.

The new Swedish report said a lack of leadership in the Swedish foreign ministry resulted in a failure to adequately investigate leads on Wallenberg.

"Whatever the explanation, this passiveness in the first months is not defensible [and] deserves criticism," said commission chairman Ingemar Eliasson.

He said the ministry should have demanded that Wallenberg be sent home. "Instead they, on several occasions, made it understood to Moscow that they believed he had died."

The report says Sweden was informed as early as 1946 about the possibility Wallenberg was in Soviet custody "and that some kind of compensation for his release was being demanded by the Soviet side."

The report cites evidence the foreign minister at the time read the reports. "Despite this, he took no initiative to try to find out the truth behind these Soviet moves for negotiations."

The commission said it can't draw conclusions on the minister's failure to act, but the report states flatly that "given the information to which he had access, his passivity appears incomprehensible and remarkable."

A joint Russian-Swedish report, issued in 2001 after a decade of research, arrived at separate conclusions, neither shedding new light on the file. The Swedes said that without hard evidence to the contrary, Wallenberg should be considered a missing person, and that it's impossible to draw definite conclusions about his fate. The Russian report repeated that Wallenberg had died in 1947 in prison.

But the Russian report seemed to support the conclusions in the latest Swedish inquiry that Stockholm must shoulder blame. It pointed to a June 1946 meeting between the Swedish ambassador to Moscow and Soviet dictator Josef Stalin, saying the Swede's incorrect perception that Wallenberg had been killed led him to miss an opportunity to press for his release.

'Love is lovelier, the second time around'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Love is lovelier, the second time around," Frank Sinatra sang.

Second and third times around have become more common in recent years, as people live longer and outlive a spouse, the rate of divorce increases – 50 per cent in the United States and 45 per cent in Canada – and more singles marry later in life and marry someone who is divorced.

Vivienne Segelbaum, 56, a French immersion teacher with three children, was born in London, England. Gidon Tankus, 62, a marketing consultant who has two children, was born in Haifa, Israel. They were both divorced when they met at an older singles (40+) dinner at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in February 2001.

There was an instant attraction, but Segelbaum, who divorced 16 years ago says that as their relationship grew, she had some apprehensions, recalling a marriage that fell apart.

They married last November. "I hope to feel like a bride for the rest of my life," Segelbaum told The CJN. "All my life, I felt as though I was looking for something, but I didn't know what I was seeking.

"When I met Gidon, it was like two halves of a zipper and we came together as a complete whole."

She says you come into a second marriage with more life experiences. "I was so innocent and unworldly when I got married the first time."

Segelbaum was brought up in an Orthodox home. Tankus was a member of the Reform movement.

"I began examining my Jewish heritage after my mother passed away in 1999," Tankus says. "I went to study with a Lubavitcher rabbi."

He studied engineering technology at Technion University in Israel, moved to Canada in 1968 and settled in the Hamilton area, where he worked in marketing and management.

Tankus' cousin, a member of Shaarei Shomayim, convinced him to go to the older singles' event in February 2001. "There were a lot of people in the room," he says, "but no one had a face after I saw Vivienne."

Their first date, Segelbaum says, "didn't feel like a first date. I found we had many things in common, but I had doubts because I had been hurt and I didn't want to be hurt again."

Tankus changed her mind, however. They chose to have a home wedding, and although their guest list consisted of family and a few special friends, they agree that it was the most beautiful day in their lives.

Most love stories are written about first marriages. But this bride and groom believe their marriage was even more exciting.

"I felt like a young groom," Tankus says. "If there was an elevation above cloud nine, I was there."

"And I was truly blessed," Segelbaum says, "because my 92-year-old father Saul Goldstein walked me to the chupah."

They agree that when people remarry later in life, they have many more issues to deal with – children, finances, in-law families and more. These issues, they say, should be resolved before a couple makes a commitment.

Their advice to others is that each person should define his or her priorities, try to understand where the differences are and come to terms with those difference.

A key element is to "like the other person and have respect." This, they say, is at the top of their priority list.

They have this advice for singles. Keep an open mind when meeting people of the opposite sex. "And try to involve yourself in many diversified activities. You could be content with your life. But you never know what could happen, often unexpectedly."

And as Sinatra concludes, "I'm so glad we met, the second time around."

How to match hair colour to skin tones

Has this ever happened to you? Your best friend just changed her hair colour for the upcoming season. You immediately rush out and purchase it only to look in the mirror later and ask yourself: "What was I thinking?"

You are not alone.

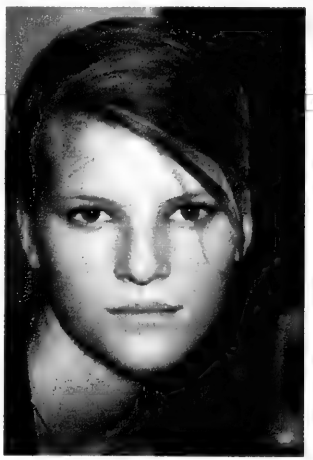
What happened? No matter what the fashion trends are, there is a fundamental thing to remember when choosing a new hair colour – a hair colour that complements natural skin tones will always look best.

Clairol Canada provides the following advice:

There are two types of skin tones – cool and warm.

Skin tone is usually cool if

- It can be described as olive, fair, rosy or porcelain;
- Eyes are hazel, blue, blue-grey or deep brown; and
- Favourite jewelry tends to be silver and most flattering clothes colours are blue, purple, burgundy, pink, turquoise, blue greens, white and lemon yellow.



Complimentary hair colours for cool skin are the ash or neutral tones. Cool skin tones also look great with the cool reds (red/violets with burgundy undertones).

Skin tone is usually warm if

- It can be described as fair to medium with golden undertones, peaches and cream, golden brown or darker, or you have freckles;
- Eyes are deep brown, golden brown or hazel; and
- Favourite jewelry tends to be gold and favourite clothes colours are golden yellows, khaki, olive, yellow greens, browns, orange, reds, peach and cream.

Complementary hair colours are gold, warm blondes and browns, auburn or red. Warm skin tones can also use the natural or neutral shades.

Did you know that...

51 per cent of women colour their hair to cover grey, while 67 per cent of women colour their hair to make themselves look better and feel more beautiful.

Tips from the Clairol pros for getting the best grey coverage:

- When hair goes grey, skin also gets paler. This means the most complementary hair colour will be one or two levels lighter than your original natural colour.
- Never use an ash shade to cover grey.
- The best grey coverage is always given by neutral shades, but if you don't want a neutral shade, try this:

1) Choose the red or gold shade you want.

2) Choose a natural shade one or two levels lighter.

3) Use half of each dye and add them to one bottle of developer. Apply the colour as directed. Adding the neutral shade to the gold or red shade will make sure you don't get brassiness or off-tones.

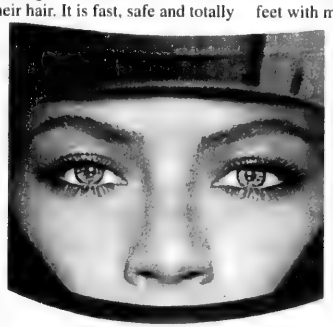
NEWS, NEWS, NEWS... The spring 2003 palette is bold and breathtaking. You can be as daring as you like. There is something for everyone – but it has to be colourful. The overall look will be fresh, free and very feminine. Orange seems to be most prominent colour this spring. Eyes will sparkle with highlights of black and dashes of white. Lips will be less lined but still polished and glossy.

Micro Point by Cyberhair is the latest hair volumizing process being done in Toronto. Continental Hair on Avenue Road (416-923-7747) is bustling with men and women who want to add thickness to their hair. It is fast, safe and totally non-invasive, you won't even know it is there.

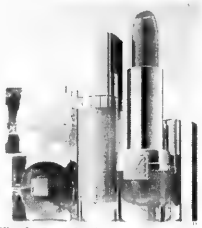
Hair Support and Micro Point Link by Cyberhair are two of the latest advances for treating hair loss and thinning. When used together, this amazing combination will prepare your scalp to have the optimum condition necessary for healthy hair growth and instantly increase the volume of a single growing hair by 400 per cent. The process actually ties two or three strands of real hair to your natural hair strand creating instant volume.



Estée Lauder Perfection Correcting Serum is as remarkable as its benefits.

Roger Edwards recently launched his incredible sports fashion collection for spring 2003. The jersey jackets and T-shirts, long and short, were sensational. The show was staged with gorgeous female and male models dancing in the Edwards garb to none other than the Roger Edwards band – a multi-talented guy!

A great time was had by all and talk about the fashion cognoscenti... well, everyone was there, including Toronto's own fashion diva Jeanne Bekker.



Estée Lauder's Pure Colour Gloss is very sexy.

The most exciting event in Biotherm's history takes place this spring with the launch of Skin Loving Colours, a makeup line that loves the skin, evokes the senses, animates with spirit and enhances beauty with colour. Check it out!

Returning to Toronto March 21, 22 and 23 are the country's top cosmetic surgeons, dermatologists and cosmetic dentists. They are once again gathering at the cosmetic enhancement, anti-aging show, New You 2003. This will be the second year of the remarkably interesting anti-aging show. Doubled in size, it is expected to fill 120,00 square feet with more than 250 exhibitors and speakers informing us about every aspect of self-enhancement from full surgical facelifts to nutrition, yoga and even anti-aging hairdos. This show is not to be missed. It's at the Metro Convention Centre with $12 tickets available at the door or call Ticketmaster and reserve.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Get your body ready for spring by exfoliating all your leftover dead skins cells from the dry winter months. Thank goodness for B. Kamins' Maple Sugar Scrub! It is so delicious and does it ever do the job. Another sensational product from B. Kamins is their cellular renewal serum – check it out!

Estee Lauder's Perfectionist Correcting Serum for Lines/Wrinkles is a gentle, fast acting formula that goes beyond conventional anti-wrinkle formulas. It contains the exclusive BioSync Complex, a patent-pending Estee Lauder technology that synchronizes information sharing in the skin. It goes on the skin like velvet and immediately improves its appearance.

Variety of beauty products from Clinique.

Shiseido's Body Creator aromatic gel is formulated with their breakthrough sense-stimulating SLM fragrance and caffeine. This combo activates on contact – an instant lift for senses and skin. The advanced technology gives an intensely refined, toned appearance to your whole body.

Skin wakes up looking rested, revived and supercharged after a night of luxuriating in Clinique's new boosting repair trio called Repairwear. It's available in cream or lotion complete with a jump-starting, turbo charged booster serum.

Orlane's B21 Absolute Skin Recovery Concentrate emergency care for eyes will help alleviate dark circles, puffiness and fine lines caused by fatigue. Used only once or twice a week, depending on the degree of fatigue, it actually completes the action of Absolute Skin Recovery Care Eye Contour, which is used daily.

Essence des yeux anti-cernes for under-eye circles from Clé de Peau Beauté is absolutely star-like. It's a creamy essence that energizes eye contour skin and relieves dark circles, fine lines and fatigue. It counteracts both poor microcirculation and uneven skin tone.

Biotherm introduces Age-fitness for Men and once again includes the miraculous pure olive leaf concentrate that goes right to the heart of the skin, providing protection and leaving the skin firmer with a youthful energy – treat your special guy!

Orlane's S.O.S Scrub Body Corrector helps to detoxify the skin by eliminating surface impurities and dead cells that block the renewal of the epidermis. It also facilitates cell exchanges through a draining action that clears the cells by regulating their metabolism. It's a dense foaming gel that's lightly scented and leaves your skin as fresh as a daisy.

Lancôme's Absolue Night is a new dream cream for mature skin. It maximizes the valuable, restorative night time hours. This yummy cocktail is a combination of wild yam, soy and sea algae that in harmony replenish moisture and improve firmness.

Lancaster's Aquamilk Beyond Moisture Essence is the ultimate skin quencher and perfect for the spring and summer months.

FOUNDATION: Lancôme unveils a fabulous new foundation that indeed lives up to its name – Adaptive. The formula optimizes the action of the sebo-regulating powders on oily areas and that of pro-hydrating agents on dry areas and maintains this balance throughout the day, without touch-ups.

Canderm introduces Sunsation Insta-Tan for that "just back from vacation" look all year round. It claims to contain a higher percentage of DHA than any other brand, making it more effective, streak-free.

Chanel's new product Irréelle Soleil is an effective silky bronzing powder with a very fine texture containing silica beans and nylon powder. The light-reflecting pigments create a healthy glow and help to minimize the appearance of fine lines – a little dash on your cheeks and brow will give you that sun-kissed look.

Essence contour des yeux anti-cernes for under-eye circles from Clé de Peau Beauté.

CHEEKS: Delicate petals of rosy blush shades surround a golden highlighter in Estee Lauder's must-have beauty item for the season – Pure Eden Blush Petals – exquisite!

MAC's Fab Floral shades are quite sumptuous looking and give you a very natural look-Pinch of Peach is quite chic.

NARS springtime Torrid blush is a warm coral with a gold shimmer that is just stunning.

Crème Blush Duo from Lise Watier's Flower Power collection is easy to apply, on your cheeks or your lips with equally excellent results.

Clinique's new Colour Rub All Over lustre for the entire face is fabulous. Just blend it all over for a gorgeous glow.

NAILS: Lightwash your nails with Clinique's new Glosswear Nail Enamel trio. Choose from three flirty colours in White Wash, Adobe Pink and Pinkini.

Check out Revlon's Instant Attraction collection. The limited edition sparkle nail glitter is just fabulous for those club nights.

Revlon's ColourStay Always on Nail Enamel does exactly what it promises and the spring shades are gorgeous.

The nail colour Triomphe from Chanel is a wonderful textured white polish that can be used all over your nail or just for a sexy french.

EYES: Estee Lauder's Pure Collection introduces garden greens and soft pink eye shadows in the sexiest little containers- the ultimate in femininity.

MAC's Petalescent eye shadow from their Fab Floral line just says springtime is here.

Clinique's White on White Quick Eyes pencil will give your eyes a definite boost of brightness-wear it alone or with colour.

NARS eye shadow duo compact with the name "rated r" are pretty wild colours of green and blue, but as makeup expert Michelle Gilbert explains, they can be used as vividly or softly as you like. She also suggests that the Istanbul eyeliner is best used in the inner membrane of the eye — totally stunning.

Estee Lauder launches Magnascopic Volume Mascara. It is really quite extraordinary and promises to increase your lash volume 300 per cent. The secret seems to be in the unique formula and triangular shape brush design.

Lancôme's Palette Mix in its Supernatural Collection is fabulous for touches of coverup all over your face and is particularly good for discolouration under the eyes and magic for blemishes. Their new colour Bronze adorns their Stylo waterproof collection, which is quite frankly one of the few waterproof claimers that really work – swim, cry, it remains perfect.

LIPS: Estee Lauder's Pure Colour Gloss in Waterfall offers dripping wet shine that is very sexy!

NARS lipstick in Klute is a colour for everyone; it is natural and glistens with vulnerability.

The double duo lipstick and gloss from Revlon's Instant Attraction Line is a real time saver and great for travelling!

From its Monaco Spring Lights spring grouping, Lancaster introduces a stunning globe-trotter.

HAIR: Did you know that Redken is becoming quite the celebrity favourite, with Cate Blanchette loving active Express Flash Wash Shampoo and conditioner, while Britney Spears' favorites are Headstrong and Extreme, just to name two. This season, Redken treats us with yet another hair delight called Rough Paste 12, which creates bold ragged texture and holding separation. It stays pliable so you can work and rework it through your hair.

Our hair maven Terry Ritcey (Terry Ritcey Salon, 416-926-0123) tells us that hair will have a gypsy passion with a provocative suggestion of escape – tousled and carefree with shapes leaning towards a more rounded style. Most popular will be chunky cuts with scissor clips left behind for panache. Dominant colour tones will be frothy chestnuts, dark auburn and terra cotta.

Kerastase presents Elasto-Curl which is a new range of hydra-toning treatments for dry and curly hair. It provides excellent nutrition, conditioning and keeps styling fluid and light – perfect for the new relaxed looks of spring 2003.

FRAGRANCE: Clinique's Happy Heart is the first sister to the #1 selling Happy. Its floral bouquet evokes happiness in the spirit of love and joy.

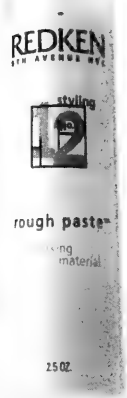
Shiseido's Zen Perfume Radiance Body Cream is a velvety body treatment cream of fresh-budding florals spiritualized by peaceful influences of the east. It includes nutrients and detoxifying abilities to provide a very special radiance.

Chic is a new fragrance from Carolina Herrera. It's in the "woody floral and sensual" fragrance family, which is both stirring and energizing at the same time.

KORS' Michael Kors is a new and distinct fragrance designed for very chic women. It is a delicious combination of florals accompanied by rich notes of sheer port wine and dashed with a touch of cognac.

Lancaster presents a new fragrance for men called: Joop! Rococo, which is simply irresistible. It's a luscious, woody-spicy-floral composition. Another treat from Lancaster is a cute little trio of Davidoff Cool Water Woman goodies including a spray, body sorbet and a fresh shower breeze – a wonderful little gift.

Chic, both stirring and energizing.



Redken's Rough Paste 12, another hair delight.

lip paint called Rouge Grace Lipstick. The colours and texture are both terrific.

Spring Fashion

The do's and dont's of career fashion

Working women today want to climb the corporate ladder and they know they must make a good impression. This means looking stylish and dressing in good taste.

North American women surveyed by Cotton Incorporated's Lifestyle Monitor Tracking Report, which surveys more than 300 people a month and has compiled 34,000 interviews, revealed they seek value and quality and prefer to buy comfortable, casual clothing they can wear in the office, on a night out or at home.

More than three-quarters of the women polled reported that their workplaces have casual days and that they want to dress comfortably but still convey a professional demeanour. This presents a challenge for today's female workforce. As casual days grow, a number of women said that there are no clear rules. Asked whether people dress too casually on casual days, 42 per cent agreed, though 87 per cent said casual day dress was appropriate.

In Casual Power: How to Power Up Your Nonverbal Communication and Dress Down for Success, author Sherry Maysonave says a person's image from her hair to her toes speaks volumes about her before she says a word.

"It's true and more important today than ever before, including when you work in a 'business casual' environment," says Maysonave. "The impression you make is critical. Via your image, you send signals and create lasting impressions that affect your income and your career opportunities."

Learning how to dress well for the office has become a perplexing problem, notes Cotton Incorporated's Lifestyle Monitor. Many company dress codes walk a fine line between buttoned up and buttoned down.

In Cotton Incorporated's recent survey, women indicated what works and what doesn't and they also clarified some misconceptions about suitable attire for the workplace:

Casual rules: the human resources perspective

Women have come a long way from the days when climbing the corporate ladder required a two-piece suit and classic pumps. Nevertheless, business casual doesn't make it any easier to advance.

Rules vary within the same company between departments and also between levels in the corporate hierarchy. "In a law firm, you could find a lawyer who is about to go to a meeting wearing a suit, and just down the hall, you might see someone in the firm's accounting department wearing something more casual like khakis," says Kristen Bowl, spokesperson for the Society for Human Resources Management (SHRM), the world's largest association serving human resource professionals.

L'Oreal USA has a business casual dress code that restricts employees from wearing denim, shorts, athletic wear, sneakers, sweats and flip flops. But as Kimberly Nassau, a human resource manager at the company reports, there are distinct differences in how individuals within various departments interpret the dress code.

"Our accounting department tends to be much more conservative than the marketing department. Conversely, to have credibility, our marketing professionals, who are working in the world of beauty, need to be in touch with fashion trends," says Nassau.

Situational factors also affect the dress code. "There are always elements to consider: Is the employee dealing with the public? Are they in a position where they might suddenly be called to give a speech or attend a meeting?" Bowl says. "These factors influence what a person thinks is appropriate to wear on a particular day or daily."

On BlueSuitMom.com, author Maysonave reports that some companies have adopted a "situationally sensitive or business appropriate policy that incorporates different levels of business attire that depend upon the situation at hand."

Maysonave finds it is becoming increasingly common for companies to require their employees to keep a change of formal business clothing in their offices for meetings with clients, particularly for unexpected situations.

Other companies entrust employees to make decision themselves. Gerry Nobile, director of human resources at Playboy Enterprises, told Cotton Incorporated's Lifestyle Monitor, "We have never had a dress code. We expect our employees to use

The colours of spring: serotonin-induced clothing?

Since it began, this season has been one of snow, slush and stress. When we are surrounded by grey skies, it seems that we are in need of some serious uplifting.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Although Mother Nature hasn't quite heard our desperate call for help yet, the malls sure have. As the snow continues to fall outside, stories have been filling up with every colour from coral and turquoise to lime.

When people walk into these stores, their muscles relax, their eyes open wide and their wallets open wider.

Now this gets me thinking. How can a simple change of colours cure us from any ailment we thought we had?

What exactly is it about the white of bikinis that makes the white of sweaters seem so unappealing?

Artificial serotonin is what I like to call it.

Somehow, the fashion bigwigs have figured out just how to capture the feeling of a sunny day. That unmistakable aura given off by the sun is now available in everything from tank tops to flip flops.

Just catching a glimpse of these little bursts of the tropical rainbow can make your mind spin out of control. While in this thrilling state, you're capable of doing anything!

Try on the whole store? Probably. Max out your parents' credit cards? Who knows?

Either way, I say you cannot be held responsible for your actions.

Though the actual material possession will only thrill you for a fleeting moment of time, it is guaranteed to lift you out of the never-ending gulag that is winter.

Seeing bright colours brings back the sense of hopefulness and excitement that had been locked away in hibernation. There is light at the end of the tunnel, and thanks to the fashion industry, it seems closer than ever.

This season, whatever the trend – whether it be cargo or chinoiserie – I guarantee it will be bright.

The fashion business has found the key to a girl's heart – happiness. Whether or not they've pulled the wool over our eyes this time, they are raking in the dough.

Spend as much as you want. Whether or not you can see it, spring is just around the corner.

common sense and give them the benefit of the doubt to dress according to what their day dictates."

Regardless of where women work, they should make sure their choice of clothing does not interfere with the bottom line. Ultimately, the focus should be on the employee's work, not her attire. Companies should train supervisors to deal with inappropriately dressed employees, say these aforementioned experts.

According to Maysonave, mass e-mails or memos are not the best way to convey dress policy details – they're perceived as dictatorial and thus, encourage rebellion. Smart companies provide motivational workshops that get employees excited about following the guidelines, showing employees how and why their workplace attire affects their opportunities for promotions and raises, and the company's overall success.

Placing the emphasis on the business reasons for having guidelines, such as the non-verbal communication aspects of clothing and grooming, diffuses the issue and helps employees understand the consequences of a company's image.

But even under these circumstances, problems inevitably arise as fashions come and go. Maysonave recommends that human resource directors create PowerPoint presentations that depict updated visuals of a company's list of "acceptable and not acceptable" apparel and accessories, making it much easier to confront those who are pushing the envelope.

As a last resort, Maysonave says, "It's legal for an employer to establish and enforce a dress policy. Therefore, you can send employees home to change and even dock them a vacation day for the time."

Given these kinds of headaches, how do employers scrutinize the appearance of job candidates?

"Up until three years ago, I would expect someone to come to an interview wearing a suit," says Nobile. "But then it got to the point where people would call and say, 'My company is casual, and if I show up in a suit, they'll know that I'm going to an interview.'"

Nobile also finds there are benefits to this change.

"When someone comes to an interview wearing something casual but professional, it creates a more relaxed environment. I think it allows me to get to know the candidate better, whereas a suit can sometimes make candidates less distinguishable."

Greg Giangrande, senior vice-president of human resources for HarperCollins Publishers Inc., says the most important thing for an employee to remember is that "it's all about the whole presentation.

A breeze, these summer skirts

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Smiling models on the catwalk, waving and expressing joy with every step are a pretty rare sight. Usually, they are long-faced, and walk with a demonstratively bored look and a general demeanor that says – get out of my face, and fast.

And the clothes? Usually, they are designed with the sexy bad girl look or, more threateningly, the accessorized rich bitch or the gloomy neo-Gothic style. No wonder then, that the fashion magazines covering the new summer collections are eloquent about the joy, optimism and enthusiasm emanating from the catwalks, like a breeze on a warm summer day.

"It's a revolution! The girls on the runways are laughing, waving their hands in the air and ecstatically flouncing their flowery and colourful skirts," Vogue reported and rushed to back up its assessment with explanations from the designers.

"I wanted to raise people's morale," said Marc Jacobs, whose delightful collection designed for his own label has as its sole competition the one he designed for Louis Vuitton.

Soft flowery pastels in pink, lavender, yellow and ivory, or rainbow-bright colours, flooded the runways, with cuts that are feminine, alongside refreshing combinations from the world of sport.

Past fashions, when the world was less threatening, have been sprinkled into the dot and flower prints in shades taken from other eras: 1950s-style, knee-length flair skirts, 1960s mini-dresses and 1980s narrow straight skirts.

This summer, there will be no avoiding buying a dress or at least a skirt – which reawakens the issue of length. All the designers presented mini-dresses and mini-skirts, but the length changed somewhere near the knee.

"During this season, the main thing is the legs," declared Tom Ford, whose mini-dresses designed for the Gucci collection were very short. Miuccia Prada acknowledged that the dresses she showed were originally longer, but were shortened at the very last minute: "When I saw it all together, shorter seemed fresher," she explained.

Nicholas Ghesquiere, who designed sporty mini-dresses for Balenciaga with surfing motifs, also had not meant to make the dresses so short.

"It's what came out in the end. I wanted to balance between sandals with a broad heel and exposure for the models' long legs," he said and suggested wearing the short dresses as a tunic over leggings.

Nonetheless, the minis in the summer 2003 collection are a suggestion only, and are in no way an order that should be followed without carefully considering the result in the mirror, along with such factors as age, weight and height. The mini that is intended for the catwalk and not necessarily for the street will in any case have to be lengthened for the commercial collections.

Gucci's skirts, for example, will be lengthened by at least 10 centimeters en route to stores. However, as in the case of the cropped blouses exposing the belly – intended for the young and shapely and adopted by women of all ages and sizes – the mini fad will probably also lead to some exaggeration.

The aim is not to stifle the joy and hide the legs, but to choose equally attractive skirts that flutter around the knee. Marc Jacobs offers a delicate look that just touches the knee with a slightly flared skirt and also a sexy version that falls just above the knee, as in the pastel satin dresses he designed for Louis Vuitton.

England's Jessica Ogden embroidered delicate flowers on knee-lengthy fluttery skirts. Donna Karan designed flattering knee-length skirts, as did Paul Smith, Narciso Rodriguez, Michael Kors and Betty Jackson.

"Your clothes help people form an impression of you and you want to be noticed for the right reasons. You want to exude confidence, and clothing is just one of many tools with which to work."

One axiom that holds true is that it is always better to err on the side of being overdressed for an interview.

"Whether you're interviewing with human resources or a hiring manager, certain things are expected. Keep it standard, simple, unfettered, timeless and classic," says Giangrande.

"Regardless of whether the company is notoriously liberal, don't try to match the dress code. Even if you're going to be wearing ripped jeans once you're on the job, the interview is not the place for it."

Of course, wearing an outfit that's neither comfortable nor reflects your style isn't the route to go either.

"Look like you've worn the outfit before," Giangrande says. "Don't act like you're a seven-year-old wearing a wool suit for the first time in the middle of August. You have to look like you belong in the clothes you're wearing."

The candidate's choice of outfit must communicate to the interviewer – who may be dressed more casually than the candidate – that they take the job opportunity seriously. And the hiring manager may point out the difference in dress styles as a way to discuss the company's dress code style policy.

Since many professionals have scaled back on the amount of suits that they purchase, experts point out that taking a job at a company that does not permit casual attire involves an added investment for the prospective employee. Hence, casual attire is literally a "savings account."

Haute couture at the ROM

Suit and blouse by Christian Dior. French, 1950. Gift of Mrs. Saul Silverman.

Until May 4, Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum is hosting Elite Elegance: Couture Fashion in the 1950s. This ROM-curated exhibit features the crème de la crème, approximately 60 pieces of its couture collection, and examines the social context of couture in Toronto in the mid-20th century.

In examining the years between 1945 and the early '60s, the last golden age of haute couture, the exhibit follows the women who wore couture clothing and the great designers who created the fashions.

During this time, couture was required dress for entry into society. Etiquette was far more prescribed then than now, and the time of day and season determined appropriate dress, requiring a wide range of attire from coats and suits to cocktail dresses and formal wear.

Elite Elegance looks at the garments created in Paris and Europe and examines what happened to them once they left the design houses and were worn by Canadian socialites.

The decidedly feminine fashions of the 1950s, a mood launched by Christian Dior's New Look in 1947, represented a dramatic change from the functional, masculine fashions that prevailed in earlier decades. The evolving new style was based on traditional notions of femininity: small corseted waists, rounded shoulders and long, full skirts.

Admission to the exhibit is included with general admission. Group rates for 10 or more are available. Call 416-586-5859 or 1-800-724-6420.

Zeta-Jones appointed

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

I felt privileged to attend the recent Elizabeth Arden brunch at Toronto's Four Seasons Hotel.

Scott Beattie, the president and CEO of Elizabeth Arden, introduced guest speaker, actress Catherine Zeta-Jones, as the ambassador of the cosmetic brand and their international asset who brings with her not only rare beauty but talent, intelligence and great enthusiasm.

Zeta-Jones is without doubt all this and more; she is, as her character Velma in the Toronto-shot movie version of Chicago, might say, "All that jazz."

Zeta-Jones is really quite magnificent, with her rich, dark tresses that frame a peaches-and-cream complexion. She is relaxed, open and friendly. Clad in an elegant pin-striped suit, a lightweight red sweater and red stiletto pumps, she held true to her self-described style of being glamorous yet classic.

In her talk, she reminisced about how, when she was 10 years old, her mother told her to comb her hair and put on a little blush. Ever since, she said she has loved makeup. She told me that some years ago, her weekends were often filled with getting makeovers at department stores, even without a penny in her pocket to buy a lipstick. She loved every minute of it and I bet the makeup artist did as well.

Catherine Zeta-Jones

Today, when she is at home running after her two-year-old son, she is frequently without a drop of make-up – "Just jeans and tee-shirt," she said.

Taking hot fragrant baths with lots of the Arden Green Tea Scent is high on Zeta-Jones' priority list. She said she finds it very soothing and very relaxing. She adds to this pampering a cream she massages on her pregnant tummy – the ceramide capsules are great, she said.

Zeta-Jones' beauty regime is quite simple. She removes her makeup diligently, using regular cleansers and then lathering with sometimes more than one cream, and periodically exfoliating with Arden's Peel and Reveal Mask. The morning is just cleanse and moisturize.

The Peel and Reveal Mask, one of Zeta-Jones' favourite products, is an award-winning mask that helps to exfoliate dead cells on the surface of the skin and leaves a woman's face looking clear and fresh.

Zeta-Jones said she also adores Arden's famous Eight-Hour Cream (introduced 65 years ago) and uses it for just about every skin problem she has, from chapped lips to scrapes on her son's knees. She added it would be great for someone who might have augmented lips or other facial injections as it is quite healing.

Another of her favourites is the Ceramide Advanced Time Complex Capsules. These tiny capsules are at the bottom of her purses and makeup bags –basically, she said, she never leaves home without them. They are a fabulous answer to the hot lights of the movie set.

Zeta-Jones' love of cosmetics was evident when she explained her involvement with Elizabeth Arden. A company shareholder, she said she loves to be involved right at the inception of a new product. She often works with Arden's chemists, shares her thoughts and although she does not have final say, she certainly has input.

She said she loved walking around with the little vials of the new scent Arden Beauty at the various stages of its development and said it made her feel part of the finished product. She also recently helped formulate Arden's latest Eight-Hour Lip Tint. She said she loves it and applies it constantly throughout the day.

A woman has an imperative to maintain her beauty, Zeta-Jones said. Today, she said, it is accepted for a woman to be gorgeous, smart and successful. When I asked her how she felt about cosmetic surgery, she said that if cosmetic surgery helps to maintain your beauty, then it might be a good idea. But, she added, she believes that a woman's beauty comes from within.

Much like the ethereal presence with which she graces the silver screen, Zeta-Jones described her thoughts on being the image of Elizabeth Arden as "part real, part reality and part illusion" – an exceptional analysis from an uncommon beauty.

ICRF's C3 raises funds for adolescent oncology

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

The excitement mounted as another fashion show extravaganza got under way at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue last month.

Superior Sound/Kloda Productions revved up the music and lighting. Backstage, several performers attempted a last minute run-through as guests filed in for the ninth annual fashion show – C3 (Come Cure Cancer) – put on by the Next Generation division of Israel Cancer Research Fund.

So what was on display for spring/summer 2003?

The baggy look is definitely gone, but bare midriffs are still the rage. Making a comeback are slim-fitting, boot-cut, low-waisted slacks and jeans for both sexes matched up with plaid shirts and coloured Ts and, of course, solid white and black.

A not-so-new look for the guys is striped shirts and white shirts with coloured collars and cuffs.

Then there's classic preppy-chic; the idea is to mix knitted tops, such as those from Miss Maggie, with sophisticated slacks or skirts for a neo-preppy look. Haven't we been there before?

And shades of the '60s are leaping in as the miniskirt makes a revival. Dressed up in pleated linen or playful casual denim, the micro-mini is back for young girls. Topped with a matching jacket, the look is young sophistication.

But it seems any length goes. The female models danced on stage in flared skirts, below-the-knee straight skirts and a to-the-knee swing skirt with metallic beading from U&I that was reminiscent of the felt poodle skirts of yesteryear. There was even one outfit with a full crinoline.

Once again the age-old expression, "Everything old is new again," comes to mind. But something different this time for consumer wear is the Spanish-influenced skirts from Eva B. The sexy outfits have thigh-high slits with flounced edges for the gals, and front-ruffled shirts in all colours for the guys.

The fashion/dance exhibition had two shows to accommodate the close to 2,000 adolescents, teens and adults who came out in support of the young volunteers. This was double the number of spectators of past Next Generation events and raised almost $20,000.

The co-producers, Mark Diamond, Izabel Czuzoj-Shulman and Jessie Bensoussan, led a team of more than 50 peers to put on a show that was perhaps more subdued than in previous years, but energetic and fast-paced nonetheless.

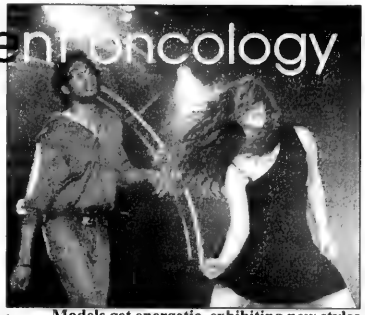
"It makes all of us feel good to give time for cancer research," said Diamond, 19, "and we get the opportunity to meet new friends."

Bonnie Ostrov, one of the longtime advisers, noted that more people were involved this year than ever before and the teenagers were slightly older than previous participants of the Next Generation fashion shows.

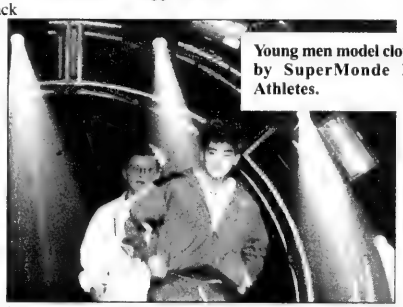
"They were more independent, more in charge of the show and details," Ostrov said.

"It's for a really good cause and I loved doing the show," said 19-year old Czuzoj-Shulman, who is currently pursuing a BA in psychology at McGill University.

Many of the volunteers have had experience with high school shows and bring learned skills as well as innate abilities to the Next Generation division. The co-ordinators were Sara Rosenblatt, Maggie Aron, Gillian Eliahoo, Jarred Zucker, Erik Langburt, Helen Costin, Sabrina Kadoch, Marisa Kraus, Jessica Sharafi, Liat Cartman, Anu Gill, Lianne Kopel, Celia Outmazguine, Dan Hadad, Carrie Levitt and Ivy Rotchin. Among the dancers were Jason Ansel, Valerie Bouzaglo, Lynn Cohen, Perry Gilman, Oren Langburt, Omar Sharif, Kern Mayers, Robin Wiviot, Lisa Schwartz, Ronnie Malewski, Genevieve Golt, Leslie Feldman, Alicia Crelinsten, Candice Simpson, Lauren Povitz, Alyssa Lefcort, Stephanie Gladman, Lauren Feiden, Shawn Corber, Sasha Czuzoj-Shulman, brother of one of the producers, and Bram Paperman whose mother Heather is a past president of ICRF.



Models get energetic, exhibiting new styles from Energie.



Young men model clothes by SuperMonde Des Athletes.

Moda Maquillage did the makeup for the girls while Ken Men worked on the faces of the guys; hair was by Angels Spa de Beauté.

An added attraction this year was a performance by the students from Bonnie's School of Dance. The elementary school age dancers may be the future for Next Generation shows.

Members of the Next Generation division of ICRF are aged 18 to 23 and are committed to the fight against cancer. The proceeds from this event will go to the Montreal Children's Hospital for research into adolescent oncology.

Randi Kupfert, Melissa Anders and Samantha Hollinger.

The young models pranced on stage and down the runway with enthusiasm and ease, showing off the easy-to-wear clothing from local fashion retailers including Club Monaco, Jessie May, Rebelle Couture, Diesel, Fly, Juicy Couture and Miss Sixty/Energie.

The models included Julia Berdugo, Claudia Ohayon, Patrick Zagury, Kim Cola, Julie Kotler,

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Award-winning photographer Beverley Abramson says her new collection of pictures from Israel emerged out of a determination to understand and document the complexities of life in the Jewish state today.

"I'm trying to capture the everyday life of an Israeli," the Toronto-based photographer says of the exhibit, titled Israel Now, which runs until March 29 at the Prince Arthur Fine Arts Gallery in Toronto.

"I tried to capture the resilience of the Israelis, their determination and their frame of mind."

As a picture of an elderly couple at Fishman Beach in Tel Aviv shows, Israelis continue to live as best they can, despite the problems they face.

The photographs were taken in Israel last summer during a trip that was in sharp contrast to her previous one in 1998. Then, she saw a jubilant nation celebrating its 50th anniversary. Last summer, she found a changed nation that was facing the ravages of the intifadah.

"There's a light side and a dark side to Israel now," she said. "On the light side, the country shows the prosperity and revitalization of the community, but there's a dark side, a concern about the uncertainty and volatility. One never knows what's going to occur.

"My pictures show a bright attitude – Israelis expressing humour, having fun and enjoying life."

Proceeds from the show will be donated to the Medical Exchange Program at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and the Sachler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University. The $1-million project, launched in January, will help facilitate joint research and programs between the two institutions.

Dr. Gideon Koren, one of the physicians involved in the project, will speak at the exhibit's opening reception March 20 at 9 p.m.

Call 416-944-2671 for details.

A violinist of engaging skill

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Sandwiched in between the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's playful and pleasing recent rendition of Hector Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture and its solid, reliable performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Pathetique, conducted by Eiji Oue, young violinist Maxim Vengerov commandeered centre stage with his virtuoso solo performances in Benjamin Britten's Violin Concerto, Op. 15 and Maurice Ravel's Tzigane.

Born in Novosibirsk, Siberia, 28 years ago, Vengerov has been playing the violin for 24 years. He gave his first recital one year after he picked up the instrument at the age of five. Since then, he has won many awards and public distinctions, including the 1995 Record of the Year and Best Concerto by Gramophone Magazine for his recording of the Prokofiev and Shostakovich violin concertos.

Vengerov's age, however, has been no impediment to his maturity of talent and bearing. Britten's three movement concerto is technically demanding of both performer and audience.

The first movement, the Moderato, is a multi-themed complex that weaves between sombre ornament and dream-like reverie. The second movement, Vivace, is like an excursion through a dark forest, with sounds whose effects are occasionally disorienting and even ominous. The third movement, the Passacaglia, concludes the concerto with large profusions of sound that slowly dissipate in a tonally startling ending.

Vengerov's skill was masterful, rising high with every severe challenge that the music posed, his bow drawing across the strings, alternating between tender and aggressive, but always precise movements.

Swaying in emphatic unison with the music, he brilliantly evoked the wild, flippant emotions of Ravel's Tzigane. In appreciation, the audience held the violinist onstage with an ovation that lasted almost 10 minutes.

Vengerov's maturity is as much offstage as on. For the last six years, he has dedicated a great deal of time and effort on behalf of children. In 1997, he was appointed Enyoy for Music by UNICEF, the first classical musician to have that role.

He has played for abducted child-soldiers in Uganda, disadvantaged children in Harlem, drug-addicted children in Thailand and children caught in the ethnic conflict of Kosovo. He also frequently provides masterclass lessons to young musicians.

The concert's second star performance belonged to the theatre's acoustics. The quality of the sound in the recently renovated theatre was remarkable – absolutely crystalline in its clarity. The music rose from the stage, never muffled, never smothered, in virtually tactile lines of sound. It was a thoroughly enjoyable evening.

Gerron faced 'Faustian dilemma' in wartime bid for survival: filmmaker

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Kurt Gerron, the German-Jewish cabaret performer, actor and film director, was an unknown entity to two-time Academy Award winner Malcolm Clarke when he signed on to make Prisoner of Paradise, a documentary about Gerron's ultimately tragic life that is now playing in Toronto.

"I'd certainly never heard of him," said Clarke, the 50-year-old British-born, Montreal-based filmmaker whose riveting movie has been nominated for an Oscar in the best feature documentary category.

Gerron, who co-starred with Marlene Dietrich in the classic The Blue Angel and who sang Mack the Knife in the original production of the Threepenny Opera, was a master of populist, commercially successful films in Weimar Germany.

Forced to leave Berlin after Adolf Hitler's accession to power, Gerron lived in France and Holland before being deported to the Nazi "show" camp Theresienstadt.

There, in a bid to save himself from certain death, he agreed to direct a cynical propaganda film, The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, which was designed to whitewash Nazi wartime crimes.

Gerron, Clarke observed, was no Jewish saint. "He was simply a man of extraordinary talent who was presented with a Faustian dilemma. He clearly hated the Nazis, but he clearly loved life. He wanted to survive."

Clarke, who wrote and co-produced and co-directed Prisoner of Paradise with longtime collaborator Stuart Sender, believes that Gerron's story has "wider implications and contemporary resonances."

In the final analysis, he explained, the film "concerns the role of the artist and the difficulties of creative individuals who must somehow survive and exist within a hostile political system."

Clarke, who began his career at the British Broadcasting Corporation, was originally asked by Sender to be executive producer, in charge of fundraising.

Clarke was then writing a script for Steven Spielberg, who urged him to get more creatively involved.

"Since I found myself being increasingly drawn toward the challenge of how to make a morally complex film such as this, I finally decided to jump in."

Previously, Clarke directed the Oscar-winning documentaries Soldiers in Hiding, a portrait of Vietnam veterans, and You Don't Have to Die, which turns on a young boy's successful battle against cancer.

He also made Terror in the Promised Land, an investigation into the workings of Palestinian suicide bombers, and several episodes of the immensely popular syndicated drama series Upstairs, Downstairs.

Prisoner of Paradise was a challenge inasmuch as it required him, for the first time ever, to direct a film with a great deal of "library material" at its core.

"I was obliged to use a different skill set than I was used to."

Clarke and Sender found a vast amount of file footage in Poland, Russia, the Czech Republic and the former East Germany.

"The difficulty we faced was in actually screening all that never-before-seen-in-the-West footage. It was completely overwhelming. We sifted through over a million feet of film and saw images that were completely breathtaking. The challenge was to keep one's eyes on the ball and not allow any of this amazing footage into the film unless it absolutely served Gerron's story."

Clarke wrote the script incrementally over a nine-month period, and the shoot in the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Poland and the Czech Republic lasted from September to November 2001.

Finances posed a problem from the outset because some feared that Prisoner of Paradise, which cost $1.5 million to make, would be an apologia for a Jewish traitor.

"Portraying Gerron fairly, without tipping the scale either way so that the audience walks out asking themselves what they would have done under similar circumstances, is what we strove for," he said. "We certainly laboured hard and long not to make up the audiences' mind for them.

"I hope the film dignifies Gerron and his appalling dilemma and allows us to examine and honour his extraordinary life and work without emotionally manipulating the audience."

Though he thinks that Michael Moore's entry, Bowling for Columbine, will win the Oscar for best documentary feature, Clarke plans to attend the Academy Award ceremony on March 23.

"We really cannot compete with the juggernaut of Moore's publicity machine," said Clarke, who nevertheless respects Moore's film. "Still, we have a 20 per cent chance like everyone else, and I'd like to think that we, too, have made an accomplished and intellectually stimulating film."

He and Sender are currently in Berlin for the premiere of Prisoner of Paradise in Germany.

"We are to show it on the actual sound stage from which the Nazis removed Gerron in 1933. Strange how things sometimes come full circle. It is something of an emotional homecoming."

The pair are now in the process of developing another film with a Jewish theme, the true story of a Nazi guard and a Jewish inmate who fled together from a concentration camp in Poland. Its working title is Escape from Auschwitz.

A remarkable tribute of remembrance

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

There is no final word on the Holocaust, no final story to tell. Survivor testimonies, biographies, scholarly interpretations and wartime ghetto poetry are just some of the layers that circle around the endlessly unfathomable, great tragedy of the 20th century.

This year alone, several films, including Blind Spot, Hitler's Secretary, The Pianist, Prisoner of Paradise, and now The Last Letter, point to a profound and continued need to understand our present by way of the past through art.

Documentarian Frederick Wiseman addresses this need in The Last Letter, his first fictional feature. Based on a chapter of Russian writer Vasili Grossman's heart-rending novel, Life and Fate, the film began as a play Wiseman directed 15 years ago. (A new theatrical version recently toured Paris and Toronto.) The result is a spare and striking work that belies a complex weave of narratives.

The film is composed of a mother's love letter: ghetto-locked physician Anna Semionovna addresses her son Vitya, a physicist living in Moscow. The Germans have just invaded her Ukrainian town; she tells her beloved son that she'll be dead by the time he receives the letter.

What follows is a chronicle of the last chapter in Anna's life. When the Germans invaded, they forced the Jews into a ghetto, where Anna discovered a newfound communion with other Jews. Then came the terrifying realization that mass graves were being built for them, and the next realization, astonishment: the survival instinct allows life to go on, despite, or in spite of, imminent death.

A recounting at the end of a life will inevitably be infused with musings, reflection, sentimentality and bewilderment, and Anna's letter – a brilliant piece of writing – adds to these qualities a chilling analytic tone. Hers is not a plea to be pitied or remembered, nor is the film striving for easy emotional reaction.

Rather, Anna appeals to her son in the only way she can – by turning her life into a story. Posterity is only an indirect, though significant, consequence.

She remarks that she has considered herself less a Jew than a Russian, and marvels that she would be persecuted for a faith and identity she never held – until now.

She describes life in the ghetto with her new friends as marked by fear, not hopelessness, and tells her son about the little things. She continues to tend to the sick. But she can't look into their eyes anymore; where she once saw physical diseases there, she now sees the soul.

These anecdotes present a dramatically understated character. Veteran stage actress Catherine Samie gives a subtle performance that often touches on the sublime. She is able to cry without sobbing, to describe horrors with the kind of detachment seen in people who have experienced situations just beyond the realm of credulity. With her hoarse voice, dignified but humbled posture, black garb and conspicuous yellow star, she is a visible emblem of both strengths and frailties; she is at once speaking of herself and for many others.

Wiseman's astute cinematography captures this duality – Anna as Individual and Anna as Everyperson – sustaining it right to the last dramatic plunge into darkness. Shot in high contrast black-and-white, Wiseman uses throw lights to cast Samie into shadow, to arresting effect. At times, there are two or three "Anna's" behind the actress; at times, as many as seven or eight. She either faces the camera, full-bodied, in close-ups of hands and crinkled face, or in shadows, as though talking to a vague, fading audience.

In the end, Anna has no answers, but is not overtaken. Brimming with the passion of one who has lived well, she accepts the flaws and flourishes of human nature she has witnessed in the ghetto, and withholds commentary on the evil that is now ending her life – this is her unique power over it.

The Last Letter, or La Dernière Lettre, is a masterfully directed and remarkable tribute to the people behind such stories. It is being screened at Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St. W, March 29, 8:45 p.m., March 30, 4 p.m and April 1, 6:30 p.m. For more information, call 416-968-FILM ext. 2, or visit www.bell.ca/cinematheque. It will then play at Toronto's Regent Theatre on Mount Pleasant Road.

Clowning around in a man's world

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

A weekly competitive improv show in a back room of a tavern at Bloor and Bathurst streets features a new generation of comedians who deliver almost non-stop laughs.

At the show, Catch 23, held at Clinton's Tavern on Monday nights, three teams of two comedians each use the ideas that are shouted to them by a raucous audience to create several skits over the course of an evening.

The "catch" is that each team gets 23 minutes on stage during the night. Points for the skits are awarded by a judge and the audience, whose response is rated by a referee. The team with the most points after four rounds is the winner.

Iron Cobra, the first team on stage on a recent Monday, and the previous week's champions, is made up of Becky Johnson and Graham Wagner. They ask the audience for a setting for their skit and people respond with "Dairy Queen" and "jungle."

Johnson and Wagner use both suggestions in a skit that seems pointless and silly to me. But I'm in the minority. The judge gives it three out of five and the referee determines, by the crowd's hooting, clapping and cheering, that the audience also awards it a three.

Two other teams follow and then Iron Cobra is back for round two. This time, Johnson tells the audience they intend to do something serious. She asks for a subject and an audience member yells "grandmother."

Iron Cobra then does a dialogue between two siblings, talking after their grandmother's funeral. Johnson and Wagner switch roles with lightning speed each time they get a laugh. The audience gives it a three. I'm with the judge, who gives it a four. By intermission, Iron Cobra is leading.

Iron Cobra did win, Johnson tells me later.

At 25, Johnson has been doing improv and comedy for 10 years. She's performed at fringe festivals across Canada, and recently she toured England.

As a high school student in Vancouver, Johnson discovered she had comedic talent and started doing improv, a male-dominated theatrical form in which female comedians are in demand as partners.

"If you're willing to perform with guys, they need women who are funny," she says.

She says performing in a spontaneous and unscripted situation doesn't faze her because she started so young.

After high school and a year at California's Dell'Arte International School of Physical Theatre, Johnson began working in comedy full-time.

Like improv, the comedy scene, in general, attracts mainly men. "It's considered more attractive for men to be funny, rather than women," she says.

Johnson has found jobs plentiful because of the shortage of female comics, but acknowledges that the comedy scene can be "cruel to women" and that male partners are sometimes unsupportive.

Johnson toured her critically acclaimed one-woman show, Underground, across Canada in 2001. Underground stars a clown named Ruby, who Johnson describes as depressed, terrified and lonely.

"Ruby is essentially me, or elements of me expanded," Johnson told Faces in TO last year, "so I'm not that person. I'm not that character, but everything she's concerned with are things I'm concerned with. Her behaviour is not my behaviour, but at the root of it, everyone's clown is sort of themselves."

Johnson is considering creating another full-length show for Ruby, setting her in a world that has been destroyed by a flood. Ruby can sometimes be seen at clown cabarets at Toronto's Clown Hall (clownhall.cyberflunk.com).

Johnson has acted in more than a dozen independent films and had parts so small that she jokes about it on her Web site (becky.theatre-in-a-box.com). Recently, she had substantial roles in The Affected Turtleneck Trio, a film that pokes fun at pretentiousness in the arts scene, and in Secondary High, which she calls "a crazy high school comedy, bizarre and surreal."

Johnson's latest project is Schmigeggy: Nightmare, a stage show developed through improv. Four performers, including Johnson, rehearsed for only 36 hours before the show opened March 15 at The Space, 489 Dupont St. More performances take place at 8:00 p.m., March 21 and 22.

"It's structured improv, but not every line will be scripted," she says.

CANADIAN EMBASSY IN WASHINGTON PRESENTS SHOWCASE OF CANADIAN JEWISH THEATRE

As part of a campaign to promote our national talent, the Canadian Embassy in Washington, D.C. staged a 90-minute showcase of Canadian Jewish theatre last week, as a collaborative effort with the local Theatre J.

The event was meant to bring together "some of Canada's most distinguished playwrights for a brief jaunt through a selection of brand new work on Jewish themes," an embassy statement explained. It occurred March 11 in connection with Spreading Our Wings, a four-day international conference for the Association for Jewish Theatre.

The showcase included scenes from Jason Sherman's new play The Remnant, Anton Piatigorsky's The Eternal Hydra, Howard Wiseman's The Year of the Flood, Kendra Fanconi's The One That Got Away and Jonathan Garfinkle's Walking to Russia.

Brief video clips from Filler Up! by Toronto-based actor Deb Filler, and The Yiddish Theatre's Young Actors for Young Audiences program were also presented, after which Aron and Benji Gonshor of the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre sang. A reception followed. Attendees included conference delegates as well as local theatre professionals.

Co-chairs were Kayla Gordon, artistic director of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, and Bryna Wasserman, artistic director of the Saidye Bronfman Centre Theatre and the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre of Montreal. Artistic directors were Randy Baker and Jenny McConnell.

Ben Ezra Project: Phyllis Lambert, founder of the Canadian Centre for Architecture, presents an illustrated lecture on The Ben Ezra Synagogue Restoration Project, of which she has been the director since 1980. The medieval Cairo synagogue is famous for its dusty Geniza, from which hordes of antiquated Hebrew documents were retrieved. Reception and book-signing to follow. Library and Archives of Canada Auditorium, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa. Free admission. Sunday, March 23, 2 p.m.

AWAKE AND SING:The Bronx: work is scarce, wages are low, poverty is high, companies are corrupt, labourers are enraged and families are desperate. Clifford Odets's Depression-era play about a Jewish family's difficulty during the Depression gets a revival at Equity Showcase Theatre, St. Anne's Parish Hall, 651 Dufferin St., Toronto from March 20 to April 12. Directed by Dean Gabourie, the play features Don Allison, Danielle Bourgon, Heidi Weeks Brown, Adrian Griffin and Aaron Willis. For tickets, times call 416-533-6100 ext. 57. Pictured above is an archival picture of the play's production by The Group Theatre.

Keeping up with the hectic pace of Bangkok

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to The CJN

BANGKOK — Experiences are as important as sightseeing.

It's an hour or so past dawn. So early, it's hard to tell whether the sun will break through the Bangkok smog. It gives me something to think about as I wait in a small courtyard of a Buddhist temple, Keaw Jamfa, in downtown Bangkok.

I'm here to donate food to three young Buddhist monks who have been told of my visit- the only meal they will eat before noon until the next morning.

The temple is modest and not far from the Royal Orchid Sheraton Hotel where I'm staying. The hotel's obliging kitchen prepared and packaged the assortment of allowable food for my donation. Since the monks throughout the country depend daily on these offerings, those who donate add merits to their afterlife.

It would be a stretch to say that this philosophy fits mine, but the generosity of the Thais make this a suitable reason for their serenity.

There are rules while handing over the food –don't touch the monks or their robes, don't look at them which I find difficult since they are so young and sweet faced (I admit, I peek.) And while placing the food in their stainless steel pot, don't take too long.

The still warm plastic bagged cooked rice is placed at the bottom followed by vegetables also packaged and then the still warm chicken. Today the fruit is a banana ending with a small container of water.

Just before they walk off in their flowing saffron robes, I hand them picture- perfect white lotus flowers. It all happens so quickly but I feel spiritual for the rest of the day.

The hotel has arranged with their chef to take me to the very early morning local market.

I take the public "express boat", the city's convenient water bus, on the Chao Phaya River. When the Thais say express it means getting both feet well placed on the boat before it takes off at breakneck speed.

In a bustling city of 10 million, this is probably the fastest means considering the constant traffic jams on the city streets.

However, the Chao Phaya isn't exactly appetizing. It's darkish brown with floating vegetation which I am told, actually grows in the river.

At Memorial Bridge, about 15 minutes from our embarkation, we fast-pace it off the 'bus', walk through a small garden, the last patch of green I'd see for hours, an oasis which seems to make this a cosmic fantasy.

By the time we arrive at the market, about 7.30 a.m., it is still frenetic but the busy time is far earlier.

Chef Charoensri leads the way. He points out his favourite stalls and vendors, the unusual fruits and vegetables. Since I'm searching for curry paste, he suggests a vendor whose dry spices and herbs he considers best.

There are odd shaped and unusual produce such as lemon grass, Kaffir eggplants (tiny little green balls,) dragon fruit, galangal that looks like ginger. The market streets have deep potholes filled with water from the rain during the night plus the washing down of the produce. I hopscotch, stepping and jumping over puddles. Everyone seems in great spirit and it still isn't 8 a.m.

Chef Charoensri warns me about not spending too much time at the meat counters, – a few minutes of seeing the beheading of an animal was long enough – so we make our way to the street filled with colour.

Flowers galore at the famous floral market and so many species , colours I didn't know existed in the world of flora (e.g. black).

Patiently, women sit making the most intricate garlands on wire with jasmine and roses for festive occasions.

After a pre-arranged cooking class at the Royal Orchid, there are still many hours left in the day. I decide to visit the spa belonging to and across the river from the Oriental Hotel.

At the entrance, there is still a mystic silence. Everyone whispers. The appointment is for three hours.

San, the diminutive, waif thin esthetician leads me into a standard-sized room.

There is no time for modesty. San's directive is to undress, lay on the mat. I am covered with a sheet, temporarily. The first application is an extract of chamomile and mint which she spreads over my entire body, except on the paper panty supplied by the spa.

After the shower I am smeared with sterilized seaweed and water. The fishy smell permeates the air until San envelopes me like a sardine, in a plastic cover topped with an electric blanket to "retain the heat and detoxify the body".

This concoction is more difficult to wash off but with strong liquid soap and loofah mitt, the mission is accomplished

She asks if I want a light or heavy Thai massage. I consider her size and confidently say "strong please". Big mistake It's a session I won't forget, nor will my muscles which ached the next day. The palms of her hands press either side of my spine, her fingers find every vein and artery in my legs and arms. I want to shout 'uncle' but I don't think she'd understand this expression.

I can't leave without sourcing the Oriental Hotel shopping arcade. It's a one step luxury retail therapy stop, especially Lotus with the most unique jewelry designs including jewelled scarabs.

With still some time, I visit the small Orthodox Bet Elishiva Synagogue and meet Rabbi Kantor, who is getting ready for a religious holiday meal. There are only about 300 Jewish people in Bangkok.

Junior hockey has been good to Sherry Bassin

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Sherry Bassin has held just about every position imaginable in the Canadian junior hockey ranks, but the opportunity to ply his trade in the millionaires' world of the National Hockey League intrigues him.

The owner and general manager of the defending Ontario Hockey League champion Erie Otters, Bassin was in the running last summer as head of a group interested in taking over the Buffalo Sabres, but the group never did submit a formal bid.

The NHL took over operating control of the club in June after Sabres' owner John Rigas was accused of stealing hundreds of millions of dollars from Adelphia Communications, the cable television company he founded.

The league first awarded Mark Hamister, owner of the Arena Football League's Buffalo Destroyers and chairman of National Health Care, the right to purchase the team, which is under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. But that bid collapsed and Rochester businessman B. Thomas Golisano, owner of Paychex Inc., has reached a deal to take over the team.

Last August, however, it looked like Bassin's group was on the verge of submitting a bid. His chances of moving into an NHL executive suite seemed even more promising when the group added Frank DuRoss, owner of the American Hockey League's Providence Bruins.

But the bid never came to fruition.

Rumours surfaced in Buffalo that Alan Maislin, the Montreal trucking magnate and one of Bassin's money men, couldn't get his house in order.

Sherry Bassin

"We sure mishandled the process," Bassin told the Toronto Sun at the time. "I'm not saying it was him or anyone else. The question within the group was about what it was worth or what the value was. It was an easy, solvable thing. It bogged us down, but there was active, honest interest and capability. You could say we fumbled it."

Bassin said he did "a lot of the preliminary work and research" for his group, and his role in the process was mainly as an advisor.

Bassin, a former Durham College professor in the legal and sports and business administration programs, is widely regarded as having one of hockey's top minds.

Despite that, the only NHL experience on Bassin's resume is a two-year stint as assistant general manager of the Quebec Nordiques before the club moved to Colorado. With his three children growing up at the time, he chose to stay closer to home to spend more time with his family rather than move with the club.

"[The NHL's] the one level I've not been in total charge, but I wasn't going to go there just to satisfy my ego," said Bassin in a telephone interview from his Oshawa home.

"I had other opportunities to get involved in the league, but it's dangerous when your children are younger, because it takes total commitment."

While with the Nordiques, Bassin was involved for the second time in trading Eric Lindros, having previously moved him in junior hockey when he refused to play in Sault Ste. Marie, where Bassin once served as the team's director of operations.

Bassin was a finalist for the general manager's job with the expansion Anaheim Mighty Ducks back in 1993, but he said it was not a good match for him. Jack Ferreira was instead awarded the position.

Bassin hails from Semans, a small community of 400 people in central Saskatchewan, 80 miles from Regina.

He said "you died of boredom" if you didn't play the game where he grew up in Western Canada.

His parents, Mal and Molly, who were married 63 years, brought him up in a strictly kosher home – the family had to have their meat shipped in from Winnipeg. His parents also made sure Bassin took Hebrew lessons, which in his hometown was not an easy task.

Bassin is a pharmacist and lawyer and has a master's degree in hospital administration, but hockey has always been his true passion.

"Hockey's been very good to me," said the two-time Canadian Hockey League executive of the year who has made six trips to the Memorial Cup (winning with the host Soo Greyhounds in 1993) and who won two gold medals with the national junior team.

"It's given me the opportunity to travel North America coast-to-coast and all through Europe."

Bassin has made his mark in junior hockey over the past three decades – as a coach, general manager, league governor and league commissioner.

He is especially proud of his ability to put together championship teams in the three OHL organizations he's worked for.

In Oshawa, where he now owns three restaurants, the club set a modern-day record in the 1980s by having a first-round NHL draft pick five years in a row.

It was matched by Erie in 2001 when the Leafs selected Otters defenceman Carlo Colaiacovo.

"I'm kind of proud having first-place teams in three different locations," said Bassin, whose Otters have won the OHL's Midwest Division regular season title for the the past three years.

"I credit that to surrounding myself with a good, strong staff. A lot of them are good enough to take my job. Not only are they good, capable people, but they're good character people. We make a point of trying to search for that."

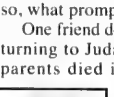
For the second consecutive year, Bialik Hebrew Day School's boys' basketball team has emerged victorious in the Jewish Day School Inter-School Basketball League. The team beat second place Netivot Hatorah in the finals. Pictured here are the excited team members, along with their coach, Charlie Charalambous.

My own Jewish identity



By JODI KOVITZ

I began to question my identity as a Jew after I finished my undergraduate studies. During the shift from the safety of school to the real world, I was able to enjoy new liberties for the first time, but I had to take on adult responsibilities and make scary, life-altering choices on my own. Up until that point, my parents made many decisions for me, such as how I practised Judaism.

Given that I was going through the rite of passage from youth to adulthood, it was natural for me to challenge my Jewish identity along with the rest of my values, beliefs and interests. I asked myself questions such as, "Who am I as a Jew? Am I spirituality fulfilled? Why am I not observant? Should I be? Everything else is changing; don't I have to change my Jewish ways, too?"

I never once doubted my love for being Jewish, my commitment to Israel or my identification culturally as a Jew. But I questioned my place on the spectrum of Jewish observance. I thought I possessed typical Jewish values, but at the same time, I did not feel obliged to be observant. Although I felt somewhat guilty for not being observant, I really didn't understand how others felt compelled to simply start observing Jewish laws if they had not done so before.

As soon as I became interested in exploring my Jewish identity, I became hungry for knowledge. I took classes, attended lectures and read books. I talked to as many people as I could about their experiences building meaningful, spiritually fulfilling Jewish lives. I asked questions such as, "Have you changed how you identify as a Jew? If so, what prompted that change?"

One friend described his experience turning to Judaism after both of his parents died in the same year. He explained, "It was not a conscious choice, it was just in me. I had never felt particularly compelled to be observant, but after my parents died, the only place that I wanted to be was in synagogue. The practice of saying Kaddish gave my collapsing world order when it felt so out of control."

Another friend who lives in New York said she turned to Judaism after the Sept. 11 attacks. "My world was shaken," she said. "My self-concept was up in the air as I began to question what my priorities had been prior to Sept. 11 and what I wanted them to be going forward. I found both comfort and direction through immersing myself in an Orthodox way of life."

After a three-year search, I remain a non-observant Reform Jew. I found that I did not have to "change" my identity or my Jewish practice to become more spiritually fulfilled. If and when I need to make that change, I think I will know it, as others have discovered and described to me. To find spiritual fulfillment, I simply had to ask the right questions and explore the many answers out there. This process in itself was spiritual and nurturing for someone who is not committed to observance.

I also found comfort in my Jewish identity at a time when my life was in a state of flux. I guess sometimes what we are looking for can be right in front of us. I continue to welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

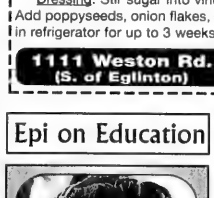
Epi on Education



Seymour Epstein

Purim is, and always has been, one of my favourite holidays. Yet there is something problematic about our current Purim celebrations. We think of the holiday as having special significance for children because of the masks and costumes and carnival-like atmosphere that have permeated our parties. While educators are obliged to make all Jewish life relevant to children, we have perhaps at times overdone it at the expense of an adult understanding and appreciation of our rituals and traditions.

Purim is not a simple victory holiday. Earlier scholars noted that the mitzvot of Chanukah are primarily spiritual (lighting the chanukiah and reciting Hallel – this before Chanukah gelt!) while Purim customs are mostly material (mishloach manot, matanot le'evyonim and the seudah).

One explanation for this difference is that on Chanukah our souls were threatened, while on Purim our bodies were at risk. Indeed, the victory celebration in Megillat Esther is one of drinking and feasting rather than of prayer or thanksgiving. The famous rabbinic order to become so intoxicated that we do not distinguish between the villain Haman and the hero Mordecai is also very strange. The medieval burlesques and parodies that were written for Purim, some of which rewrite our most sacred hymns and prayers in a jocular tone, are another sign that we always knew that the victory of Esther, Mordecai and the Jews of Achashverosh's kingdom was a somewhat shallow victory. These complexities are not easily communicated to children.

As with all Jewish ritual, it is important to make as much of it as possible relevant to children while maintaining an adult appreciation that is more complex. If we practise "pediatric Judaism," our young people will later reject a religion that ceases to be relevant once they have matured into adulthood.

One piece of Purim Torah that both adults and young people can appreciate is the teaching that Purim will outlast Yom Kippur in the days of the Messiah. That is because Yom Kippurim is a day like Purim (Ki Purim is Hebrew for "like Purim"), but Pùrim is the genuine article.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Innocence and incongruity

As American and British forces were moving towards Baghdad last week, these Israeli schoolchildren, above, received their gas mask kits at school, which they innocently carry as if the boxes were mere schoolyard toys. The incongruity of the moment appears lost on the children, but not on the soldier, below, explaining how the gas masks should be worn. [Israel photos]

CIC to Graham: hit Iran with sanctions

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Bill Graham
Israel photo

Canada should impose economic sanctions against Iran, a Canada-Israel Committee delegation suggested at a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham in Ottawa last week.

Although he "recognizes the danger" Iran poses to the countries of the Middle East, Graham did not commit Canada to sanctions, said Joe Wilder, CIC's national chair.

Wilder said Iran was the chief topic on the agenda. "We spent the most time talking on Iran."

Asked to comment on the meeting, a spokesperson for Graham said Canada intends to preserve its "multilateral approach" to Iran.

In a reference to the recent imprisonment of Iranian Jews, Isabelle Savard said Canada strongly condemns Iran's violations of human rights, but is hopeful these practices can be ended by the strong reform movement in Iran.

Canada's bilateral relationship with Israel was also discussed at length during the 1¼-hour meeting.

Wilder said Graham promised to do whatever he can to strengthen Canada's relations with Israel, at a time when the Jewish state is isolated diplomatically and a war rages in Iraq.

"I found him very supportive and thanked him for it," said Wilder, referring to Graham's commitment to bolster Canada-Israel ties.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Israel Travel Advisory

OTTAWA — The Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) is advising Canadians to avoid travel to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. In light of the war in Iraq and "international uncertainties," Canadians in Israel, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are being advised to leave immediately. DFAIT said Canadians who choose to remain in these areas should avoid crowded places, not use public transportation and avoid large gatherings. The United States has issued a similar advisory to its citizens.

ISRAEL

Kuwait Discriminates

JERUSALEM — Reporters Without Borders, a French-based watchdog group dedicated to freedom of the press, is criticizing Kuwait for its discriminatory policy against Israeli journalists. The group said Kuwait had notified foreign journalists in the country that any co-operation with the Israeli media would lead to legal action against them. The group asked that visas and accreditations be issued to any Israeli journalist who requests them. U.S. authorities estimate at least 1,000 journalists from around the world have been accredited with allied forces stationed in Kuwait, but none are Israeli.

Saddam Cuts Cheques

JERUSALEM — Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein distributed $260,000 (US) to families of Palestinian suicide bombers March 12 in cheques of $10,000 each, Israeli officials said. The money brings the total amount Iraq has contributed to the Palestinian intifadah to more than $35 million, Israel says.

Israeli Arabs Suffocate

KUFR KASSEM — An Israeli Arab woman and her two teenage sons suffocated while sleeping in a sealed room the family had prepared in case of an Iraqi attack. The woman, 37, and her 13- and 14-year-old sons died from lack of oxygen last week due to a coal-run heater they used to warm the room. The family's father and two smaller children survived.

Mock Sharon Execution

JERUSALEM — Israeli police arrested two Jewish teens who allegedly pointed a toy gun at another boy dressed as Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. The mock execution took place at a memorial ceremony in the West Bank last week by right-wing extremists at the grave of Baruch Goldstein, who killed 29 Muslim worshippers in 1994 and then was beaten to death. One of the youths was held for allegedly assaulting police and the other was released after questioning.

Cannon Unearthed

JAFFA — Workers renovating Jaffa's flea market have discovered a two-metre long, 30-centimetre wide cannon believed to have been used by Napoleon Bonaparte when he broke through Jaffa's city walls in 1799. It's one of many unexpected discoveries, mostly from the Crusader period, unearthed during the $5-million (US) renovation.

WORLD

Student Attacked

PARIS — French police have opened an investigation after a 20-year-old Jewish law student was attacked earlier this month by masked men who engraved a Star of David on her arm. Police said three men attacked the woman, "probably with a set of keys," outside her home in the southern city of Aix-en-Provence. Earlier that evening, she had participated in a debate at a local cinema after the screening of a film on media coverage of the Mideast conflict and had expressed indignation that Palestinian children are involved.

Deadline Extended

NEW YORK — The deadline to file claims to receive money from Holocaust-era insurance policies has been extended to Sept. 30. The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims said the extension would allow time to publish more names of people whose policies were not fulfilled. The insurance program was part of a deal signed last October by the commission and a German foundation.

Blacklisted Author Dies

NEW YORK — Best-selling U.S. author Howard Fast, who wrote more than 80 books, including such novels as Citizen Tom Paine (1943) and Spartacus (1953), died March 12 in Greenwich, Conn. at 88. Fast, whose historical fiction featured themes of human rights and freedom, was blacklisted in the 1950s for having been a Communist party member and for refusing to co-operate with the U.S. House Un-American Activities Committee.

Mel Gibson Movie Controversy

NEW YORK — The father of movie star Mel Gibson has minimized the Holocaust and denied that the Al Qaeda terrorist network was behind the Sept. 11 attacks.

In a recent New York Times Magazine article about the actor's upcoming movie on the crucifixion of Jesus, Hutton Gibson denied six million Jews were killed in the Holocaust, describing it as logistically impossible.

"To bigots and anti-Semites, no amount of evidence or scientific proof is ever enough," said Rabbi Marvin Hier of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles.

Meanwhile, Mel Gibson told Fox News recently his self-financed film The Passion is meant to just tell the truth about "why Christ came, why he was crucified."

The Gibsons belong to a strict Catholic group that believes the Vatican erred in 1965 in issuing the Nostra Aetate, which said the Romans, and not the Jews, killed Jesus. Jewish leaders have warned Gibson against reviving a central canard behind centuries of anti-Semitism.

Federation may expedite annual campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is prepared to swing into action within "a week or two" to launch its annual campaign if circumstances warrant.

The campaign, which raises money for Israel and the local Jewish community, normally begins at the end of August, said spokesperson Howard English, UJA Federation's director of marketing and communications. But last week, even before United States President George W. Bush issued his ultimatum and launched his first strike against Iraq, federation staff and lay people were discussing hypothetical scenarios for Israel's involvement in the war that could have an impact on the campaign.

"We all hope Israel won't be involved, but if Israel is involved or if Israel is harmed by the war, we will likely have to accelerate the campaign, much as we did last year," said English. Campaign 2003 began last April because of urgent needs in Israel, and raised $67 million.

Campaign 2004 will be strongly based on what English termed three "planks:" supporting Israel's ongoing needs for assistance to victims of terror and strengthening its weakened social service system; countering the world-wide spread of anti-Israel hatred, which is often combined with anti-Semitism; and giving "a new generation of Jewish young people in high school and university the tools to deal with a disturbing new reality."

Although a "significant portion" of the money collected still supports social services here, "we see the campaign as a united Jewish global effort on behalf of Israel and the Jewish people," said English.

"We are working very hard to develop a global action plan in conjunction with Jewish communities around the world to support Israel."

Two eye-catching magazines

In an attempt to counter the campaign being waged in some European and North American quarters to isolate Israeli authors and writers, The CJN in this space, in the last issue of each month, features Israeli works. This month, I draw our readers' attention to two outstanding Israeli publications.

For anyone interested in nature, the environment, geography, travel, hiking and most other aspects of outdoors life, Eretz is a total delight. Published every two months, the magazine is a cornucopia of well-written, highly instructive articles on an eclectic range of subjects. Each issue contains specialist, tour guide-quality information about unexplored sites, paths and trails that are off the beaten track. Even with the plethora of exciting stories, however, what anchors the magazine are the excellent, eye-popping, colourful photographs from the vast, mostly undiscovered, panorama that is Israeli life, history and geography.

The most recent issue, No. 86, February-March 2003 is typical of the magazine's rich offerings.

It contains four feature stories – on the ancient cemetery in Safed, antique tractor collecting, a challenging hike in the Negev Highlands and Benjamin Disraeli's fateful visit to the Holy Land.

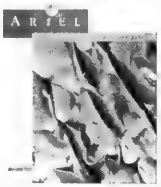
Each is written deftly in an easy style that settles comfortably between travelogue and graduate school essay. The article about Disraeli, for example, called Grand Tour, recounts his visit to the Holy Land in 1830. It combines narrative, description, history and geography.

"'The next day we commenced our journey over the delightful plain, bounded in the distance by the severe and savage mountains of Judea. In the wild stony ravines of these shaggy rocks, we were wandering the whole day; at length after crossing a vast hill, we saw the Holy City…'

"Disraeli spent only a week in Jerusalem, but the visit appears to have affected him deeply. His first description of the city, in a letter to his sister Sarah, and later repeated almost verbatim in his book Contarini Fleming, is a detailed and emotional description of the view of the city from the Mount of Olives.

"'Jerusalem,' he wrote, 'is entirely surrounded by an old feudal wall with towers and gates of the times of the Crusaders and in perfect preservation. As the town is built upon a hill, you can from the opposite height discern the roof of almost every house. In the front is the magnificent mosque built upon the site of the Temple, with its beautiful garden and fantastic gates – a variety of domes and towers arise in all directions, the houses are of a bright stone.

"'I was thunderstruck…'"



In addition to the features, there are also the usual collection of travel and other anecdotes, vignettes, and of course, the heart-stopping photography.

The editor in chief of Eretz is Yadin Roman. Further information about the magazine is available at www.eretz.com. Its e-mail address is eretz@eretz.co.il.

Ariel is a more venerable publication. A review of arts and letters in Israel, it appeared for the first time in 1962. Originally, a quarterly, it now appears, alas, less regularly. The result, however, has been heightened anticipation between each volume.

The early volumes are now collectors' items, attainable, if at all, only in antiquarian book shops or in university libraries. Each volume is a veritable treasure trove of insightful, incisive writing on subjects ranging from agriculture, archeology, architecture and art to museums, music, natural history, theatre, and Zionism.

The collected pages of the journal are a chronicle of the development of the art and soul of the people of Israel from before the creation of the state to modern times.

Moreover, the collection of the writers whose works have appeared in the journal are a Who's Who of the academic, scientific and literary establishment of the Jewish world.

Literary giants such as Natan Alterman, Yehuda Amichai, Aharon Appelfeld, Chaim Nachman Bialik, to name just a few have all been published in Ariel.

With the advent of Volume 100 in 1998, the editors of journal changed the magazine's format somewhat. Each volume became dedicated to a specific theme, although not all the articles and other items appearing in the volume are necessarily part of that theme.

In recent years, there have been issues exploring the state of the arts in Israel, Jerusalem at 3000, Hebrew today, Israel and Islam, Israel and Christianity, New Israeli Literature, and Jerusalem Then and Now.

The theme of the most recent volume, No. 114, is contemporary Hebrew poetry and music. The editor of Ariel is Asher Weill. It is published in English, French, German, Russian, Spanish and Arabic editions. It is accessible on the Internet at www.mfa.gov.il. To subscribe, write to Youval Tal Ltd., POB 61009, Jerusalem 91610.

A RUSSIAN PURIM: These kids might be just clowning around, but organizers of a recent Purim banquet at the Paradise Banquet Hall had a special reason to smile. The Jewish Russian Community Centre's (JRCC) huge Purim event attracted 580 adults and more than 200 children. The catered banquet featured live music, clowns and a traditional Purim shpiel (comedy skit) put on by JRCC rabbis. The Jewish Russian community also celebrated the holiday with a number of Megillah readings, parties and masquerades attended by more than 1,000 people in a variety of venues.

Mould forces Miles Nadal JCC to close doors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Miles Nadal Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has been closed temporarily following the discovery of mould.

Tests by an abatement company hired by the JCC confirmed that black stains on the ceiling tiles in the men's health club and women's general locker room were mould, said Naomi Rose, the centre's recently appointed executive-director. The findings prompted closure of the centre's basement level and a few days later, when subsequent tests found traces of mould in the front lobby, the boardroom and the pool area, the entire building was closed.

The building will remain shut until the situation is brought under control and it receives a clean bill of health from experts. So far, no one's health appears to have been affected, Rose said.

Mould, which is a type of fungus, can be found in buildings with a history of water leaks, floods, fires and problems with indoor air quality, states an advisory from Ontario's Minister of Labour.

"The most common types of mould are generally not hazardous to healthy individuals, but some moulds may be hazardous to certain individuals," the ministry states. "People who have asthma, bronchitis, hay fever, other allergies, or have weakened immune systems are more likely to react to mould. The most common symptoms are runny nose, eye irritation, skin rash, cough, congestion and aggravation of asthma. Symptoms usually disappear after mould exposure stops. Most often, there are no known long-term consequences to workplace exposures."

An inspector from the city's department of health – apparently called in by a centre member – examined the facility along with the JCC's contractors, and the JCC has been co-operating fully with the department in its attempt to address the situation, Rose said. The Ontario Occupational Health and Safety Act requires employers to ensure the health and safety of workers, including protection from mould in workplace buildings.

Bloor facility to remain shut until situation brought under control

"The JCC is taking all possible steps to rectify the situation," Rose said. "We're actively going above and beyond the suggestions of the department of health because for us, health and safety is the number one priority for our staff and members."

The basement has been sealed off from the rest of the building by plastic sheeting and the use of negative air pressure to keep mould spores from encroaching on other areas. In the meantime, the JCC has advanced its renovation plans, which would have seen the entire basement area undergo a substantial upgrade as part of the centre's $12.4 million renovation. The centre had already determined that its original plan to merely make cosmetic changes in the basement was insufficient because the building's plumbing, heating, ventilation and air conditioning systems were so antiquated they required a complete refit. But with the discovery of the mould, the decision was made to gut the basement and, in effect, start from scratch, Rose said.

The amended plan will add about $2.6 million to the renovation costs, she said.

The short-term plan is to remove all traces of mould in the main level (there is none on the second floor) and re-open the building as soon as possible. That will make the gym, aerobics studios and weight rooms available to members. But the basement, which contains the men's and women's locker rooms, will remain closed until December or January 2004, when the work is expected to be completed, Rose said.

Rose acknowledged closure of the building for that length of time will disrupt members' activities, but said the JCC is attempting to enter into a temporary arrangement with a sports club nearby to provide its members with an alternate venue until the JCC is fully operational.

The centre's executive offices, which were moved to an office building down Spadina Avenue prior to the renovation plan, are unaffected while the Downtown Day School has been operating in a rented building nearby for some time. The supplemental school, which holds classes in the JCC on Sunday and Wednesday, uses rooms on the floors where no mould has been found, she said.

Discovery of the mould has not affected renovation plans in other areas of the building, Rose said. Two retail outlets, a newsstand and a dry cleaners remain open for business, with access only from Bloor Street, while other tenants, including Second Cup, are expected to move in to their Bloor Street fronts in a matter of weeks.

Renovation to create a 300-seat theatre in what was the auditorium will continue as will upgrades to the second floor offices and classrooms. These are expected to be completed sometime in May or June.

Palestinian state possible despite war, says scholar

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Despite the current climate of war and hostility, a viable two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict can be achieved, a leading Israelis scholar says.

"I think we should be optimistic," said Israeli political science professor Yaron Ezrahi, who was the guest speaker at the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies at the University of Toronto last week.

"The potential for collaboration is very promising."

Ezrahi, a senior fellow of the Israel Democracy Institute, said the current situation has left Israeli soldiers demoralized and civilians under constant threat of attack.

Yaron Ezrahi

He said some of his students who serve in the army tell him they feel they are "controlling another people" and do not support defending land that they do not believe belongs to Israel.

By creating two states, Ezrahi said, Israel will finally have defined borders, which will ameliorate territorial disputes.

"Soldiers will be able to know exactly where is the home they are defending," Ezrahi said.

He believes a two-state solution will diminish the role of religion in Israel's internal and foreign politics, while "continuing Israel's historic and religious tradition."

Ezrahi added the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel could boost Israel's sagging economy.

He did not map out the logistics of this two-state solution, but he said he believes there is a will to agree on final borders.

But he said he doesn't envision any Israeli government agreeing to dismantle Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"They're not willing to pay the political price [for evacuating them]," Ezrahi said.

Ezrahi cited the differences between the way former Israeli prime ministers Yitzhak Shamir, Benjamin Netanyahu, Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres dealt with the Palestinians.

"Shamir and Netanyahu take the position that the Arab world has to first be democratic before we can trust them," Ezrahi said.

Conversely, Rabin and Peres sought to negotiate with the Palestinians.

Ezrahi referred to the latter approach as "instrumental and pragmatic," while stating that the "pessimistic" mindset in the Shamir/Netanyahu approach "can only lead to paralysis."

He conceded that Islamic groups committed to Israel's destruction, such as Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, have gained significant clout among Palestinians during the current intifadah.

But he said Hezbollah "exploits the Israeli-Palestinian conflict for its own needs in Lebanon... and will be seriously disempowered by a two-state solution."

Ezrahi was asked to predict the potential impact of a U.S. war in Iraq on the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

If the Americans pound Iraq heavily, "America's standing in the Middle East could be damaged," which could result in a diminishing of the American role in Israel-Palestinian negotiations, Ezrahi said.

Ezrahi is currently teaching about democratic theory and Israeli political practice at the University of Toronto.

His most recent book, Rubber Bullets: Power and Conscience in Modern Israel, received positive reviews in the New York Times and Washington Post.

Webcast of CJC Ontario plenary to be available

The 2003 triennial Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region plenary is set to take place March 30 at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St.

The day-long event includes the Premier's Luncheon with keynote speaker Elizabeth Witmer, deputy premier and minister of education of Ontario.

She will present three awards, including the Louis Lenkinski Memorial Award to former Ontario premier Bob Rae, in recognition of outstanding commitment to the improvement of the human condition in the areas of human rights, community service and social justice in Ontario; the Alan Coatsworth Memorial Award to the late Irving Himil – it will be accepted by his son Richard – for his significant contribution in the area of interfaith relations.

Elizabeth Witmer

The Senpo Sugihara Humanitarian Award, given in partnership with the National Association of Japanese Canadians (Toronto chapter), which honours a student for extraordinary work in the area of anti-racism or acts of humanitarianism, will be presented to Milad Francies.

Also featured is a political panel featuring an MPP from the three provincial parties discussing Jewish advocacy issues including Jewish day school funding; and a forum titled Cyber-Activism: the Internet and Political Action, led by Marc Saltzman from CFRB's Tech Talk and Mark Goldberg, a leading Canadian Internet expert.

For the first time, those unable to attend the plenary can log onto a Webcast at www.cjcont.ca. Prior to the event, they must register with Bruce Kurta at 416-635-2883, ext. 148, to receive a sign-in name and password.

A high-speed Internet connection is preferable; with a dialup, those logged in will be able to receive excellent sound but only poorer quality video.

They should make sure they have the following two programs loaded onto their computer: Microsoft IE6 and Microsoft Media Play 7 or above. For those that don't, free programs can be downloaded at www.cjcont.ca.

This is an interactive event, and those participating via the Internet will be able to pose questions to any of the speakers.

"I prayed for a miracle.... I found hypnosis and lost 71 pounds!"

My name is Marjorie Garst. I lost a remarkable 71 lbs. in eight short months without dieting. I went from a chubby size 20 to a trim size 10! This is my true story.

BEFORE

I had read the hypnosis ads. Frankly, I was skeptical. It seemed too good to be true. Now it's happened to me.

I dreaded my yearly visits to the doctor. My weight was climbing by ten or more pounds a year. My blood pressure and cholesterol were sky high. My joints were stiff and ached constantly. I could barely lift myself out of a chair. My health was in jeopardy. Yet I couldn't stop eating. I was a career snacker. I lived on sweets and pop. With every expansion of my hips and thighs my self-confidence withered. I was embarrassed.

Dieting was the most confusing and frustrating experience of my life. Diets made me crave and binge. The only way I lost weight was by starving myself.

Immediate Results. I was nervous when I called for the appointment. I didn't want to be pressured, but the high-pressure sales pitch never came.

My hunger pangs disappeared after my first session. My taste for pop vanished. I found myself craving healthy foods. My taste buds came alive.

One day I walked through the grocery store and marched right past the bakery, candy, chips and pop. That's when I was convinced. Hypnosis had completely changed my tastes.

Doctor's Delight! My last visit to my doctor confirmed my 71-pound weight loss. For the first time in my life my blood work and cholesterol are normal without pills!

I feel fantastic. No more aches and pains. No more cravings or binges. Best of all, hypnosis eliminated dieting for good!

Self-Confidence Soars! When the weight came off I felt better about myself. Hypnosis helped me relax. I gained a feeling of inner peace. I was back in control of my life.

My entire family has changed thanks to hypnosis. My son lost 30 pounds. My 83-year-old mother lost 18 pounds.

Twenty Years Younger. Recently I spent the best day of my life filling two giant boxes with fat clothes I'll never wear again. People say I look twenty years younger. I have tons of energy. I'm light on my feet. I have a social life! I owe it all to the power of hypnosis.

Invaluable! I believe in hypnosis. I've met lots of other people who are getting results like mine. They've shed 50, 60, even 90 pounds with ease.

Call now and schedule your free weight loss consultation. Ask about the no-risk guarantee.

I know how much it hurts to be overweight, but you don't have to suffer any more. Hypnosis worked for me, and it can work for you. Call now.

Rendering hollow the word 'ally'

All decent, sentient, humane individuals abhor war. Beyond trite is the maxim that "war is hell." But all decent, sentient, humane individuals will also acknowledge that in certain instances, war is necessary. In the hard-scrabble compromise between pragmatism and principle, self-interest and collective interest, expedience and morality, falls the balance to which sound, national policy concerning the waging of war, must always aspire.

But the balance that passes itself off as Canadian policy toward the war being waged in Iraq is no balance at all. It tilts impotently and shamefully to one side. And the result we are witnessing, regrettably, is the reconfiguration of traditional, historic Canadian alliances.

In January 1991, on the eve of the first Gulf War, the leader of the Opposition, Jean Chrétien, told the House of Commons his party supported the use of Canadian forces to enforce UN-endorsed sanctions against Iraq, but that our soldiers should be withdrawn immediately if war breaks out. The Liberal leader mocked the idea of committing troops to the conflict. "If each time a country is invaded and each time the rights of the citizens of a certain republic are violated by invasions, is it necessary to make war?"

Twelve years later, on the eve of the second Gulf War, now sitting as the prime minister of the country, Jean Chrétien has again decided that Canadian forces should not join in the fighting. "Where do you stop?" he asked an interviewer rhetorically, rejecting the idea that Saddam Hussein and his regime must be deposed for the sake of world peace and security.

Thus, Chrétien's opposition to war against Saddam has been consistent. But it has also been wrong.

The sadism, brutality, malevolence of Saddam's regime are not at issue. Nor is his oft-expressed and oft-attempted ambition to annihilate any peoples and countries that stand in his way. Only the imminence of the danger he poses to others, not the fact of the danger, has ever been at issue. (If even once, anti-war demonstrators protested against Saddam's regime, as they have against the United States, they would gain higher moral ground.)

The prime minister has said the war against Iraq is not justified without the approval of the Security Council. But in light of the transparent, hypocritical posturing at the UN, approval of the Security Council at any time in the future was hardly assured. Indeed, given the promise by France to veto a second council resolution "no matter what," it was probably impossible.

In choosing to seek the shelter of the Security Council's ineffective umbrella rather than to stand with the principled determination of the American and British-led coalition, Chrétien has probably set a course that will alter Canada's relationships with our historic Anglo-American allies and in the process, alas, render hollow any meaning, depth and value to the term "ally."

Should narrow Belgium debate

I would like, as a surviving hidden child of Belgium, to respond to George Bernstein's comments on Belgium's World War II record (CJN, Letters, March 6).

Some 25,000 Belgian Jews were sent to Auschwitz and, of those, about 1,000 survived.

Close to 10,000 Jewish children, myself included, were rescued by the Belgian people during the Nazi occupation of that country.

I'm aware that there is anger at Belgium because of its demands that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon be tried in one of its courts because of baseless Palestinian allegations that he was responsible for the Sabra and Shatila massacres. However, I do not believe we are serving any useful purpose in discussing anything other than the issues surrounding Belgium's rights to indict, for any reason, anyone anywhere in the world.

Canadian beans, but not kosher

Regarding Heinz Canada dropping some kosher designations, here's the funny thing (CJN, March 20, "Heinz Canada trims kosher product line"). I am holding a can of baked beans with a green label and kosher certification that we recently purchased in the United States. It also says "product of Canada" on the label. So if Heinz beans are made in Canada, why did they drop the kosher designation on their Canadian product line?

When you visit the Heinz U.S. Web site, they proudly display the number of kosher products their company produces and distributes, but there is no such kosher reference on the Canadian Web site. It makes you wonder sometimes.

Sublime music, misguided politics

I read David Silverberg's article on the Kuerti family with interest (CJN, Feb. 20, "Feeling for music runs deep as Kuerti family takes the stage"). I had not been aware of the fact that Anton Kuerti's wife, Kristine Bogyo, and his sons Julian and Rafael were also musicians, and accomplished ones at that. The article was a very fine description of what undoubtedly is a very talented family. To see such praise bestowed so generously by The CJN on this musical family was also gratifying.

Still, as I was reading the article, I became uneasy. I recalled that at one of Anton Kuerti's brilliant and breathtaking performances at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa a couple of years ago, he gave an impromptu political speech in which he denounced Israel's treatment of Israeli Arabs and Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. His words came down like a sledgehammer and were out of context with the musical program that I had come to attend. His speech was one-sided, unbalanced, misleading, inappropriate, incredulous and misguided.

Let us hope that in the future, none of the Kuerti clan makes similar political remarks at public forums intended for the enjoyment of music.

Omissions filled in

I want to correct the impression created by an article of mine you recently published about a new partnership between York University and UIA Canada Israel Experience (CJN, March 6, "Teaching the Zionist Narrative: One solution – 'Teaching that never became sentimental or self-absorbed'"). Unfortunately, editorial decisions of which I was unaware led to the omission of recognition for the bodies who made possible this initiative to connect the worlds of formal and informal Jewish education.

The project was launched with the support of both the Charles and Andrea Bronfman Philanthropies, through the Institute for Informal Jewish Education at Brandeis University and the Jewish Agency in Israel. The involvement of these bodies was as important to the project's success as was the educational creativity of the Canada Israel Experience team in Toronto and Israel.

Your March 20 editorial "Mandate sought," about the upcoming Quebec elections, missed many developments that contradict your simplistic argument that "it's really about separatism." On the contrary, Quebecers now enjoy more political choices, since they are solicited by three major political parties, instead of the traditional and predictable two.

Outright separation of Quebec from Canada is advocated only by the Parti Quebecois, but the issue has never been lower on its to-do list. The right-of-centre-and-vaguely-nationalist Action démocratique du Québec (ADQ) has imposed a moratorium on the issue. The Liberals won't even propose ways to modernize the Canadian constitution. For the first time in years, the campaign revolves around such bread-and-butter issues as flexible working conditions to help families (PQ), school vouchers, flat tax rate and privatization (ADQ), improving public health care (Liberal party).

Quebeckers have rejected separation twice, but the increase of the "yes" position between the two referendums (40 per cent in 1980, 49 per cent in 1995) fully justifies the PQ's determination to eventually confirm or reverse the trend "once and for all."

On the government of Canada

Canadian Jews should rethink alliances

By HENRY SREBRNIK

Let me share with CJN readers an anecdote that, I believe, speaks to the tunnel vision we Jews in Canada exhibit politically. In the winter of 2000, while on vacation in Florda, I was criticizing the Liberal party's attitudes towards the Middle East to my mother in a small fruit store in Hallandale. I suggested that we should not remain forever the captives of one political party. This was, remember, before Sept. 11, 2001.

A Jewish woman from Montreal, standing near us, overheard me and told me she was a "proud Liberal." She continued, in a rather belligerent tone, "Well, who else would you support? Preston Manning? He's a dictator!"

As we know, not long afterward, Manning put his leadership of the Reform party, which he had founded, on the line and lost it. So much for being a dictator.

For reasons that the readers of the CJN are familiar with, and therefore do not bear reiterating, the vast majority of Jews in North America have, for the past century, been overwhelmingly and consistently liberal in their political outlook, typically providing electoral support to the Liberal party here in Canada and to the Democratic party in the United States.

However, due to the increasing identification of large segments of the liberal left with the anti-Israel movement, one that has been gaining strength since the second Palestinian intifadah began in 2000, studies in the United States show that many American Jews have been moving into the Republican party, which is perceived as being more pro-Israel and also more willing to confront Saddam Hussein and remove him from power.

In Canada, the Liberals are, if anything, far less favourable to the Jewish state, and more agnostic on the question of military action against Iraq, than are the Democrats in the United States, yet Canadian Jews seem politically paralyzed, unable to contemplate the notion of voting for those who are more robust in defending Israel and opposing Saddam. We also have few counterparts to the high-profile neoconservative intellectuals who play such a prominent role in America's political conversation.

It is true that Jews have traditionally been wary of Christian fundamentalists, but the religious right wields much greater influence over policy formulation in the Republican party than it does among Canadian conservatives, and yet this is proving less of an impediment to Jewish political realignment south of the border.

So what accounts for this curious state of affairs? Why do we as a community exhibit such political inertia and remain captives of the ruling party? Why are we so easily frightened by those politicians who benefit from this state of affairs into accepting the prevailing dogmas about what constitutes "legitimate" political orthodoxy in this country, thus rendering the opposition parties beyond the ideological pale? Why are we unable to think "outside the box?"

Is it perhaps because Jews in Canada are overwhelmingly concentrated in Ontario and Quebec, where the Canadian Alliance and Progressive Conservatives have little appeal?

Do Jews in this country feel less secure and thus less willing to "rock the boat" by defying current political convention?

This is a defining moment for our community. Israel is in greater danger now than at any time in its history and this is no time for Jews to be timid. In World War II, those on the far left (during the period Stalin was allied with Hitler) took a "plague on both their houses" approach, defining it as an "imperialist" war pitting an equally evil western alliance against the Axis powers, while those on the right opposed to fighting Hitler called it a "Jews' war."

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien angrily responds to questions in the House of Commons as the caucus applauds him. Chrétien said Canada would not participate in any war on Iraq without UN approval.

Neither was willing to stand up to the Nazis before it was too late and sadly, as we all know, it turned out to be a war against the Jews. Will history repeat itself, with anti-Zionism the new version of political anti-Semitism and Israel the intended victim?

In an article published in the Globe and Mail on Feb. 24, Preston Manning, wrote that "George W. Bush and Tony Blair, whether you agree with them or not, are proposing action with respect to Iraq on a scale commensurate with the problem." Canada too, he continued, "needs a government that doesn't think small when it comes to matters of war and peace."

The Tory leader, Joe Clark, was in Washington the last weekend in February, meeting with State Department officials, and said the erosion in Canadian-American ties was quite evident, thanks to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's confusing and ambivalent Iraq policy over the past three months.

Given this reality, should we continue putting all our political eggs in one basket? Is this really a healthy state of affairs for our community?

Is it a wonder that, in comparison with decades past, we are now taken for granted and are much diminished in our political clout? We Jews, like all other Canadians, need to heed the message of all political parties.

Liberals' policies increasingly irrelevant

By BEN ARCHIBALD

The drift of Canada's foreign policy from irrelevancy to an outright anti-Americanism bereft of logic and substance should be deeply troubling to all Canadians.

Some will label the remarks of Liberal MP Carolyn Parrish, who referred to Americans as "bastards," and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's former prime ministerial spokesperson Francoise Ducros, who called U.S. President George W. Bush a "moron," as unfortunate. But the comments made by these government representatives reflect Chrétien's arrogant and uninformed leadership. Chrétien's government has not challenged American policy on its merits. Rather, in a bid to define Canada and its fragile identity, the prime minister continues to define policy in a reactive fashion, clashing unnecessarily with Canada's largest trading partner and strongest ally. That reactionary policy allows the government to maintain its image as a force for moderation. But it is simply that: image. The substance of Canadian policy is a comedy of errors, ranging from the prime minister's attendance this past fall at the Francophonie summit along with Hezbollah leader Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah to the ad hominem attacks on Bush by Chrétien's caucus and confidantes.

While Canadian policy continues to be framed as anything and everything that is "not American," it demonstrates a stubborn indifference to post-9/11 dangers presented by terror and its mendacious ways.

The lingering question is, how long can the prime minister continue to play the double game of benefiting from Canada's close trading relationship with the United States while simultaneously opposing American foreign policy initiatives? The answer may be startling to some: not much longer.

It is one thing to disagree with American foreign policy when you articulate an alternative that promotes security and freedom. It is an entirely different matter when a nation with a chronically under-funded military force of 50,000 troops and an economy that is dependent on trade with a market of 280 million consumers constantly criticizes that market, all the while knowing if they were ever under real threat, those same people they attack would leap to their defence. Most unfortunate is the level of debate taking place within the Canadian government and the incredible level of apathy exhibited by the Canadian electorate. Chrétien's government consistently voted with the Arab and non-aligned nations in the UN, incessantly criticized American policy on Iraq, and most startling, had to be pressured into banning Hezbollah as a terrorist organization.

Ostensibly, these positions could carry substantive weight and a measure of legitimacy if they were accompanied by coherent policy guidelines that defined Canadian values and the objectives of Canadian policy. However, Canadian policy has in the main not been coherent of late, resulting in embarrassing situations such as the prime minister's obvious ignorance about Hezbollah and about the very real threat this group poses to international security.

A post-9/11 democracy cannot frame policy in a reactive fashion in order to create an identity for itself. It is unacceptable that the prime minister sit with the head of Hezbollah while the people in his inner circle and political party refer to Americans as "bastards" and their president a "moron." If Canada is "not American," it must articulate its difference through the substantive values and principles that are unique to Canadian democracy.

By failing in this regard, Canada is ruining its important friendship with America while simultaneously cheapening its own standing as a country with a moderate voice worthy of serious consideration. It is time for the well-heeled in Ottawa to recognize that they cannot have it both ways. The Canadian government cannot engage in anti-Americanism in order to score cheap political points and continue to benefit from America's economic and military might. The result of this wrong-headed non-policy is severe damage to Canada's relationship with America. While Canadian politicos slap each other on the back and make fun of "those dumb Americans," the rest of us look on and lament for a nation that is making itself useless at a time when its values and voice should be playing a role in securing the world and advancing its liberty.

An oasis in the desert

Southern California has many natural attractions and I thought that prior to my recent journey there I had seen most of them. I could not have been more wrong.

For what I had missed on my previous visits was a journey to the desert. This time, I made it part of my trip, and it was a wonderful experience.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Based on my experience in Israel's Negev, I expected to see only large areas of empty space. I was, therefore, surprised to encounter a memorable Holocaust memorial – the aptly named Desert Holocaust Memorial – right in the middle of the town of Palm Desert.

It is dominated by seven larger-than life bronze sculptures representing some of the different people and aspects of the Holocaust. The standing man is intended to be defiant and accusing, in part representing the resistance of the Jews and others who fought the Nazis. (His left forearm bears the number tattooed on a local Holocaust survivor.)

The other figures are of a mother with two children begging for mercy, a boy from the ghetto, a rabbi praying and a figure behind the group, a man alone, silent, dying.

The memorial also features a statistical account of the mass murders and citations of various kinds, headed by Shirley Greif's poem, The Promise, which features this memorable stanza: "From the endless pain from those who remember, this promise eternal: Never again!"

Also featured is a bas-relief depicting images of the Holocaust, along with a quotation from American general Dwight D. Eisenhower, written after his first visit to a concentration camp: "Cruelty and bestiality were so overpowering as to leave me sick."

For me, personally, there was a small flaw in the exhibit.

Maybe I'm just picky to record it, but an important display that thousands of people will see deserves careful editing before it is presented to the public.

A famous German minister, Rev. Martin Niemoeller, was rightfully included on the list of those who opposed the Nazis. He spent more than eight years in concentration camps, and a number of different versions of the following well-known poem have been attributed to him: "First they came for the Jews. I was silent. I was not a Jew. Then they came for the Communists. I was silent. I was not a Communist. Then they came for the trade unionists. I was silent. I was not a trade unionist. Then they came for me. There was no one left to speak for me."

Alas, on the plaque, his name is spelled incorrectly as "Neimoeller." Many readers will say "Big deal!" But if an exhibit aims for respect and approval, it must avoid such glaring errors.

All in all, the desert was fascinating and most certainly not empty.

Attempting a daunting, yet simple idea

Maybe I was just being naive. Or let's face it, just plain stupid.

It often seems that being a student automatically means being handed a platter full of challenges and frustrations. The very least of these challenges stems from being in an environment full of people who, for the time being, are all simmering under one roof before they veer off in markedly different directions.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

One would think an academic atmosphere that values education and freedom of thought would create an environment where people would feel safe sharing their unprecedented diverse ideas and opinions.

But I found out last week that I was wrong, and it created a heaviness in my heart I can't quite seem to shake.

Several months ago, I ran into an acquaintance at a party who shared an idea with me, one that made me excited.

The idea was daunting, yet incredibly simple at the same time: get five Palestinian students and five Jewish or Israeli students together in one room for a discussion. Get them to talk about the events in their lives and in the world and how these events have affected their identities in the context of what is going on in the world today.

The event would not be a debate, but a roundtable discussion of civilized souls who are fortunate enough to be at least physically removed from the harsh reality of war and who want to do something a little more constructive than just sit around and complain. My friend and I thought of inviting a few others as well, people who are neither Israeli nor Palestinian but who are affected by the conflict by virtue of simply being human, and who want to try to find solutions and bring them back to their own communities.

We recognized the controversy that might arise from a goal that seemed so simple, but rationalized that it was not impossible. And so the idea of a forum was born.

As someone who has been removed from the Jewish community for most of my life, I felt as if my outsider perspective would permit me to get involved without getting emotionally tangled in the issues to the same extent as others. But to see my acquaintance – whose family immigrated to Canada from Israel to give him a better life and whose father fought in the front lines in both the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War – do this too was a humbling experience, to say the least.

I just wish I could say the same for some of the people we encountered in our quest to make the roundtable happen.

I did not like to see the faces of people I knew and respected morph into twisted expressions of hate at the mere mention of having an event like this.

I cannot pretend to know what it's like to live in a country where you do not know if you'll be coming home that day. But what I do know is that perhaps by the time this piece goes to print, U.S. President George W. Bush will have gone to war and the conflicts in the world will only escalate.

The roundtable discussion has yet to happen. While my friend and I found some Jewish and Palestinian students who believed a forum was long overdue, and while media interest was high, in the end, the Palestinian students were the ones who balked at the idea of having an audience present.

So now it seems we're back at square one.

"This whole thing will be a complete disaster," one Jewish student had predicted. "And for what? What are you going to achieve? You will not solve the Middle East crisis. You will not change any Palestinian's mind, and they will not change ours."

But we weren't looking to change anyone's mind. It's that notion that makes organizing events like this so incredibly challenging.

I just hope the rewards of being persistent about this idea will balance out the frustrations.

Raising the bar

It is amazing to sit and watch the massive protests against the war in Iraq going on around the world. Hundreds of thousands of people are constructing their slogans, painting their signs and taking to the streets to defend an ideal. They claim to believe in justice – they want to ensure that the world's powers stand for an objective moral order. Interestingly, though, only certain causes seem to warrant such "high standards" of socially conscious behaviour.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

The campus is at the centre of this opposition. Students, in stereotypical rebellious fashion, yearn to oppose prevailing attitudes and fight for the underdog. Youthful idealism lends itself to the insatiable urge to improve the world. It seems to be a phase of life that many young adults go through, a sort of rite of passage where optimism hasn't yet been clouded by years of disappointment and disillusionment.

Of course, there is nothing wrong with political advocacy. It is essential for a democratic society to foster an exchange of divergent ideas, and a plurality of voices acts to strengthen discourse and policy. The problem with campus life today lies in the fact that people assume their standpoints without having a true understanding of exactly what it is they stand for.

It has been reiterated in the media hundreds of times, and by now, most people are aware that there is a close correlation between the left wing, the anti-globalization movement and the anti-Israel sentiments that prevail throughout virtually all societies. Everywhere you look, people are absorbing the rhetoric and failing to question the ideologies.

Just look at York University, where a few weeks ago, flawed moral hierarchies had "socially conscious" protestors assaulting a Jewish student. Campus police didn't show up to do anything about the situation.

So instead of being institutions of higher learning, campuses have become forums for ethnically and/or religiously motivated violence and rhetoric that paint every issue with a catch phrase. From professors and student governments to ordinary students, the campus environment is descending from one that demands academic rigour and intellectual integrity to one that accommodates blatant ignorance.

It is amazing that the world order can be divided so simply into those who are pro-war and those who are against it. This black-or-white political realm prevents any examination that delves beyond the surface of the simplest issues. You are either anti-Bush and anti-America, and against the "arrogance" their war supposedly represents, or you are a peace-loving individual who cares about human life and opposes military intervention on principle.

Only certain opinions seem to have a place on campus these days. Don't step on campus with an issue of the National Post, and whatever you do, don't utter support of anything American or Israeli. Those who hold dissenting views need not even open their mouths, as everyone already "knows" what it is they are going to say.

The recent anti-war protests signify both the great strength and the great danger of our age. While it is crucial that individuals look beyond their country's horizons and assume an interest in policies beyond their borders, they must do so in a responsible way, looking to understand the complexities and facts beneath surface arguments. We need to break out of our complacent western lifestyle, and recognize that, whether we like it or not, we are part of a global society. We have a responsibility, one that demands something more than we are currently giving.

We are so accustomed to seeing ourselves as having TV commercial-length attention spans that we have lowered our expectations. Given the resources we have at our fingertips, we must demand of ourselves, of our educators and of the institutions that govern our society a higher level of information exchange. We have to ensure that the bar is raised on all sides – that people are encouraged to conduct more research and be more critical – and only then can we hope to have a positive influence on the way people understand international affairs.

The Kirshner File

Iraq: a just war to eliminate a regional threat

Saddam Hussein's fate, and that of his execrable Ba'athist regime, was irretrievably sealed on March 16 in Portugal's remote Azores islands.

On that fateful Sunday, George W. Bush, the president of the United States, and his two steadfast allies, Britain and Spain, issued a stern ultimatum demanding the immediate passage of another United Nations resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq. But the Security Council, spearheaded by France and Russia, balked – not only threatening to veto such a resolution but insisting, somewhat disingenuously, that the UN inspections system was working and just needed more time to bear fruit. With diplomacy having failed, and the UN having revealed itself as a squabbling, impotent body incapable of enforcing its own resolutions, Bush gave Saddam and his two sons 48 hours to leave Baghdad.

Sheldon Kirshner in Russia

As expected, Iraq contemptuously rejected the ultimatum. In typically purple prose, Saddam described the imminent war as "the decisive battle between the army of faith, right and justice, and the forces of tyranny and American-Zionist savagery."

With the clock having run out and UN inspection teams having vacated Iraq, the United States struck the first blows on March 19 at about 9:35 p.m. (EST). Tomahawk cruise missiles struck a bunker in Baghdad where Saddam and his associates had supposedly assembled and jets pounded artillery and missile emplacements. The following day, American, British and Australian forces launched the long-anticipated invasion of Iraq.

The legitimacy of the war is based on UN resolution 1441 – which warned Iraq of "serious consequences" for failing to relinquish its weapons of mass destruction – and on 16 previous UN resolutions, all flouted brazenly by Saddam since 1991.

Twelve years after the first Persian Gulf War, and less than two years after the United States deposed the loathsome Taliban government in Afghanistan, which was in cahoots with the perpetrators of the Sept. 11 terrorist atrocities in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., the world was yet again fixated on the baleful figure of Saddam. Call it unfinished business.

This is a just – though questionably legal – war driven by two primary objectives. The first is to disarm Iraq of its chemical and biological arsenal and of its long-range missiles, which have wreaked death and destruction on its neighbours, including Israel. Critics of the war will have no reason to gloat even if the Americans do not find these weapons. Saddam's regime was aggressive and expansionist – as witnessed by Iraq's bloody-minded invasions of Iran and Kuwait and Iraq's Scud attacks against Israel – and thus a clear and present threat to the region. If left alone, Saddam would surely have rebuilt his fearsome force. And imagine how much more emboldened he would have been had Israel not bombed Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor.

The second goal of this preventive war is to topple Saddam's Stalinist, cult-of-personality regime, the most repressive Arab junta of modern times. Regime change has been the implicit and explicit aim of American policy since the Clinton administration, Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretién's foolish expression of surprise notwithstanding.

Once Saddam and his vicious clique are vanquished, Iraq, hopefully, can be reconstituted along democratic lines and serve as a role model to the rest of the largely authoritarian Arab world. In addition, the emergence of a new Iraq may help jump-start Israel's on-again, off-again negotiations with the Palestinians, encourage moderation on both sides and send a chilling signal to Syria, Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

To those who claim the war was fuelled by an imperialist appetite for Iraqi oil, perish the thought. Saddam sold oil on the free market to all comers, and the United States – one of his steadiest customers – manifestly had no need to wage war and spill blood and treasure to gain access to his black gold. Indeed, if anyone really covets Iraqi oil, it is France and Russia, Iraq's primary arms suppliers from the 1960s onward, and Turkey.

The anti-Semitic insinuation that American Jews and the state of Israel pushed the United States into this war also needs to be exploded. This miserable, baseless myth – propagated by Jim Moran, a Virginia congressman who has since apologized for his stupid remarks, and Pat Buchanan, the crotchety publicist and U.S. presidential aspirant – was soundly refuted by no less a person than Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state. " It (the disarmament of Iraq) is driven by our own national interest," Powell declared in no uncertain terms on March 13.

It goes without saying, however, that Saddam's demise is in Israel's interests. Iraq, the sole Arab combatant that refused to sign the armistice agreements after the War of Independence, has been Israel's nemesis since its declaration of statehood.

Iraq fought in the 1948, 1967 and 1973 Arab-Israeli wars. Iraq vehemently opposed Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel and denounced the Oslo agreements. Iraq harboured the master terrorist Abu Nidal, among others. Iraq fired 39 missiles into Israeli cities in 1991. Iraq rewards Palestinian suicide bombers with $25,000 (U.S.) payments.

As for the accusation that the war is supported monolithically by Jews in the United States, consider these statistics. Surveys conducted by the Pew Research Center from August 2002 to February 2003 found that 52 percent of Jews were in favour of military action, 32 percent were opposed and 16 percent were uncertain. Among all Americans, the figures were 62 percent, 28 percent and 10 percent, respectively.

In a current edition of The American Conservative, Buchanan claims that "a cabal of polemicists and public officials [in the Bush administration] seek to ensnare our country in a series of wars that are not in America's interests." He is referring, obliquely, to Jews such as Paul Wolfowitz, the deputy secretary of defence; Douglas Feith, the undersecretary of defence; David Wurmser, a special assistant to Undersecretary of State John Bolton, and Richard Perle, the chair of the Pentagon's advisory Defence Policy Board.

Buchanan's claim is grossly misleading and malicious. It cynically ignores the fact that the decision to go to war was made by Bush, Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld, Powell and the general staff.

As for the assertion that a war will damage U.S. interests, ask yourself what is better: a dictatorial and repressive Iraq that intimidates, tortures and kills dissidents and threatens the Mideast, or an Iraq that respects human rights, grapples with democracy and is at peace with itself and its neighbours?

It is doubtless true that, as the main occupying power in a post-Saddam Iraq, the United States will be called upon to protect Iraq's borders, ensure security, provide humanitarian relief and mediate ethnic and religious strife. But if the United States can successfully fill the vacuum caused by Saddam's departure and can de-Ba'athify Iraq, the war will be worth the cost. Japan and Germany were democratized after 1945. Why should one automatically assume that a similar process cannot work in Iraq?

In any event, the cost of the reconstruction of Iraq should be financed by Iraqi oil revenues, by wealthy Arab states, especially Saudi Arabia and Libya, and by France, Germany, Russia, China and Japan.

Looking back, one can safely say that Saddam divined his downfall by virtue of his obsessive desire to acquire weapons of mass destruction, his hubristic ambition to dominate the Middle East, his rape of Kuwait, his maltreatment of the Kurds, the Shiites and the Marsh Arabs and his underestimation of the United States' resolve.

From the moment Iraq was trounced in the 1991 Gulf War – the " mother of all battles" – Saddam never sincerely committed himself to complying with UN disarmament resolutions. Through prevarication and deliberate delays, he continually sought to preserve his armoury of proscribed arms. Hans Blix, the UN's chief chemical and biological weapons inspector, got it right the first time around. There was never a "genuine acceptance" on Saddam's part to destroy his toxic toys.

And in his tireless effort to hoodwink the UN, he was a constant source of instability, bringing the region to the brink of war in 1994 and again in 1998.

France's misguided attempt to prolong the inspections needlessly was counter-productive. It encouraged Saddam to resist the inevitable, and as President Jacques Chirac should have known, the onus was on Iraq to lead the inspectors to hidden caches. The policy of containment, consisting of inspections, economic sanctions and no-fly zones, running north of the 36th and south of the 33rd parallels, proved to be ineffective and detrimental to Iraqi civilians.

Canada's compromise proposal of benchmarks and a firm March 28 deadline to force Iraq's compliance with resolution 1441 was not a bad idea. But Chretién's dithering, vacillation, equivocation, misplaced faith in inspections and smug pose of neutrality was embarrassing and shameful. It was not Canada's finest hour.

Yom Hasiddur
Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
For months, they have been studying diligently, practising prayers and learning songs. With their parents, they have decorated a Siddur cover. Now, they will present a Shacharit (morning) service for parents, grandparents, and teachers. They will receive their own Siddur. The highlight of Grade 1, Yom Hasiddur is a major milestone in a child's Jewish life. In just a few short months, the children have become active members of the Jewish community, able to read the Siddur and participate in prayers. Yom Hasiddur is the day these young children stand up and say "I am a Jew."

New BGU Associates reaches out to Israeli peers

Young executives of Toronto, through the New Ben-Gurion Associates, are reaching out to their contemporaries in Israel who have been mobilized for military service in connection with the present Iraq crisis and ongoing terrorist and suicide bomber attacks.

The announcement was made by Bruce Bronfman, president of the New Ben-Gurion Associates, the young leadership division of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University, Ontario region. He said hundreds of students from Ben-Gurion University have had to interrupt their university studies in order to do military service.

"We are endeavouring to raise funds to provide scholarships for these students so that they can continue their studies once they are released from national service," Bronfman said.

"This effort is especially important at this time," he added. "The government of Israel, which supplies most of the scholarship aid for students, has, for budgetary reasons, had to drastically cut back on financial support for universities."

On May 14, a luncheon at the Windsor Arms Hotel, sponsored by the New Ben-Gurion Associates, will feature as guest speaker lawyer and author Alan Dershowitz, who will speak on After Iraq – the case for Israel.

The May 14 luncheon is open to the community. Dietary laws will be observed and there will be a minimal charge.

"We hope that those attending the luncheon will, without pressure, consider assisting our New Ben-Gurion Associates in our efforts to help young, brave Israeli students live up to their potential. Israel is the only country in the world which has its natural resources above ground – brain power. We must ensure that it continues to be nurtured and developed," Bronfman said.

For information about the luncheon or the scholarship fund, please call the New Ben-Gurion Associates office at 416-665-8054.

Italian film, lecture series on Holocaust launched

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The world's first film and lecture series on Italian films about the Holocaust was launched in Toronto last week.

Contemporary Italian Cinema and the Holocaust unfolds at St. Michael's College, University of Toronto, 121 St. Joseph St. until April 4.

Ricky Tognazzi's film, Canone Inverso/Making Love, kicked off the series March 24.

On March 27, Alberto Negrin's Perlasca, un eroe italiano/ Perlasca, an Italian Hero, will be shown, and on March 31, Ettore Scola's film, Concorrenza sleale/ Unfair Competition, will be screened.

They are to be followed by Andrea and Antonio Frazzi's Il cielo cade/ The Sky is Falling on April 2.

All screenings take place at 5 p.m. in room 100 of Alumni Hall.

Millicent Marcus, a visiting professor at U of T and director of the Center for Italian Studies at the University of Pennsylvania, is delivering the talks.

Lectures begin at 7: 30 p.m. Admission is free.

"In these lectures, I will discuss why Italy is experiencing an urgent need to tell the Holocaust story now, and what cinematic strategies are being adopted for that purpose," Marcus said in an interview.

"The films, all made after 2000, are virtually unknown to North American audiences and yet they prove that Italy is intensely engaged in the work of rethinking its fascist past and its relationship to the racial policies that led to genocide."

During the postwar period, she said, Italian films avoided the Holocaust. But since the 1990s, they have addressed the topic.

Canone Inverso, set in Czechoslovakia in the 1930s and '40s, revolves around a young Jewish musician who falls in love with a French concert pianist.

Their romance unfolds against a backdrop of violence.

In her lecture on Canone Inverso, Marcus considered how the filmmaker used melodrama to further his message that "the most powerful of all weapons against violence and oppression is the profoundly civilizing, humanizing and unifying force of the arts."

Concorrenza Sleale, the subject of Marcus' next lecture, focuses on two rival merchants, Umberto Melchiorri and Leone Della Rocca, vying for each other's clientele.

"When Mussolini's race laws go into effect in 1938, Umberto, an Aryan, gains a distinct advantage over his Jewish competitor," she said. "I will consider how the genre of Italian film comedy is profoundly altered by its encounter with persecution history."

Il cielo caede is based on the memoirs of Lorenza Mazzetti, who was raised by her Jewish uncle, Robert Einstein, and his Italian wife.

The movie is set in a Tuscany villa in the late 1930s and early '40s and portrays the enchanted childhood world of a Catholic girl who is spared the fate of her uncle's immediate family.

"Her innocence and helplessness make her testimony all the more poignant," Marcus said. "My lecture will also include an analysis of the cinematic techniques used to represent a child's perspective, and will link this film to other Italian works that convey World War II through the eyes of a child."

Marcus is a graduate of Cornell and Yale and specializes in Italian cinema and medieval literature.

Her books include Italian Film in the Light of Neorealism and After Fellini: National Cinema in the Postmodern Age, both of which won awards.

The Mariano DiVito professor of Italian studies at the University of Pennsylvania, Marcus is currently working on a new book on Italian films and Holocaust memory.

The festival is sponsored by U of T's department of Italian studies and the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair of Holocaust Studies.

Gabriele Scardellato, a member of the department, organized the festival.

The Italian Cultural Institute in Toronto, directed by Carlo Coen, assisted in acquiring the films.

The festival was given the green light by Domenico Pietropaolo, the department's chair.

The Moses of the New World

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Millions of Diaspora Jews owe a huge debt of gratitude to Baron Maurice de Hirsch, the Jewish magnate, banker and philanthropist who built the Orient Express railroad from Vienna to Constantinople, for assisting our Russian ancestors to reach the United States, Canada, Argentina and other hospitable shores.

According to his biographer, Samuel J. Lee, Hirsch was "the 19th-century Moses who started the exodus of Russia's Jews to the Western world."

Born in Munich in 1831, Hirsch was well disposed towards assuming a grand, sympathetic and altogether visionary approach to the problems that acutely plagued the Jews of Russia, beginning in 1891.

From his father, Joseph, a daring speculator and cattle baron, he inherited a penchant for plunging into highly speculative deals and large-scale risky projects that often paid off handsomely. From his mother, Caroline, a descendant of the illustrious Wertheimer line, he acquired a lifelong loyalty to the Jewish people.

His wife; Clara, a daughter of the powerful Bischoffsheim banking family, gave him the habit of generous philanthropy that became paramount in their lives after the death of their only son, Lucien, in 1888.

Hirsch had grown up in an optimistic age of reason and enlightenment – an age of great financial booms and promotional schemes, such as the railway mania. Possessed of wealth, he wasn't afraid to think big and had a genius for large undertakings such as his prized railroad between Europe and Turkey, a dream-project that seemed freighted with massive political, geographic, fiduciary and other difficulties. The $100-million fortune he accrued from its completion made him one of the world's wealthiest men.

Regarding the Jews, Hirsch was essentially an assimilationist. "For him there existed only two types of Jews, the ghetto Jew – coarse, ignorant, fanatical in his religious practices – and the emancipated Jew," writes Lee in his 1970 book, The Moses of the New World. "All that was necessary was to remove Jews in large numbers from the first group into the second group and anti-Semitism would disappear."

While generously supporting the Alliance Israelite Universalle as it assisted the Jews in Eastern Europe, Hirsch realized it was better for the Russian Jews to leave Russia, and so, like Moses before Pharoah, he negotiated their release with the Czar.

His original aim, to establish a series of Jewish agricultural colonies in Argentina through his Jewish Colonization Association was "as magnanimous as it was mistaken, as costly as it was useless," according to Theodor Herzl, who met with Hirsch in 1895.

Having failed to persuade Hirsch of his nationalistic dream of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, Herzl began writing a treatise for his particular edification: this became The Jewish State, his influential Magna Carta of the Zionist movement.

Turning to North America, Hirsch established agricultural colonies in Woodbine, N.J., and Hirsch and Moosowin, Sask., and elsewhere. Working with the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, he established the Baron de Hirsch Fund to assist in resettlement activities in the United States and Canada.

"I suppose I shall spend all my money in this movement," he once mused. "But, after all, what is the use of money unless you do some good with it?"

By the time of his death in 1896 and that of his wife in 1899, much of their vast wealth had been put to the service of Jewish and other humanitarian causes.

A boon for genealogists, papers of the Baron de Hirsch Fund and related enterprises are available through the American Jewish Historical Society, the National Archives and Libraries of Canada, the Canadian Jewish Congress Archives and other institutions.

To torture or not to torture?

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

The recent capture of Al Qaeda mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed presented the world with an interesting ethical dilemma.

It is reasonable to believe his diabolical mind – reportedly behind many recent international acts of terror, including Sept. 11 – festers with plans for further terrorist attacks. As such, is it acceptable for a civilized society such as ours to use torture while interrogating him in order to prevent further acts of terror?

In response to this question, there are two obvious extremes.

On one side, some say that under no circumstances should we lower our standards and become barbaric ourselves. On the other side are those who would choose one lesser evil over the other and make an exception in condoning the use of torture in order to save lives.

Then there are those in between.

Some people would prefer the government do what it needs to do, but secretly. If you must do it, the argument goes, go ahead, but first publicly deny the use of torture. Still others would prefer we keep our hands clean and let others do the dirty work for us.

For Judaism, moral dilemmas are answered simply and solely by the Torah. Clearly, inflicting pain is prohibited. The concept of "tzar ba'alei chayim" clearly teaches that we may not be the cause of any undue pain, even to the lowliest of creatures. But is it possible in this context to apply the mitzvah of "pikuach nefesh," which proposes that in order to preserve life, Torah laws are suspended? On this basis, would the Torah condone inflicting pain on another individual in such circumstances?

Furthermore, might it also be possible here to apply the concept of the rodef, which says that if an individual is actively pursuing another in order to kill him, he can be stopped by killing him, if that's what it will take? One could, of course, argue that Mohammed does not fit within these parameters, as he is not in active pursuit.

There does exist one clear precedent that would seem to permit the extraction of vital information using torture. The Talmud discusses a scenario wherein a husband refuses to submit a Jewish religious divorce (a get) to his wife. (A get may be given only by the husband.)

The Talmud states that in such a scenario, the husband should be "forced" to do his duty. Forced, in this context, means the exertion of pressures, as in social pressure (excommunication), financial pressure (a boycott of his business), emotional pressure (scare tactics), and indeed, if further warranted by judicial authorities (a beit din), physical pressure – read torture.

It would seem that there is ample precedent in the Torah to allow, in specific situations, the inflicting of pain in order to extract what is just – in this case, information that leads to many lives being saved.

You Don't Have to be Jewish: Commentaries on a Selection of Jewish Content Movies*, by Bill Stern, Lugus Publishing, 2002.

In this attractively illustrated work of reference, Bill Stern, a well-known Toronto activist and social worker, presents his thoughts and insights on 55 films of Jewish content. They are divided into five categories: Canadian, Yiddish, Israel, general and Holocaust.

In a brief preface, the author, perhaps too humbly, confesses: "I am not a film critic, I just love films, your thoughts about a good film are just as important as mine." Each film is succinctly discussed in several pages of relevant and colourful background material. This guide for film buffs, with ample index and bibliography, fills a real need.

Indelible Shadows: Film and the Holocaust*, by Annette Insdorf, Cambridge University Press, 2002, $27.65.

This is the third edition of a scholarly work by Columbia University's director of undergraduate film studies. In his foreword to the book, Elie Wiesel writes: "Annette Insdorf analyzes with the deep erudition and striking talent that render this daughter of survivors the best critic in America on Holocaust films."

Can one make a movie that is both morally just and marketable? Is the use of humour in the film Life is Beautiful proper and fitting or is it a desecration? Can survivors of the Holocaust be accurately depicted as a group, or is each individual experience unique and to be treated as such? How authentic to the original situation are documentaries that return years later to concentration camps or to hiding places in cities or forests? These are the kind of questions that the author concerns herself with in this exhaustive and full-bodied study.

The author writes that "As long as there are people like Professor [Robert] Faurisson in France who proclaim in print that the gas chambers did not exist, there must be active resistance by those who know they did exist. The luxury of forgetfulness is not possible, because the Holocaust is neither a closed chapter nor an isolated event."

This filmography is the most comprehensive and up-to-date discussion of films about the Holocaust, and an invaluable resource.

The Man Who Swam Into History*, by Robert A. Rosenstone, 1stBooks Library, 2002, $23.45.

The author of this family saga, a professor of history at the California Institute of Technology, explores the many-layered experiences of his forebears as they journey first to Canada and then to the United States. The reader is presented with a mosaic of memory, a collection of tales and fragments, factual and fictional, that show a family not as an assemblage of data but as, what the author calls, "a field of stories."

Rosenstone is a superb writer with an acute ear for dialogue and an unfailing eye for the humorous incident. The book's quirky and colourful characters include one grandfather who heroically escapes Russia by swimming the Pruth River, a numbers-running father with the heart of a socialist, two brothers, one raised in Montreal and one in Moscow, who meet again after 40 years, and the anti-McCarthyite college student who finds himself labelled a communist.

Poignant and hilarious by turn, this brilliant little book should not be missed.

Jewish genetic disorders, part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Internet is frequently criticized for being a world wide waste of time. Far too often, this criticism is completely valid. But when used properly, the Internet can be a critical tool for joining communities and perhaps even saving lives. This is particularly true for people searching for medical information in the burgeoning field of genetic research. Today, a look at online resources on the ethical and halachic challenges of genetic research.

I must emphasize strongly that although you can find a wealth of information out there, the Internet must not be considered a substitute for trusted medical or rabbinic experts who are familiar with your particular circumstances. Also, pay close attention to the credentials of any authors you read on the Web. Not everyone is a reliable or accurate source of information.

"Why is this gene different from all other genes?" That's the name of a recent conference that examined scientific, ethical and religious genetic issues facing the Jewish community. Dr. Robert Pollack, a professor of biological sciences, says that advances in decoding the human genome have allowed us to develop new screening tests for genetic diseases found among Ashkenazi Jews. But those advances also open a pandora's box of ethical dilemmas: Should a couple considering marriage opt for genetic testing? What should they do if they receive heartbreaking results? Does an embryo sitting in a laboratory have the same status as a fetus in utero? The conference was organized by the Association of Orthodox Jewish Scientists, whose Web site contains many thought-provoking articles geared to both scientific and general audiences [http://www.jewishgenes.org/].

The controversy over genetic screening and its ethical and halachic implications is dealt with at length in several places on the Internet. In his essay on genetic screening, North Dakota State University student Mike Wetzstein gives an overview of this issue and explains some of Judaism's concerns with genetic screening: "The obligation with regard to procreation is not suspended simply because of the statistical probability that some children of the union may be deformed or abnormal" [http://www.cc.ndsu.nodak.edu/instruct/mcclean/plsc431/students/mike.htm].

One of the greatest fears people have about genetic testing is the stigma they would face if they were known to be the carrier of a disease. I recommend a fascinating article in the Jewish Homemaker magazine that looks at a Brooklyn-based organization called Dor Yeshorim [http://ok.org/homemaker/chanukah99/health.html]. Dor Yeshorim tests young men and women before they begin to date. Their results are kept anonymously and are only available to rabbis who compare the charts when a couple seriously contemplates marriage. If both are carriers for a certain disorder, they are told their prospective union is "not advisable." No one is told if he or she is a carrier, only that both people must look for another match.

The Dor Yeshorim method has apparently gained wide acceptance through Brooklyn's Orthodox community but has been criticized by Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a rosh yeshiva and professor of Jewish medical ethics at New York's Yeshiva University [http://www.yucommentator.com/archives/v62iA/news/doryesharim.html]. Rabbi Tendler is concerned that mass screening programs that find a genetic defect "can lead to discrimination by insurance companies, employers, and others looking to be married."

Dr. Fred Rosner is a professor of Medicine at Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York City [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/genetic.html]. In his article Judaism, Genetic Screening and Genetic Therapy, he concludes genetic screening and therapy "are permissible in Judaism when used for the treatment, cure, or prevention of disease. Such genetic manipulation is not considered to be a violation of God's natural law but a legitimate implementation of the biblical mandate to heal."

Next week I will present the best places to find Jewish genetic resources on the Internet.

New buttons encourage Jews to 'Fight terror, support Israel'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"I support Israel." "Stand up for Israel." "Fight terror; support Israel."

Those are a sampling of the five slogans that can be found on blue-and-white buttons popping up around the Greater Toronto Area. One in Hebrew bears the message "I Love Israel," with the words "love" and "Israel" denoted only by graphics – a heart and a Magen David respectively.

The button campaign is the brainchild of Izzy Kaplan, the owner of Israel's Judaica Centre. Since the project was launched under the auspices of the Toronto Zionist Council (TZC) three weeks ago, almost 100 boxes of the free buttons have found counter space at Jewish businesses and organizations, and more requests were in the process of being filled last week.

As well, at least three families have given the buttons to guests at their respective simchahs, Kaplan said.

The idea was "one of those things I felt was necessary for the times," said Kaplan, the TZC's vice-president.

Although the button project is not primarily a fundraiser, voluntary donations will be used by the TZC for their Israel-related endeavours, such as helping victims of terror and underwriting the cost of protective gear, including bulletproof vests, for Israeli civilians, he said.

"The money's not the issue," said Kaplan. "Wearing [the buttons] is what is important."

In addition to providing a way to express solidarity with Israel, Kaplan believes the buttons, worn by large numbers of people, will foster pride and help overcome a fear of anti-Semitism and violence.

"I feel that, en masse, these things can do a tremendous amount of good for the psyche of the Jews of Toronto... that you're proud to stand on the street and tell people [you're] a good Canadian citizen, and that every immigrant has some kind of homeland."

Of the 50,000 buttons that have been printed, Kaplan said about 10,000 have already been picked up. An extra run of at least 10,000 was in the works for the Israel Mall scheduled for earlier this week, from Sunday to Wednesday, of which Kaplan is also an organizer.

For more information on the buttons, call Debbi at the TZC, 416-256-2858, ext. 24.

Israel's Ezer Mizion helps orphans

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Peter Friedmann believes the greatest sufferers of terror in Israel are children. It is children, after all, who experience extensive trauma when one or both of their parents are murdered in a terrorist attack, as has happened in dozens of cases, and it is children who stand to suffer for years – even decades – after such a violent upheaval in their life.

So Friedmann, president of Toronto-based SlovCan Steel Ltd., decided to hook up with what he calls one of Israel's best-kept secrets in North America.

Ezer Mizion, a non-profit, non-sectarian health-care and social-service provider, has 30 branches, 300 staff and a network of 10,000 volunteers throughout Israel. An award-winning organization, it provides a wide variety of programs, including meals on wheels, day care, support groups and an array of crisis-oriented medical and emergency services.

But what caught Friedmann's interest was a new addition to Ezer Mizion: the Terror Orphan Fund, which provides mentors to children who have lost one or both parents to terrorist bombings and shootings.

"I felt personally that the most vulnerable victims of terror are children," Friedmann says. "We in North America say the right things but we don't fully appreciate what these kids are going through."

Friedmann, who supports a variety of religious and educational organizations and is a former president of the Village Shul, has launched the Canadian Friends of Ezer Mizion, with a focus on implementing the terror orphan program, which requires $300,000 (US) over two years.

A FOUNDATION FOR THE FUTURE

JEWISH FOUNDATION OF GREATER TORONTO

The Community's Philanthropic Resource Centre

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto wants to make philanthropy as easy as possible for members of our community.

With so many different choices available in today's philanthropic world, The Jewish Foundation offers donors a full range of professional services to simplify the giving process. Equally important, the Jewish Foundation's Investment Advisory Committee, composed of respected business and financial leaders, offers contributors peace of mind, through expert investment and administration of funds, under the highest ethical codes of conduct.

"Communication and the nurturing of strong, trust-based relationships with the community have been responsible for our successes to date," says Jewish Foundation Chair Neil Nisker.

Through a gift to the Jewish Foundation, donors automatically benefit from a wide range of features including:

- A comprehensive selection of planned giving options
- Educational forums on strategic philanthropy
- Regular reports and reviews on the progress of your fund
- Potential partnership with many exciting Jewish Toronto Tomorrow capital and programming projects
- Innovative granting opportunities and due diligence on granting requests
- Access to a global network of experts on a variety of interests

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto helps donors make meaningful philanthropic decisions through customized attention to their individual needs.

ask PAC...

This is a feature from the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) to help you with financial and estate planning issues. We welcome your questions.

David Wm. Brown
Partner, Al G. Brown & Associates

Q Dear PAC:

In recently revising my estate plan, I discovered that I owned a $50,000 whole life insurance policy that I no longer needed. My accountant suggested that I donate my policy to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. Is this a good idea and what are the benefits?

Sincerely,
L.B. Goldberg, North York, Ontario

A Dear L.B. Goldberg:

Your accountant made a good suggestion. Donating the policy is both a good idea and very tax-efficient. You do however have a few alternatives. You can donate your policy by changing the ownership to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. The forms are available from the insurance company. Although the transfer will constitute a taxable disposition, in most cases a charitable tax credit will more than offset the tax liability that would otherwise result from the disposition. The Jewish Foundation will appoint itself as beneficiary. In each year you pay the premium and you will receive a charitable tax receipt for the total premium cost. On your death the Jewish Foundation will receive the death benefit, but this will not give rise to a further charitable tax credit for your estate.

Alternately, you can remain the owner and appoint the Jewish Foundation as beneficiary on the policy, either in the contract or in your will. Although the change in beneficiary, in and of itself, provides no immediate tax benefit, on your death, you will receive a tax credit for the death benefit (in this case $50,000). This tax credit can be used to offset other taxable income in the year of death, with any excess being available to offset other taxable income in the previous year. The donation will save your estate taxes and will create a lasting legacy in your name.

In either scenario, you can make a significant contribution and save taxes. It's a win - win situation for you, your family, and the Jewish community.

IDF officer talks to CHAT Grade 12 class

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Major Alon Harel says the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) is fighting two battles – one against terrorism and the other against visuals that portray a Goliath army oppressing Palestinian children.

But when asked, Harel says he doesn't want to discuss the public relations challenge of fighting an urban war that reporters still call an "intifadah," a term coined 10 years ago by the Palestinians that implies Israel is struggling against a passive resistance involving children who throw rocks. Harel doesn't want to talk about Iraq, settlements or checkpoints, either.

He does, however, want to tell a Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto class of Grade 12 students what it's been like this past year to fight a war for the survival of his homeland.

Harel was in Toronto recently as a guest of Israel Bonds and as part of Operation Maccabee, a program that brings Israeli soldiers to North America to present their eyewitness accounts in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

This is a very difficult war to fight because soldiers walk around in cities where terrorists hide among civilians knowing that it is IDF policy to wait until the army is attacked before it can respond, he told the students.

The soldiers persevere in this environment because they know it is their duty to protect the Israeli people. They understand that they are fighting for their right to live in a country of their own, Harel said.

As the second-in-command of a 600- person battalion, Harel knows first-hand the dangers facing his soldiers every day. He's the one who calls their parents when they're killed in battle.

Harel said he will never forget Feb. 19, 2002 and the sight of six of his soldiers shot dead at a roadblock, with bullets through their heads fired from close range.

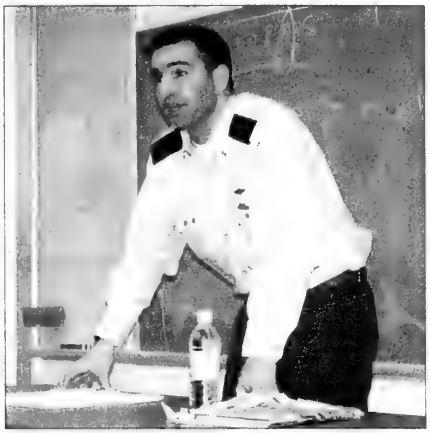
"Everything was covered with blood when I got there," Harel said. And as he walked over the dead bodies, he looked down at their ringing cellphones and saw that their mothers, fathers and girlfriends were trying to call.

"They were 18 years old," Harel said. "Old enough to be soldiers, but young enough to still be children."

In response to a CHAT student's suggestion that Harel "probably doesn't like those people with the orange identity cards [Palestinians who live in the West Bank and Gaza] very much," the major responded that he has no problems with the Palestinians.

"I know they have the same aspirations as Israelis. They want the best for their children in the same way we do. But I do have a problem with the terrorists," he said.

Harel said he's seen even pregnant Palestinian women trying to smuggle explosives into Israel and it has become a challenge to convince soldiers to balance searches with civility at checkpoints when they know their lives are on the line.



Major Alon Harl talks to CHAT class.

Ohr Haemet recently presented its Educational Expo 2003 with all students and teachers contributing to the magnificent showcase. Among the various exhibits, the Grade 3 class dressed as pioneers at their exhibit where sponge cake and gingerbread cookies were sold, while Grade 5 students celebrated their medieval theme with 'bangers and mash' for sale.

Toronto chosen as site for upcoming Jewish education conference

The Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) has so much respect for Toronto's highly acclaimed Jewish day school system that it has chosen our city as the backdrop for its upcoming June conference.

The brainchild of Michael Steinhardt, one of the main forces behind birthright israel, PEJE was born as a partnership of philanthropists with a passion for strengthening North American Jewish communities by increasing the number of children who receive quality day school education.

Shirley Worth, Director, Donor Development for UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, addresses the recent PEJE Conference in Los Angeles.

Because of Toronto's reputation as a leader in North American Jewish education, PEJE's relationship with our Jewish community is different than it is with others.

"Toronto has one of the strongest networks of day schools in North America in terms of quality, quantity, and diversity," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, Vice President of Education UJA Federation. "Because of that, PEJE, which was started to help communities with no, or very few day schools, plays a different role with Toronto. That role will be to work with groups of existing schools to enhance curriculum, and advise on long-term achievements."

At the June conference, PEJE consultants will be visiting many of Toronto's Jewish day schools as part of their ongoing training.

Toronto's strong relationship with PEJE has already resulted in more than $500,000 (U.S.) being injected into three Toronto day schools.

PEJE recently hosted its third Donor Assembly and the inaugural Leadership Assembly in Los Angeles, and Epstein, one of the participants, was buoyed by what he saw.

"The PEJE gathering in Los Angeles was two days of intense hope for Jewish renewal in the Diaspora," says Epstein. "PEJE stressed that universal Jewish literacy will only come about when Jews devote themselves to the highest quality of Jewish education available: day school education. This is a lesson that Toronto Jews learned decades ago, but we too need to have it reinforced from time to time."

Students remember the Holocaust

UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto is readying for its 9th annual Holocaust Arts/Writing Contest. The theme of this year's competition — open to all Ontario high school students — is The Relevance of the Holocaust to our Multi-Ethnic Society.

For more than a decade, the Holocaust Centre of Toronto has been dedicated to the memory of six million Jews murdered by the Nazis. Since its doors opened, more than half a million international visitors and 200,000 Jewish and non-Jewish students from across Canada have visited the Centre.

The goal of the annual competition is to create an opportunity for students to think through issues of Holocaust remembrance and to express these thoughts creatively through written essays, art, plays, video, and musical compositions.

"This competition is but one of the outstanding outreach programs sponsored by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto," says Adam Fuerstenberg, Director of the Centre. "This contest gives young men and women — of all ethnic backgrounds — the chance to confront the horrific consequences of anti-Semitism and racism, and to be inspired to strive for tolerance," he notes.

Thanks to the generosity of benefactor Brenda Fishof, first place winners in the Junior (7-9) and Senior divisions (10-12) win a trip to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington. The second and third place winners in both categories win Ontario Bonds for their education.

"By researching and working with Holocaust materials, Ontario's students learn the importance of tolerance and of getting along in our multi-ethnic and multi-cultural society," adds Fuerstenberg.

The deadline for entries is Friday, April 25, 2003. The winners will be announced on May 22, followed by the awards presentation at The Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services on June 4th.

For more information call Hanna Schwartz at 416-635-2883 ext. 153 or e-mail your submission to hschwartz@ujafed.org.

Gift of history for Archives

The UJA Federation Ontario Jewish Archives recently received an exciting delivery — the culmination of weeks of hard work and negotiations.

The Toronto chapter of Hadassah-WIZO donated 28 boxes of material to the already extensive collection currently housed by the Archives.

Founded in 1917, Hadassah-WIZO was formed as a non-political women's volunteer organization dedicated to the education, career training and healthcare of women and youth in Israel and Canada. The organization is also committed to the enrichment of Canadian Jewish life. Many of the records donated to the Archives date back as far as the 1940s. They include copies of the organization's national and local magazines, minutes of executive meetings, and records documenting Hadassah's world-famous bazaars.

Ellen Scheinberg (c), Director of the Ontario Jewish Archives is flanked by Louise Rosenbloom (l), Coordinator, Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, and Beverley Crackower, President of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO. The three women were storing some of the 28 boxes of Hadassah-WIZO's archival material recently given to the Archives for safe-keeping.

"These records will be of great value to academics studying Hadassah's contribution to Israel and the Toronto Jewish community," says Ellen Scheinberg, Director of the Ontario Jewish Archives. "Individuals who took part in Hadassah-WIZO can look back at some of their achievements, as well as members of the community who are interested in examining the important legacy of this prominent women's organization."

"We felt it was important that the history of Toronto's Hadassah-WIZO — a wonderful 85-year-old history — was preserved and shared for generations to come," says Louise Rosenbloom, Coordinator, Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

The Archives provide an excellent opportunity for other organizations to donate their historical material, with state-of-the-art protection, including a humidity and temperature-controlled environment.

Worldwide recruitment for birthright israel

The worldwide registration drive for birthright israel's Spring/Summer 2003 trips has begun. Following a tremendously successful winter program, Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) hopes to send many more young adults, ages 18-26, on the 10-day educational journey to Israel, starting in May and continuing until August. The registration deadline for the May trip is April 11.

The deadline for registering for May's birthright israel trip is April 11.

Since birthright israel's launch in January 2000, 40,000 people have participated in this innovative Israel-for-free experience, including more than 5,000 Canadians.

CIE organizers are optimistic about registration for the coming year.

"Over the last few years, even with the situation in Israel, the numbers have been there, and we expect those numbers to be there again this year," says Barry Naiberg, Chair, Canada-Israel Experience. "This is going to be an incredibly meaningful experience for these young adults."

"I always knew about Israel intellectually, but never spiritually, or emotionally," says Carly Cohen, who recently joined a birthright israel journey. "I still didn't really 'get it' when I was there, until we met with a group of Israeli soldiers. Hearing them talk about life and taking each moment as it comes, is something that has changed my life in a wonderful way."

"I'd go back to Israel in a heartbeat," says Torontonian Josef Rogovsky, a member of a recent birthright israel trip. "I've never felt threatened in Israel. When you are there, you see the truth, not the CNN version of what they want it to look like. You see the true beauty of Israel and of its people. I wish I could go on birthright israel again — it was one of the most satisfying experiences of my life."

A taste of Southern Hospitality in Florida

UIA Federations Canada recently held its Canadian Top Gifts "Southern Hospitality" event in Boca Raton, Florida, at the home of Pauline & Jeff Segel. The highlight of the event was a special briefing on Iraq by Major General Moshe Evry Sukenik, Israel's Defense and Armed Forces Attaché to the United States and Canada. Pictured is Toronto's Irving Wortsman extending a Canadian hello to the Major General. Major General Sukenik, Chief of the Israeli Ground Forces from 1998 to 2001, arrived in Florida from Houston, Texas, where he attended a memorial service for Israeli astronaut, Ilan Ramon, and spent some time with the Ramon family.

legacy of life

Benjamin Sadowski 1894 – 1974

Benjamin Sadowski believed in justice and made it his lifelong commitment to put things right.

"Most people don't like to lead, but if you're agreeable there's lots of opportunity," says Ben's daughter Yvonne Davies. "My father was a very natural leader. No matter what he was involved in, people responded. He was a very giving person who wanted to do good things. It was just the way he was."

Ben's commitment to people was unwavering. He was the first president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, Jewish Family and Child Service, and Mount Sinai Hospital. He was a board member of Baycrest, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, Canadian Red Cross, and Princess Margaret Hospital, among others. He helped raise funds to build Holy Blossom Temple and was its president in 1949.

When Jews were in trouble, Ben was among the first to respond. Through his work with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, he was active in bringing Holocaust survivors to Canada and finding them homes. When medical students couldn't find anywhere to intern in Toronto simply because they were Jewish, Ben got busy and managed to open the doors.

Perhaps it was all a product of growing up in the only Jewish family in a small Northern Ontario town. Ben's father, Henry, escaped from Russia as a teenager to avoid the draft and ended up in Philadelphia, where he married and began a family. When he heard his brother was in Canada, they trekked by rail and steamship and arrived in Massey, Ont., in the dead of winter – only to find the brother had moved to Saskatchewan. But Henry pitched his tent and settled in Massey anyway, his wife cooking for the railway crews building the Trans-Canada Highway and Henry opening a general store. He eventually became mayor.

"Jewish life was whatever Henry taught his children," says Yvonne. "He had a shul and a Torah on the second floor of the store and all the Jews of Northern Ontario used it. He even circumcised his own sons."

Henry wanted Ben to become a rabbi, but that wasn't for Ben. Instead, he moved in with his sister in Toronto, finished high school and graduated from university with a degree in math and physics. He was drafted in 1914 and served in Niagara-on-the-Lake under commanding officer Vincent Massey, who went on to become Governor General of Canada. The two stayed fast friends.

Once married, Ben realized a math career wouldn't put food on the table. So he joined his brother fixing cars. He eventually founded National Motors and became one of Toronto's most successful auto dealers. Just as in Massey, he was the only Jew in a non-Jewish world but still managed to head the Automobile Dealers Association of Canada in the late 1930s.

"Because of his upbringing, my grandfather always managed to bridge the gap between the Jewish and non-Jewish communities," says granddaughter Helen Davies-Miller. "He made it his business to make others understand that the Jewish community can work together with everyone. You don't judge people by their success, he used to say, but rather by who they are. That's what he taught me, and I try to live by that."

One of Ben's lesser known contributions to his community was helping Jewish medical students succeed. According to Yvonne, only two Jews a year were given internships in one Toronto hospital in the mid-1940s – Yvonne's husband Leonard being one of the lucky ones. But just as Leonard was about to begin his internship, the hospital reneged on the offer and Ben was livid.

About the same time, says Yvonne, the Hospital for Sick Children was looking for a place to build on Toronto's hospital strip. Ben, then head of Mount Sinai Hospital, offered HSC a Mount Sinai-owned piece of land. All it would cost was $1 and two promises: HSC would find Mount Sinai alternate property nearby to build a new teaching facility, and HSC would have to start taking on Jewish interns. HSC agreed, and soon after other hospitals followed. Today, Mount Sinai's auditorium bears Ben's name, as does a fund at the University of Toronto's School of Social Work.

In 1960, UJA Federation created the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, the single most prestigious acknowledgment the Jewish community bestows upon a lay person with outstanding leadership qualities and years of involvement in the Jewish and general communities. Past recipients include J.B. Salsberg, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, Dr. Gerald Halbert, Henry and Julia Koschitzky, and Ronnie Appleby.

"In my father's time, there were very few Jews who had the money, the ability, and the desire to help the community," says Yvonne. "Fortunately, Ben Sadowski was there."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who have made an exceptional contribution to our community.

Rabbi Domb was one of Thornhill's first spiritual leaders

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Rabbi Shlomo (Solomon) Zalman Domb, one of the first spiritual leaders in the developing Jewish community of Thornhill, died of cancer, on Purim. He was 50.

Rabbi Domb was well known for his lyric tenor voice, and he enjoyed leading his congregation, Bnai Shalom North, in prayer. One of his chief joys was listening to classical and cantorial music, learning new and old pieces and talking about music to those he considered simpatico.

Rabbi Shlomo Domb

Less than a month ago, nearly 500 people attended a concert in his honour, organized by his nephew, Alan Domb, and good friends. It was held at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, so that Rabbi Domb, already in palliative care there, could attend.

He did attend, and enthusiastically sang along with close friends cantors Chaim Adler, chief chazzan of Tel Aviv, and Yehuda Rottner of Florida, who flew in for the event.

An estimated 300 people attended Rabbi Domb's graveside funeral. Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, who officiated, said the large turnout showed the respect and affection in which he was held.

Rabbi Ochs also noted the tremendous respect and care Rabbi Domb lavished on his parents.

Rabbi Domb was born in Israel, the fourth and youngest son of Holocaust survivors. The family immigrated to Canada in 1960.

He was educated at Eitz Chaim Schools, in Toronto, as well as at Ner Israel Yeshiva and Bais Medrash L'Rabonim in Brooklyn. While in New York, he studied chazzanut under the late world famous cantor David Kusevitsky, who became a life-long musical influence.

Rabbi Domb served at the House of Jacob in Calgary, Beth Isaiah Congregation in Guelph and Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto. In 1982, he moved to Thornhill, and founded Bnai Shalom North Congregation, Bnai Shalom Hebrew School and Bnai Shalom Day Nursery.

He founded the Vaughan Neighbourhood Support Centre, a government-sponsored organization that brings together all social service agencies in the region. Through this project, he established close connections with politicians at all levels of government.

Vaughan Mayor Michael Di Biase, Vaughan councillors Susan Kadis and Mario Racco, York regional councillor Joyce Frustaglio and local MPP Tina Molinari attended the concert in his honour, and many of them also attending the funeral.

A souvenir booklet praised Rabbi Domb as one who "took a stance for justice, human decency and community unity, even at the expense of diplomacy and political unpopularity."

Rabbi Domb is survived by his children, Miriam and Yossi, and his brothers, Shmuel and Benny.

Distinguished lawyer dead at age 96

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Fred Catzman, who practised law in Toronto for an astonishing 66 years and was a popular one-time columnist for The CJN, died March 13. He was 96.

"He maintained a busy schedule and worked full days right to the end," said his son Marvin, a judge on the Ontario Court of Appeal. "He was very highly regarded in the legal and Jewish communities."

Just last month, Catzman received the Order of Ontario at a ceremony at Queen's Park. "He looked great in his tux," his son said.

From 1985 to 1995, Catzman penned "Name Game," a well-read column in The CJN in which he examined the origins of Jewish surnames, often concluding they derived from occupations, towns and villages, even physical traits.

He was not a genealogy buff, he would explain, but a student of onomatology, the study of the origins of names. He had dozens of books on the subject, his son said.

"A surname is part of the baggage we inherit from our parents," Catzman told The CJN in a 1990 interview. "It's interesting to know where it comes from."

Frederick Murray Catzman was born Jan. 1, 1907 in Toronto, the second of five children of parents who had emigrated three years earlier from the town of Dvimsk in Latvia. He attended Harbord Collegiate Institute, the University of Toronto and Osgoode Hall Law School, where he won the silver medal. He was called to the bar in September 1929, one month before the Great Depression hit.

The spelling of the family's own surname, which derived from Kohen, the Jewish priestly class, was changed from Katzman during the First World War, at a time of anti-German sentiment. A grade school teacher advised young Fred that his name should be spelled with a "C" because the word cat is not spelled with a "K."

He established a law firm, Catzman & Wahl, in 1929 with his brother-in-law, Jack Wahl, who died in 1994. Son Marvin practised with the firm for 17 years until he was named to the bench in 1981.

In 1934, Catzman married Irene Meyers, who died in 1981. Their only child was born in 1938.

In the 1950s, he led a delegation that met with then Ontario Premier Leslie Frost, and his efforts led to the enactment of the Fair Accommodation Practices Act and the Fair Employment Practices Act – both forerunners to provincial human rights laws.

Fred Catzman

In 1989, Catzman was recognized in the Ontario legislature for helping to revise laws governing personal property security in the province. He also drafted the statutes that led to the passing of Ontario's Bulk Sales Act, and he lectured at York and McGill universities.

In 1986, he was honoured with the Law Society of Upper Canada Medal. The society named him a life member in 1979.

Catzman retired in 1995 at the age of 88, but continued to act as executor to several estates. He was a dedicated lawyer, and recalled darker days when he was asked in court whether he was Jewish. He also rued the development of modern mega-firms, saying they were more focussed on the bottom line than the client.

His early study habits, which involved learning Talmud four hours a day, six days a week, translated into a solid work ethic. In 1990, Catzman said he had no plans to retire, "unless sthey carry me out."

"He was outstanding, brilliant and funny," said his son. "He lived alone, by his own choice. He lived and died in the same house since 1950. He was very independent."

Catzman was a founding member and a vice-president of Beth Tzedec Congregation; national chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's community relations committee; a governor of B'nai Brith Canada for two years during World War II; and president of the Toronto Zionist Council in the 1930s.

He leaves his son, two surviving sisters, Bee Brooks and Sydney Wahl, and three grandchildren.

Though in its early stages, the program has started in Israel with an initial group of 50 affected children living in several Jewish settlements. Friedmann says the effort is modeled, roughly, on the North American Big Brother and Big Sister programs.

A project co-ordinator matches children with mentors, who are chosen from among close family members or from within the child's immediate community – someone the child can be comfortable with.

According to Ezer Mizion's promotional material, the program's prime target is to provide a parental figure who can serve not only as a one-on-one mentor but a friend.

Mentors undergo a 60-hour training course designed to equip them to deal with children undergoing traumatic bereavement. The courses are taught by counsellors, therapists, psychologists and educators.

Project co-ordinator matches children with mentors

Initially, the child meets his or her mentor five times a week, following which meetings may be reduced to three times weekly. Each session lasts from 90 minutes to two hours. At first, help with school work is stressed, which will pave the way for boosting the child's self-esteem.

"It's a big commitment," Friedmann says of the mentor's role.

The program's second phase envisions computers for children unable to attend school for long periods; counselling for parents who have lost a spouse to terror attacks; and counselling for educators and care-givers of children who have sustained trauma.

Proceeds from a March 2 concert at the Ford Centre for Performing Arts that featured the Shalsheles Group and a Canadian children's choir will benefit the terror orphan fund.

Tax-deductible donations may be made to the Canadian Friends of Ezer Mizion, 4850 Keele St., 1st floor, Toronto, M3J 3K1, or write to terrororphans@sprint.ca.

Associated says welcome back, Smiley

Grad returns as education director

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Thirty years ago, when Mark Smiley graduated from Associated Hebrew Day Schools, the Neptune Avenue yellow brick building housed grades 1 to 13. It was the biggest Jewish school in a town that had only a handful of day schools.

Back then, some classes had more than 30 students but everyone – from principal to janitor – knew your name.

When Smiley returns this summer to his alma mater as the new director of education, he'll be coming back to a school with three campuses and more than 2,000 students, and to a city that is home to more than 20 Jewish day schools.

Smiley says the administration at Associated ensures that the largest Jewish day school in Toronto continues to "feel small," but with a principal's diplomacy, he also notes there are advantages to being big.

"The social dynamics of large schools allows children to find their soulmates," he tells The CJN.

The former Torontonian is moving back from the Hillel Day School of Detroit, where he has been headmaster for the past 15 years. Smiley is also a faculty member at the Day School Leadership Training Institute at the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) of America in New York, where he received a doctorate in 1988. He is currently pursuing his smichah at the JTS' rabbinical school.

Leaning back in his chair, Smiley nostalgically remembers his elementary school years at Associated and describes himself as an outstanding student.

"Out standing in the hall," Smiley quips, and then suggests that both he and education have come a long way.

Over the years, Smiley says, educators have learned the importance of appreciating different learning styles.

Smiley believes his early school experiences made him realize "that learning comes easy for some and is harder for others" and that there are no easy answers when it comes to education.

From his corner office, Smiley plans to make his "commitment to children and learning central to the educational process and work together with parents to maximize the potential of each and every child."

There is a great deal of creative pedagogy currently being used at Associated, Smiley says.

"The teachers are bringing a breath of fresh air into classes that have third generation Associated families.'

Smiley believes parents remain loyal to Associated because its "unadulterated commitment to Hebrew culture and language" resonates in the community.

Families also "appreciate the benefits of sending children to a non-denominational community school," and they believe there is an advantage to "sending kids to a school with children from all backgrounds," he says.

Mark Smiley

"Children learn to appreciate the meaning of klal Yisrael."

In addition, Smiley believes Associated kids are taught to appreciate the complexity and vastness of knowledge so that they become life-long learners.

"Jewish education should be a positive experience, so that students are encouraged to pursue Jewish learning for the rest of their lives."

Smiley will be moving to Toronto with his wife, Aviva (Silverman) and their three children, Yael, Dov and Benjamin.

As for the difference between kids on the two sides of the border, Smiley says that with more European-born grandparents and day-school educated parents, Canadian kids "get more Yiddishkeit," while American kids seem to be exposed to outside influences at an earlier age.

He says he has also found the education system in Canada to be very intense.

"By the time Canadian kids finish their school year and arrive at camp, they are often exhausted," he says. "However," he adds, "when you watch a baseball game at Camp Ramah, you realize that kids are kids. You really can't tell the difference between them."

Eves unfreezes education tax credit

Last summer's delay of Ontario's Equity in Education Tax Credit will be reversed in the upcoming provincial budget, Premier Ernie Eves announced last week.

Eves announced that parents who send their children to private and faith-based schools will be entitled to a tax credit on their 2003 tax return worth 20 per cent, or $1,400, of the first $7,000 in tuition fees.

Last June, the premier said the province could not afford that and stalled the credit at 10 per cent, or $700, for this year.

Last week's change means a return to the original schedule, which phases in the credit to a maximum of 50 per cent of tuition, or $3,500, in 2006.

In a statement, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress said that while it understood the rationale for freezing the credit, it welcomed last week's announcement.

Passover Food Ideas

Chag Samayach from The CJN

Passover traditions may differ from culture to culture and family to family, but the one thing that never differs is the coming together of family and friends at the Passover seders, and the retelling of the story of the Jews' liberation from Egypt.

Editorial

What is also constant is the importance we place on food in our holiday celebrations. Whether we are cooking for a crowd or for a small family gathering, most cooks start thinking about their Passover menu several months in advance.

Much of what we serve is based on our memories. We can still taste our mother's potato kugel or orange sponge cake, or our grandmother's "special" chicken, and we want to recreate those tastes for our children.

We remember our mothers preparing matzah brei or farfel muffins for our Passover breakfasts and we want to bring back those childhood breakfasts.

In our upcoming food pages, some of our writers have shared their cherished childhood memories; maybe you will try one of the recipes, and it will become part of your own family's food traditions.

We've also tried to provide recipes for those among us who want to add a taste of other cultures to our menus, dishes that have been Passover staples in Jewish homes around the world.

Whether you're cooking for a large seder or just want some tasty, mid-week lunch ideas, you're sure to find something to please even the most selective eater.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach.

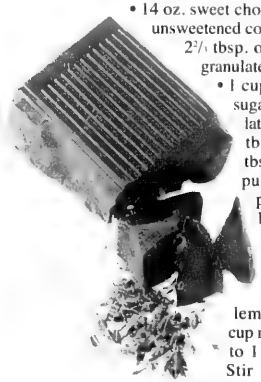
Passover substitutions made easy

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Following is a list of some substitutions for the week of Passover.

- 1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine
- 16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 14 oz. sweet chocolate = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2 2/3 tbsp. oil and 4 1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender
- 1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for dairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1-cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with milk. Stir and steep 5 minutes.



- for butter in baking or cooking, use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt.
- 1 cup honey = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water
- 1 cup corn syrup = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy
- 1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar
- for 1 cup of flour, substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together
- 1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch
- 1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch
- 1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal
- 1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzot ground in a food processor
- 1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted
- 3 crumbled matzot = 2 cups matzah farfel
- 1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine
- 1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water
- For frying: Instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.
- Eggs: Instead of egg substitutes, you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.

Passover birthdays with a flare

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

As if it weren't already difficult enough to come up with interesting Passover menus and dishes, imagine trying to create the kind of birthday goodies we love to serve and not being able to use any chametz.

If the party you need to plan is for the under-12 set you can still serve pizza (or at least something that resembles pizza) and kosher for Passover cake and ice cream, or if you prefer, hot dogs and hamburgers and cake and a sorbet.

For your kids, keep it simple. For the most part, the food is secondary to the fun of getting together with friends (and the presents). There are plenty of ready made kosher for Passover candies and chips that can be served as snacks, and kosher for Passover pop.

When it comes to the adult birthday meal, your menu can be as simple as the one you served the kids or as interesting and fun as at any other time of the year. You are limited only by your imagination and the specific kinds of ingredients you can use.

The following recipes for desserts and main dishes are relatively simple to make, different from the run of the mill Passover recipes and can be served with salads, fresh fruit and a couple of choruses of Happy Birthday.

To make kosher for Passover confectioner's sugar, remove ½ tbsp. from 1 cup of sugar and replace it with ½ tbsp. potato starch. Then process it until it is very fine.

CREAM CHEESE BROWNIES

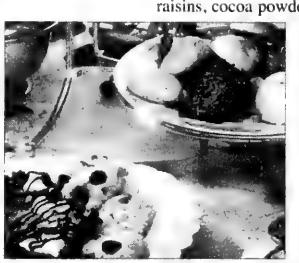
¼ cup butter (or unsalted margarine)
¼ cup soft cream cheese (NOT the whipped kind)
1 cup sugar
2 beaten eggs
½ cup matzah cake flour
3 oz. bittersweet chocolate, melted and cooled
2 tbsp. potato starch
1 cup finely chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 325. In a bowl, cream together the butter and cream cheese. Add the sugar and eggs and mix well. Stir in the cake flour, potato starch, cooled chocolate, chopped nuts (reserve some nuts for the top).

Spread batter in buttered 9x9-inch pan. Sprinkle reserved nuts over top. Bake for 30 minutes. Remove from heat, let cool and cut into squares while warm. Sprinkle the top with powdered sugar. Serves 6.

STRAWBERRY SORBET
(pareve)

2½ pints strawberries, fresh or plain frozen without sugar or other ingredients (defrosted)
1¼ cup sugar
3 tbsp. lemon juice



Purée strawberries in food processor or blender. Add the sugar and lemon juice and mix well. Pour the mixture into a bowl, cover and freeze. Mix every 30 minutes until the sorbet is completely frozen.

MATZAH PIZZA

For each matzah pizza:
1 matzah
shredded mozzarella cheese shredded cheddar cheese grated parmesan cheese prepared marinara or flavoured tomato sauce or chopped fresh tomatoes oregano or Italian seasoning (optional)

Preheat oven to 425. Grease baking pan big enough to fit matzah. Spread tomato sauce (or chopped tomatoes) over matzah. Sprinkle mozzarella, cheddar and parmesan cheeses over tomato sauce. Sprinkle with oregano or Italian seasoning. Bake for 10 minutes or until cheese melts. Serves 1. Can be doubled or tripled.

APPLE CAKE WITH STREUSEL
(pareve)

3 eggs
½ cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
¼ cup oil
¾ cup cake meal
¼ cup ground pecans
5 apples, peeled and sliced juice of ½ orange

Streusel topping:
½ cup sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. ground pecans

Preheat oven to 350. Place the sliced apples in a bowl with the orange juice and toss to coat. Set the mixture aside.

In a food processor or electric mixing bowl, combine the eggs with the sugar, vanilla and oil and beat or process until the mixture is light coloured (2 to 3 minutes). Add the cake meal and pecans and mix well. Pour half the mixture into a greased 8- or 9-in. pan. Put half the apples on top of the batter. Pour the rest of the batter over the apples and place the remaining apples on top of the batter.

In a small bowl, combine the sugar, cinnamon and pecans. Mix to combine and then sprinkle the crumb mixture over the top of the cake. Bake for about 1½ hours.

CHOCO CHEWS

½ cup raisins
¼ cup cocoa powder
¼ cup margarine
2 tbsp. cold coffee
2 tbsp. sugar
2 cups matzah farfel
¾ cup almonds, roughly chopped, and divided
1 tsp. vanilla

Line two cookie sheets with parchment paper and set aside. In a medium saucepan, place the raisins, cocoa powder, margarine, coffee and sugar, and cook the mixture over low heat until the margarine is melted. Stir to blend the mixture together.

Remove the saucepan from the heat. Add the farfel, ½ cup of the chopped almonds, and vanilla, and fold gently to combine.

Drop tablespoonfuls of the mixture on to the parchment-lined cookie sheets and sprinkle a little of the remaining chopped almonds over the top of each cluster. Place the cookie sheets in the refrigerator and chill the clusters for 1 hour or until firm. Store in an airtight container. Makes 2 dozen.

Passover Food Ideas

Put some adventure into your Passover cooking

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

If you are you tired of the same old brisket and kugel, you will be inspired by Jeffrey Nathan's innovative, passionate approach to kosher cooking in Adventures in Jewish Cooking (Clarkson Potter, $48.50 Cdn). This is Nathan's first cookbook, with over 150 contemporary, creative recipes, clearly labelled as dairy, meat or pareve, plus substitutions to adjust recipes for a meat or dairy meal.

Inspired by Jewish cuisine from around the globe plus a diverse palette of other ethnic flavours, Nathan captures the spirit of Jewish cooking while exploring a whole world of sophisticated flavours. His recipes observe the laws of kashrut, while setting a new standard for kosher cuisine with his inventive dishes and outstanding presentations.

You'll find lots of valuable cooking tips from this extremely creative chef, who is also the host of the top-rated PBS show, New Jewish Cuisine. (Unfortunately the show is not available in Canada.)

Nathan began his professional career as a dishwasher at Villa Russo, an Italian restaurant in Queens. There, despite the piles of dirty pots and pans, he discovered a passion for cooking.

His formal culinary training began in the U.S. Navy, where he was the personal cook for the ship's captain. In addition to cooking for military personnel, Nathan also prepared meals for foreign heads of state and ambassadors, including Anwar Sadat and Menachim Begin. After an honourable discharge, Nathan attended the Culinary Institute of America on the GI bill.

He is the executive chef and co-owner of Abigael's in New York City, which serves new Jewish cuisine – elegant and delicious renditions of ethnic food from all over the world. Nathan wants his customers to think of Abigael's, not as a kosher restaurant, but as a great restaurant that just happens to be kosher.

Adventures in Jewish Cooking includes an innovative offering of year-round menus for the major Jewish holidays, including two creative menus that are perfect for your Passover seders.

There are mouthwatering colour photographs that almost leap off the page, including Gefilte Fish Terrine with Carrot and Beet Salads, Sephardic Chicken Soup with Sofrito and Saffron Matzo Balls, and Passover Banana Cake with Strawberry-Marsala Compote. The book includes many recipes for Abigael's most famous dishes, presented exactly as they are served at the restaurant. No doubt about it, you'll just have to add this book to your cookbook collection!

Wishing you many new Adventures in Jewish Cooking!

MANGO-DATE HAROSET

On the Passover plate, charoset may represent the mortar and bricks the Hebrews used to build the Egyptian pyramids, but that doesn't mean it should look like mud, according to Nathan. His charoset has a bright golden colour (thank you, mangoes) and an intriguing exotic flavour that everyone at the table will enjoy – even those picky eaters who have been spreading the same charoset on their matzah for several decades.

½ cup walnut pieces
⅓ cup pecan halves
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. peeled, shredded, minced fresh ginger (use the large holes on a box grater)
2 ripe mangoes, peeled, seeded and cut into ¼-inch dice
⅔ cup seedless red grapes, quartered
½ cup pitted dates, cut into ¼-inch dice
½ cup sweet white wine
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice

Roughly chop walnuts, pecans and cinnamon in a food processor along with sugar and ginger. Transfer chopped nut mixture to a medium bowl. Stir in mangoes, grapes and dates. Gently stir in wine and lemon juice. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate to blend flavours, about 2 hours. (Can be made up to 1 day ahead.) Makes 3½ cups.

RACK OF VEAL WITH WILD MUSHROOM-FARFEL DRESSING

Roasts are easy to prepare and always impressive, and since veal is truly one of the most elegant meats you can serve, this dish is an extra-special treat worthy of your finest holiday menu. Order this particular cut ahead of time from the butcher – it won't be cheap, but it will be lean and delicious. Because veal isn't fatty, care must be taken not to overcook it. The matzah farfel stuffing, which is baked on the side, is also great with turkey.

2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil, plus more for the pan one 5-rib (3¾-pound) first-cut rack of veal, chine bone removed 1 tsp. kosher salt
1½ tsp. chopped fresh rosemary
1 tsp. chopped fresh thyme
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
3 cups chicken stock (homemade is best)

Wild mushroom-farfel dressing:

3 cups matzah farfel
¾ cup homemade chicken stock
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 medium onion, chopped
2 tbsp. plumped and diced sun-dried tomatoes (see note below)
2 garlic cloves, minced
8 oz. assorted wild mushrooms (such as cremini and stemmed shiitake), coarsely chopped
½ cup coarsely chopped arugula
1 large egg, beaten
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
½ tsp. kosher salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
2 tsp. potato starch, dissolved in 2 tbsp. cold water

To make the veal, position a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat oven to 400. Lightly oil a roasting pan. Brush the veal with the oil. Mix salt, 1 tsp. of the rosemary, ½ tsp. of the thyme, and the pepper in a small bowl; sprinkle over the veal. Place veal, rib side down, in the pan. Roast until an instant-read thermometer inserted in the centre of the roast registers 140, about 1¼ hours.

Meanwhile, make the farfel dressing. Lightly oil a 9 x 13-inch casserole.

Heat a large skillet over medium heat. Add farfel and heat, stirring occasionally, until lightly toasted, about 3 minutes. Transfer to a large bowl. Add the stock and let stand to soften while preparing the other ingredients.

Heat oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Add onion and cook until translucent, about 5 minutes. Stir in sun-dried tomatoes and garlic and cook for 1 minute. Add mushrooms and cook, stirring occasionally, until they give off their liquid, about 4 minutes. Stir mushroom mixture into farfel and allow to cool slightly. Stir in arugula, beaten egg and basil; season with salt and pepper. Spread in prepared casserole and cover with aluminum foil.

When the veal is done, remove it from the oven, place on a carving board and cover loosely with aluminum foil. Let stand for 20 to 30 minutes. Reduce oven temperature to 350. Bake the dressing until heated through, about 30 minutes.

While the stuffing is baking, make a sauce. Place the roasting pan over medium-high heat. Pour in the stock and bring to a boil, scraping up the browned bits in the pan with a wooden spoon. Cook until thickened and reduced to 1½ cups, about 10 minutes. Stir in the remaining ½ tsp. each of rosemary and thyme. Whisk enough of the dissolved potato starch into the boiling liquid to thicken it to your liking. Season sauce with salt and pepper and pour into a sauceboat.

Carve the veal and serve with the dressing and sauce. Makes 6 servings.

Note: To rehydrate sun-dried tomatoes that are not soaked in oil, cover with very hot tap water in a medium bowl. Add a splash of red or white distilled vinegar to the water (this heightens the tomato flavour).

Let stand until the tomatoes are plumped, about 30 minutes. Drain well and pat completely dry with paper towels. Use immediately. To store, pack rehydrated sun-dried tomatoes in a covered container and cover completely with olive oil. They will keep at least 6 months.

Passover Food Ideas

A seder fit for a star

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

When Mandy Patinkin was growing up, one of his mother's biggest projects was getting her son to eat.

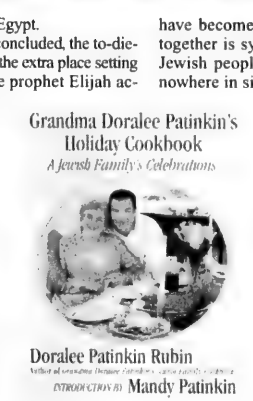
But to hear the award-winning singer and actor tell it, he'd wait impatiently at the Passover table for her chocolate sponge cake topped with raspberry sauce, he'd sneak sugar cookies and brownies from the dessert trays as they lay cooling for the family Chanukah celebration, and his mouth still waters when he remembers Ma's kosher hot dogs and baked beans. ("Don't forget the sugar," he counsels.) And her amazing hot cream cheese puffs. ("You have to use Philadelphia cream cheese," he warns.) Maybe his mother thought he could care less, but Patinkin seems to know an awful lot about the subject.

As the accomplished theatre, film and television star got older, his culinary tastes spread to fast food, which horrified his aunts and grandma, who repeatedly asked his mother, "How can you let him eat that junk?"

But Doralee Patinkin, a cook so skilled she would author two Jewish cookbooks – Grandma Doralee Patinkin's Holiday Cookbook and Grandma Doralee Pantinkin's Jewish Family Cookbook – at Mandy's insistence, was pragmatic. "He's so skinny. Finally he likes something. I'm not going to let him eat it!?"

On the first night of Passover, the family flocked to Auntie Ida's for the seder. A minimum of 25 people sat at the annual event, at tables spread around the apartment, eating fabulous food off her red glass Passover plates. Laughing and singing abounded and, of course, the story was told of our ancestors' flight for freedom from Pharaoh's Egypt.

After the service was concluded, the to-die-for desserts devoured, and the extra place setting and glass of wine for the prophet Elijah acknowledged, there was teenage Patinkin, barefoot, draped in a white sheet, carrying a staff and singing Eliyahu Hanavi. Just as others simulate Santa Claus, Patinkin was the self-appointed ghost of Passovers past.



This should have been a clue that Patinkin had talent because his performance scared his young cousin half to death. "We spent the rest of the evening trying to calm him down," says Doralee.

Patinkin lost his father when he was 19, but both he and his mother fondly remember the joy Lester Patinkin felt in leading the Passover service, and especially in hiding the afikoman.

"One year, dad thought he'd fool the kids by hiding the cloth-covered matzah in his sock. Dad wore these long black stockings that came up to his knees," Patinkin relays.

"So dad sat at the table, grinning, as the kids traipsed through the house, poking around all the usual places. Finally, someone spotted the cloth covered piece of matzah sticking out of his sock. But in order to claim the prize, they had to match the broken piece up with its original half. [As the story goes, the hidden portion of the afikoman represents Jews who have become lost. Putting the pieces back together is symbolic for the reunion of the Jewish people.] The wayward matzah was nowhere in sight. And then, Grandma Celia shrieked. She'd eaten it. She was so embarrassed. We still laugh about it," Patinkin muses.

Today Patinkin and his wife Kathryn host a seder for family and friends at their house in New York.

"We try to make it very kid-friendly and casual – sometimes we sit on the floor," says Patinkin. "We invite an army of people and encourage everyone to participate. Sons Isaac, 17 and Gideon, 13, don the white sheets to emulate Elijah. They even spill a cup of wine to make bare footprints on the floor so everyone will know Elijah is for real. Sometimes we do a snake dance through the house singing Eliyahu Hanavi."

Patinkin got his mother to write her cookbooks at age 70 something.

"He was always calling me for recipes," says Doralee. "As a child, the extent of his culinary accomplishment was chocolate chip cookies. Now, all of a sudden, he loves to cook. So, every holiday he'd be on the phone. How do you make the brisket, the turkey, the sweet potatoes?"

"She'd given me the recipes a million times. I kept losing the pieces of paper," Patinkin laughs. "So I told her I was sending her a computer and printer and she was going to write them down." It was then he realized his mother should write a cookbook.

When Patinkin was growing up, he thought his mother lived in the kitchen. As he got older he realized the kitchen was her kingdom – her passion. He credits her with passing on that passion to him.

ACORN SQUASH WITH GINGER-ORANGE GLAZE

The orange and ginger essence gives this under-utilized vegetable a flavour that is incredible. You can also serve it with roast chicken.

⅔ cup orange marmalade
2 tbsp. peeled and minced fresh ginger
1 tbsp. dry white wine
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
⅛ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
2 1½-lb. acorn squashes, halved lengthwise, seeds removed, flesh pierced well with a fork
3 tbsp. unsweetened coconut flakes, toasted (see note)

Position a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat oven to 350. Lightly oil an aluminum foil-lined baking sheet.

Bring marmalade, ginger, wine, lemon juice and nutmeg to a boil over medium heat, stirring often. Brush the cut side of the squash with a light coating of the glaze, reserving remaining glaze.

Place the squash, glazed side down, on the baking sheet. Bake until the squash is tender when pierced with a meat fork, 40 to 45 minutes.

Cut each squash in half lengthwise to make two wedges. Return the squash to baking sheet, cut sides up. Brush generously with remaining glaze. Bake to set the glaze, about 5 minutes.

Transfer to a serving platter and sprinkle with toasted coconut. Serve hot. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Note: To toast coconut, spread on a baking sheet and bake in a preheated 350-degree oven, stirring often, until toasted, 3 to 5 minutes. They tend to brown quickly, so keep an eye on them.

Food fit for a "five star" restaurant

Although he claims "anything my mom makes tastes like it came out of a five-star restaurant," Doralee qualifies the statement. Her food isn't gourmet; the cookbooks are made up of old-fashioned, Jewish-style dishes, that most Americans know and love. Of course, for Patinkin, his mother's cookbooks are more than just recipes. He loves hunting through the pages looking for his childhood. The greatest thing about these books, he says, is that this part of his childhood isn't lost.

The following Passover recipes are from Grandma Doralee Patinkin's Holiday Cookbook.

PASSOVER CARROT KUGEL

¼ cup cake meal
¼ cup potato starch
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg
¼ tsp. ground cloves
¼ lb. butter or margarine
½ cup oil
½ cup brown sugar
2 egg yolks
1¼ cups grated carrots
¼ cup fresh lemon juice grated rind of 1 lemon
3 egg whites

Sift the cake meal, potato starch, salt, and spices together. Combine margarine, oil, brown sugar and egg yolks in a food processor. Blend well. Add the carrots and lemon juice and rind and blend once again. Incorporate the dry ingredients. Remove batter to a large bowl. Beat the egg whites until stiff and fold into the batter. Pour into a 4½-cup greased ring mold or an 8½x 11-inch baking pan. Place in refrigerator overnight. Remove from refrigerator and allow to stand at room temperature for ½ hour prior to baking. Preheat oven to 350. Bake for 45 to 60 minutes. Test with a toothpick at 45 minutes.

This may be frozen unbaked. When ready to bake, remove from freezer and allow to stand at room temperature for about 1 hour before baking. It may be necessary to allow additional time for baking if not thawed completely. Yield: 10 to 12 servings.

PASSOVER FLORENTINES

2½ cups sliced almonds
1 cup sugar
¼ lb. butter, melted
5 tbsp. cake meal
2 egg whites, slightly beaten
dash of salt
½ tsp. vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 350. Line cookie sheets with baking parchment. Toss almonds and sugar together. Stir in melted butter. Stir in cake meal, egg whites, salt and vanilla. Stir until well blended.

Drop by spoonfuls about 2 inches apart onto cookie sheets. Bake one sheet at a time for 10 minutes, or until golden brown around the edges and bottom. Cool on the parchment.

Option: When cool, brush one end of each cookie with melted semi-sweet chocolate. Place on waxed paper and allow to harden. Yield: at least 56 cookies.

BUTTER PECAN MATZAH CRISPS

3 unsalted matzot, each 6-in. square (I prefer thin tea matzot)
1 cup butter or margarine
1 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1 cup pecan pieces
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
¼ cup cream or milk

Preheat oven to 375. Lay 2 of the matzot side by side in a 10 x 15-inch rimmed baking pan lined with aluminum foil. Break the other matzah and fill in along the side and the top.

In a 1½- to 2-quart pan, melt the butter over medium heat. Add sugar and pecans and stir often until mixture comes to a rolling boil, then boil until big shiny bubbles form — about 1 to 2 minutes.

Remove from heat, stir in vanilla, and immediately pour hot mixture over matzot. Spread sugar mixture quickly and evenly, with back of spoon or spatula, up to but not over edges of matzot.

Transfer pan to oven and bake until matzot are a little crisp, about 3 to 6 minutes. While matzot are baking, melt the chocolate and cream in a double boiler or in the microwave oven. Mix until smooth.

Remove matzot from oven and spread with melted chocolate. Let cool until chocolate hardens. Break into small pieces. Yield: at least 12 to 18 pieces.

PASSOVER BROWNIES

2 jumbo-size eggs, at room temperature, separated
2 oz. unsweetened baking chocolate
¼ lb. butter or margarine
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
¼ cup cake meal
¼ cup potato starch
1 tsp. grated orange rind
¼ cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Beat the egg whites until stiff and set aside. Melt the chocolate and the butter or margarine in a large glass bowl in your microwave. Add the sugar, egg yolks and vanilla to the chocolate mixture. Sift the cake meal and potato starch together and add to the chocolate mixture. Add the grated orange rind and the chopped nuts. Fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites.

Pour into a greased 9-inch square pan and bake for 20 to 25 minutes. Remove from oven and cool on a cake rack. Cut into desired sizes. Yield: 16 to 20 servings.

CHICKEN MARRAKESH: as seen in The Hadassah Jewish Holiday Cookbook, Publishers Group West publishing.

Magic can be made from broken pieces, sweetened just right

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

My great-grandmother, Gouda, escaped Germany by boat at night when she was in her 60s. My grandfather, Opa, fled with her along with his wife and two small children when he was 42.

Both lived long, energetic lives in their adopted country, the United States. She chased her great-grandchildren around in a playful hide and seek when she was 95 years old. He rebuilt the synagogue he abandoned in Grebenau with a smaller one in the Bronx.

Both also had elaborate Passover breakfast rituals involving broken pieces of matzah.

"Gouda lined her half-full coffee cup with thin strips of matzah," my mother told me. Then, in the order they went in, she lifted each piece out, sprinkled it with sugar and ate it.

"She had to work quickly; otherwise the matzah would become too soft and drop off," my mother said, "and when I was a young girl, I watched, waiting to see if even one would break!"

When I was a young girl, I watched Opa gather the small, leftover pieces of matzah and pour them in his half-full coffee cup.

"Nothing should go to waste," he would say. Then he took one big piece of matzah in his hands and crumbled it over the cup until it was filled to the brim. When he was satisfied with the matzah to coffee ratio, he pushed down with a big spoon, crunching the pieces closer and closer together, allowing the warm coffee to soak through. Then he waited for a minute or two, before he carefully placed the saucer over the cup. Flipped. Jiggled. Lifted. Voila! A matzah mountain.

With a small silver spoon, he sprinkled a layer of sugar, like new snow, over his mountain, and from the top down, working gently, spoonful by spoonful, in silence, he ate, until the mountain was gone.

Matzah symbolizes freedom, but broken matzah, an integral part of the Passover seder, symbolizes the struggle for freedom and the reality that no one is totally free.

So maybe it is no coincidence that my biggest moves to new cities happened around Passover. And that the foods from those first seders stand out for me, some dry and strange, some smooth and magically sweet.

When my daughter was two, we left our home in Atlanta, Ga., for a fresh start in Portland, Ore. In Atlanta we lived in a ranch house, within easy driving distance of my five brothers and sisters, their spouses and children, my parents and a thick group of old and new friends. In Portland, I rented an apartment about 20 minutes away from one college friend and his dog, Moose.

The emptiness was palpable, as was the excitement in arranging our furniture in a new place that overlooked a park with an orange climbing gym and a swimming pool surrounded by plump bushes and flowering trees. But when the holidays rolled around, I wondered who would share our table. Our liberated family of two felt small.

Eventually, I found a cozy Jewish preschool for my daughter to attend, and we met some new people and got invited to a big family seder. The faces were new, as was the relentless black rain filling the windows, but the food was warm and plentiful – soup, matzah kugels, warmed fruits and more I can't remember.

But what I can never forget is the dessert. A cousin of the host brought a zip lock bag full of broken matzah pieces half covered in a chunky chocolate coating. I was stuffed from the long meal, but with my last sip of wine, I took a bite of the sweetened matzah. Magic! The chocolate covered a buttery toffee layer in between, and it tasted like a gift. I got up from the table, joined the group of woman at the kitchen counter eating straight from the bag. We all agreed it was dangerously good. We laughed. We ate more.

After a while, I looked over my shoulder. My daughter was playing on the floor with her new friend. I looked out the window. The rains no longer seemed as dark. With each chocolate bite, my move far away from home lost some of its bitter taste. And I learned what Gouda and Opa surely understood – that magic can be made from broken pieces, sweetened just right.

CHOCOLATE TOFFEE MATZAH

This is a very adaptable recipe. The quantity of the ingredients depends on how much chocolate and butter you want covering the matzah. My daughter and I make it every year, and she covers the pieces with indulgent quantities of chocolate, both milk and semi-sweet. But we always leave part of the matzah uncovered for ease of handling and visual variety.

1 cup butter
1 cup brown sugar
1 box matzah

3 cups (at least!) chocolate (semisweet morsels, dark or milk chocolate bars chopped with serrated knife, or any other chocolate you like) chopped nuts (optional)

Line two cookie sheets with foil. Arrange matzah, broken in half, on lined cookie sheets. (Some overlapping is fine.) Melt butter and sugar over low heat, stirring constantly. Pour over matzah parts and spread with spatula. (It will not cover completely, which is fine, but you can alter to taste.)

Sprinkle chocolate morsels, chocolate shavings over matzah.

Bake in 300-degree oven, approximately 5-10 minutes, or until chocolate melts. (Hint, the morsels may not look melted but take out and spread with spatula or knife to test. Bake a few more minutes if still solid.)

Remove from oven, spread chocolate over matzah while still warm. Sprinkle with nuts (optional). Put trays, uncovered, in freezer until hardened, about 2 hours. Break matzah in smaller, uneven pieces and store in zip lock bags in freezer until you are ready to eat.

BETTY GOODFRIEND'S MATZAH KUGEL

This recipe is an adaptation of Mrs. Goodfriend's wondrous lokshen (noodle) kugel. If you ever tasted her noodle kugel, you wouldn't hesitate to create this Passover version.

1 can pineapple slices or chunks
6-8 tbsp. margarine
1 tbsp. brown sugar
4 large eggs
1/3 cup Sabra liqueur
1/2 cup pineapple juice from can (optional)
8 matzahs, broken into 1 1/2-in. x 2-in. pieces
1/4 cup white sugar
1/3 cup vegetable oil plus 2 tbsp.
1/4 cup raisins
1 tsp. cinnamon (to taste)

Topping: (optional)
2/3 cup dark brown sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
chopped walnuts, or almond slivers margarine to dot on top (optional)

Melt margarine and pour into 9 x 13 glass pan. Make sure all sides are greased. Sprinkle brown sugar evenly over bottom. Arrange pineapple slices in a layer. Preheat oven to 350.

Put broken matzah pieces (not too small or they will become mushy) in medium bowl and pour warm water over to soften. Soak approximately 3-4 minutes. Drain. Squeeze out liquid completely. Put raisins in small bowl and pour hot water over to plump. Drain.

In large bowl, whisk eggs, sugar, oil, pineapple juice and liqueur together. Add cinnamon. With wooden spoon, mix matzah and raisins into egg mixture. (At this point, Mrs. Goodfriend said to taste for salt and add if needed). Pour matzah mixture over pineapples in baking pan.

Topping: Mix sugar, cinnamon and nuts together and sprinkle over noodles. Dot with extra margarine if desired.

Bake for one hour. Test at 45 minutes to see if bottom is dark. If so, move pan to higher rack in oven and bake 15 minutes longer.

Variation: Arrange red cherries, chopped walnuts or pecans on bottom layer of pineapple. Allow kugel to cool 10 minutes and then (using oven mitts) flip onto slightly larger serving platter for a beautiful upside down kugel!

Student government elections raise concerns

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Following the actions of Concordia University's Student Union – which in December temporarily suspended the Montreal university's Hillel funding – Jewish students such as Denes Rothschild and Marni Tolensky at the University of Toronto and Michael Ferman at York University have been concerned about elections for student government on their campuses.

"There were some concerns raised by many people about the left-wing candidates being anti-war and anti-Israel, that this might become a Concordia situation. We're very pleased that didn't happen," said Rothschild, U of T Hillel's Israel advocacy chair, of the Students Administrative Council (SAC) elections that took place on his campus March 12 to 14.

"We were informed that a [vice-presidential] candidate was running in the election who had some radical views," said Tolensky, a third-year law student and vice-president of U of T's Jewish Law Students Association. "The environment at U of T has been an ongoing concern for us, especially because of Concordia and York."

At York University, which like U of T has one of the largest Jewish student populations in the country – there are an estimated 4,500 Jewish students at York and 4,000 at U of T – tensions have been high between Jewish and Arab students.

In January, pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes spoke on the campus under heavy security because of protests by the Middle Eastern Students Association prior to his visit. Earlier this month, two Jewish students were roughed up by anti-war protesters.

York Federation of Students (YFS) elections have been postponed until October because it was believed "too many inconsistencies had already occurred in the process for a valid election to be held," according to a memo sent to candidates by Marilyn Campbell, YFS' deputy returning officer.

Among the irregularities, several candidates were disqualified for having fewer than the minimum required number of nominations and being nominated more than once, according to an article in York's student newspaper, the Excalibur.

Ferman, a first-year student who chaired York's recent Israelfest and was running for YFS faculty of arts councillor, said Jewish and non-Jewish students had expressed concerns to him over a slate headed by Mostafa Henaway, whose platform was "Books Not Bombs." Ferman said slate members had been seen at anti-war events and that students' reservations included "possibly taking away from the [YFS'] academic focus."

ARTS FESTIVAL: At left, Lauren Muskat, an advertising and graphic design student at Humber College, discusses her artwork with two visitors to this year's Jewish student art festival. The two-day event, titled Reflections: A Festival of Jewish Student Creativity, was held March 15 and 16 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts and included two evening performances of music, film, dance, theatre and spoken word. Canadian firm recycles ink cartridges to aid Israel

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

You may want to think twice the next time you're about to throw out a used ink jet cartridge.

Instead of tossing it in the garbage, help the Israeli economy and protect the environment by giving it to Israel Ink.

Founded in December 2002 by Ottawa-based Howard Herzog and Larry Tarof, Israel Ink is a private venture whose ink jet cartridge recycling program collects used cartridges for remanufacture at Kibbutz Afik, which overlooks Lake Kinneret. The kibbutz runs Afic Printing Products Ltd., which remanufactures used ink jet cartridges for resale in Israel and Europe.

Larry Tarof and Howard Herzog of Israel Ink.

But due to a lack of used cartridges in Israel, the kibbutz has had to discontinue its sales to Europe. This is where Israel Ink comes in – it sends the used cartridges from North America to the kibbutz.

"This is just the tip of doing normal business with Israel," says Herzog. "Whatever we can do in our everyday lives where it economically makes any sense at all to interact with Israeli businesses is really a very important mission … All of us can help in a small way."

Herzog says the current conflict in Israel heightens the need for grassroots efforts such as Israel Ink.

"During any period of war, the Israeli economy gets hit very hard because of its dependency on tourism, and these kinds of things can help offset this," he says.

To launch the program, Herzog and Tarof have e-mailed synagogues, schools and Jewish community centres in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. Herzog said the next step is to target offices of Jewish organizations and then professional offices that are owned by members of the Jewish community.

Herzog and Tarof provide recycling boxes and collect them when they're full. So far, about 25 Jewish synagogues, schools and community centres are participating in the program. For every usable ink jet cartridge collected, Israel Ink will contribute $1 to the collecting institution.

Herzog says he's received positive feedback from the schools and synagogues he has approached.

"They think it's neat that we can actually do this. It's a win-win scenario."

But, he says, because the venture is so new, the word still needs to get out.

"We're trying to get it down to the individual members of the community to change their behaviour to make this work."

As Herzog and Tarof continue to get organizations to institute the program, they have a long-term goal of expanding the program into New York.

The business partners also have ideas for other projects. Herzog says if Kibbutz Afik has enough products to resell, then Israel Ink may be able to help the kibbutz market them in North America. Herzog and Tarof are also looking for other products to recycle, such as small electronics.

"Things that can be collected and recycled are an area we'd like to expand into, but we want to do it in the same model as an Israel business builder," says Herzog.

He says the ink jet venture is significant because of its link to Israel.

"This wouldn't be a highly compelling business venture [without the Israel connection]," he says. "It's a lot of work to try to bring this up to what I would call a very modest income. So from that point of view alone, the business plan doesn't hang together.

"Where it hangs together is that it's a work of love – it's something that Larry and I will really enjoy doing. So it has much greater meaning than a business venture on its own."

For more information, e-mail Herzog and Tarof at recycle@israel-ink.com or visit their Web site at www.israel-ink.com. An Israel Ink ink jet cartridge recycling box is located at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Evangelical Christians planning next mission

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A group of 20 evangelical Christians who recently returned from Israel had barely shaken off the effects of jet lag when they began planning their next mission to the Holy Land – this one involving as many as 2,000 Canadian supporters of the Jewish state.

Scheduled to depart in April 2004, the mission will gather Canadian Christians in a massive "rally of support" for Israel, said Charles McVety, president of the Canada Christian College and an organizer of the recently concluded trip.

"Most of us have all led large groups to Israel and we have 2½ million people to draw from, so to gather 2,000 should be a reality....The trip is not exclusively a tour; it's a mission to express support at a difficult time," he said.

McVety, who also represents the John Hagee Ministries in Canada, organized the recent mission in conjunction with the Israel Government Tourist Office and El Al Israel Airlines. He said the recent week-long visit to Israel was "a spectacular trip. The results were phenomenal. All our goals and objectives were met."

McVety's sentiments were echoed by Roy Beyer, head of the Canadian Family Action Coalition and host of a TV show on the Miracle Channel.

"My wife and I absolutely loved it. We had no idea we would enjoy it so much." Visiting Israel had not really been a must-do activity. "Now I see it as a priority for any Bible-believing person. It hits you in a different way when you actually see the Mount of Olives, the Temple Mount" as well as the archeological digs in Jerusalem, he said.

McVety believes the mission strengthened the group's bonds of unity with the Jewish people. A meeting with Israel's Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau in Jerusalem built on the foundation that was laid during the rabbi's visit to Toronto last October. What's more, "everyone in Israel was so warm to us, you could feel the bonds developing," he said.

"We spoke with the rabbi about the unprecedented and unique bond between Christians and Jews and that we need to work together. He found that we were in this together. We're brothers and sisters. We're fighting the same enemy and the only way to survive is to work together."

Expanding on his statement, McVety said the joint "enemy" is a metaphorical reference to "those who propagate hate, disease, terror, lawlessness and unbelief."

The meeting with the Chief Rabbi was part of a hectic schedule that saw the group also meet with Gideon Meir, deputy director-general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs; Benny Elon, a member of the cabinet; Knesset speaker Reuven Rivlin; Ra'anan Gissin, senior adviser to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon; Dan Bahat, an archeology lecturer and expert on Jerusalem; and Tom Rose, publisher and CEO of the Jerusalem Post.

The meetings were informative and at times moving, McVety stated.

Rose was particularly enlightening, especially for those who rely only on the mainstream media for their information about the Middle East.

"We only read about the terrorist acts that are successful in killing people. He said 90 to 95 per cent of terrorist acts are intercepted by the Israel Defence Force and that they are constantly bombarded by these vicious attacks. No doubt, that took us by surprise," McVety said.

One successful attack that took place during their visit, a bus bombing in Haifa, claimed 15 lives. "The striking thing about that was that the Palestinian media referred to Haifa as the occupied territories, which of course means they believe all of Israel is occupied territory," McVety said.

"It was an eye-opener that the Arabs do not recognize Israel within any boundaries...What that says is that they don't recognize the right for Israel to exist."

Beyer, a senior member of Stockwell Day's past leadership campaign team, said the terror attacks in Israel were "way over the top, inexcusable acts. No other nation would be expected to sit down and negotiate when those acts are occurring."

Watching Palestinian TV, McVety witnessed "a cartoon of a seven-year-old boy who wants to be a suicide bomber. For them to brainwash young children to glorify suicide bombing is inhumane and goes against all civilization," he said.

Following their mission, the evangelical group issued a document titled Israel, You Are Not Alone. The document expressed repentance for historic Christian anti-Semitism, recognized a bond with the Jewish people, acknowledged gratitude for the gift of the Bible and accepted Genesis 12:3's call to bless Israel.

Participants in the mission have dispersed to their homes across Canada and are spreading the word to their congregations or on TV and radio shows. Beyer said he had prepared a show based on the trip that was scheduled to air on his Reality Check program this week.

CBC implies Iraq's case can be compared to Israel's

As of this writing, the United States is on the brink of war in Iraq. If the confrontation comes to pass, obviously it will dominate the media.

Even so, there is an issue that demands comment. On March 13, CBC's National aired "Crisis Questions," in which viewers submitted their inquiries for analysis.

The lead question of the 25-minute show concerned the legality of war in Iraq. Leslie MacKinnon, the CBC reporter for that segment, accorded University of Toronto law professor Ed Morgan enough time only to assert that UN Security Council Resolution 1441 allows the use of force.

Meanwhile, Craig Scott of Osgoode Hall Law School argued the case for illegality for approximately one minute.

MacKinnon concluded: "Legally, they [the United States et al] should answer to the Security Council."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Peter Mansbridge commented: "Well, we told you it's not simple on these things."

Yes, if viewers had been presented both sides equally!

(CBC Radio's The Current, which aired March 19, also dealt with this topic, but Morgan and Scott were given equal time to present their views.)

By far, the most flagrantly one-sided account in the show came from CBC reporter Neil Macdonald, who fielded a question about whether Iraq alone is in violation of UN Security Council resolutions, and if not, what force is being brought to bear on other offenders.

Macdonald made no reference to Iraq's special case. He lumped various Security Council resolutions and countries together, naming Israel first, then Morocco, Turkey, Indonesia and Armenia. The false implication is that the cases of Iraq and these countries, particularly Israel, are comparable.

Israel fought a war of self defence in 1967 and legally controls territory it has attempted to cede through negotiations according to Resolution 242. Israel, the object of repeated Arab aggression, has been complying with UN resolutions, and cannot be likened to any of these other countries, foremost Iraq.

CBC researchers, if not Macdonald himself, should have known that only states such as Iraq, which under Chapter VII UN Security Council resolutions have been declared threats to international peace and security, are subject to armed enforcement of the resolutions if they do not comply. This does not apply to Israel which, despite tremendous UN hostility, has never been deemed a threat to international peace and security.

Macdonald never mentioned other instances of occupation, for example, China's colonization of Tibet or Syria's occupation of Lebanon. He only named countries that have ties to the United States.

In his answer, Macdonald relied on expert Steven Zunes, a radical University of San Francisco professor. Zunes's essays decrying alleged U.S. and Israeli misdeeds appear, among other publications, in Z magazine, the principal vehicle for Noam Chomsky and his acolytes. Zunes has written about countries that violate resolutions and are supported by the United States: Turkey, Indonesia, Israel and Morocco. He was clearly Macdonald's man.

Meanwhile, a few days later, Macdonald filed his first report from Washington. He focused entirely on claims that the New American Century, a neo-conservative think-tank that has long advocated confronting Iraq, directs much of U.S. President George W. Bush's thinking.

Critics on the radical left have made much of this neo-con influence. They have downplayed or ignored the fact that the Sept. 11 attacks had far more impact on U.S. foreign policy, as Bob Woodward and Christopher Hitchens, among others, have recently emphasized.

Can we expect to hear from Hitchens in a future report by Macdonald?

מה יהיה

הינה דבריו של ב. מיכאל בידיעות אחרונות:

"עכשיו, כשעוד סיבוב דמים חשלים את מסלולו, והכסילים והרשעים של שני העמים עמלים על שיגורו של סיבוב דמים חדש, כדאי לשוב ולמלמל, כמו קאטו הזקן, כמה אמיתות-יסוד שלא השתנו ולא ישתנו:

.....אבל עם אנשים זחוחים עם כוונות לייהר באישונים, אלה המשוכנעים שאין בעיה שאי אפשר לפותרה בעזרת רובי צלפים....הם אינם יודעים זאת....."

אחת הפגישות המרתקות שלו היתה עם שר האוצר הפלשתינאי החדש סאלם פאיד, בן חמישים, בעל תואר דוקטורט בכלכלה בטקסס. הוא הובא על ידי ערפאת לאחר שהתבהר שללא היסוד השחיתות לא תעביר לו ישראל גרוש מן חמישים שנאספו, וגישה דומה נקטו הממשל של בוש ואחרים.

וכאן מתחילה צרה חדשה של ערפאת- האיש היסודי והחנון הזה מנסה להכניס נורמות חשבונאיות מערביות. וזה כמו ללמד שימפנזה באלט קלאסי. צריך לקוות שלא תימצא גופתו בוקר אחד בתעלה בכניסה לרמאללה.

Organization to focus on sick kids in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Larger Than Life, a not-for-profit organization dedicated to improving the quality of life of Israeli children fighting chronic and acute cancer, was recently registered in Canada.

The four-year-old organization, largely sponsored by Dori Segal, president of Gazit, an Israeli real estate company, helps alleviate children's physical and emotional pain while they are hospitalized and undergoing difficult treatments by sponsoring such activities as trips to theme parks in Orlando, Fla., and various programs throughout Israel.

Moshe Ronen, president of the Canadian chapter, says its goal, first and foremost, is to show children and their families that they are not alone.

"We want the children to know that they are still children. When faced with a life and death situation they mature quickly; all of a sudden they lose their childhood. We give it back to them.

"We try to give them a pause from their daily routine and help them get their minds off their treatment at least for the moment," he says.

Ishay Grushka, one of the Canadian directors, says when the group of 35 or 40 children – among them are Jews, Palestinians, Christians and Druze – get together for the annual Orlando trip, the children "see that they are not fighting a private challenge. They can relate to each other."

The children are accompanied by medical personnel who bring any necessary equipment, and in case of emergency, hospitals in the area are notified that the group is coming.

"They are very brave. Some have their surgery dates changed so they can participate in the trip. Everyone works together to allow those who can, to take part," says Ronen.

"A lot of the kids are depressed, and by offering them this trip, we give them an incentive to keep up their spirits. Getting strong so they can go to Florida is a challenge they readily accept."

When choosing children for the trip, Grushka says, they look for those who can handle it physically, and then they seek those whose families could never afford such a trip.

On the organization's first trip to Florida, the children visited Disneyworld, Seaquarium and the Kennedy Space Centre.

After the trip, they met with then-mayor Rudolf Giuliani in New York, who spoke to them about his battle with cancer, says Grushka.

Among its other projects, Ronen says Larger Than Life is planning to build a retreat in Eilat for children and their parents. "Some kids cannot travel to Florida, but we still want them to escape their day-to-day routine."

They also sponsor activities such as holiday parties, tutoring for those who have fallen behind in their schoolwork, an annual children's summer camp, emotional support groups, a football game saluting children with cancer in Israel and a range of social programs.

"We try anything that will give them a break from their everyday life," Ronen says.

He says he plans to bring a group of children to Toronto and New York this summer. While here, the group will visit such places as the Ontario Science Centre, Niagara Falls, Paramount Canada's Wonderland and the CN Tower.

"I also want them to be embraced by our Jewish community.

"We want to bring a smile to these kids; it's an important part of their treatment. If we can contribute, we've done a lot," says Ronen.

In addition to the stress of living in Israel, he says, they are facing the stress of illness. "Our organization is all about raising their hopes and letting them dream. It gives them a sense of self worth, and the desire to fight for the next day," he says.

Our rewards, says Grushka, "is the smile on a kid's face."

The organization is not funded by any government source, says Ronen, so they are planning a fundraiser in May to raise money for the children's Canadian trip.

They also seek volunteers to help out when the group arrives. For information, call Grushka at 416-605-9182.

Student group steps up Israel advocacy effort

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The leaders of the McMaster Jewish Students Association see advocacy for Israel as a primary focus, but they say the group won't lose sight of its mandate to create a comfortable environment for Jewish students.

Maintaining a balance between promoting Israel and meeting the everyday needs of students, many of whom are away from home for the first time, is the key to being a successful Jewish students association, JSA director Judy Shwartz, president Carly Shiner and vice-president Brandon deSilva agreed in a recent joint interview.

As anti-Israel propaganda becomes more prominent on university campuses, Jewish students associations must be vocal in their defence of Israel while simultaneously promoting Jewish pride within their membership, Schwartz said.

"Since the intifadah started 2½ years ago, we, along with all JSAs, have become actively involved in advocacy for Israel, because… there was great apathy among Jewish students," Schwartz said.

Many Jewish students took Israel for granted, so it was imperative that Jewish student associations educate their members, she said.

"The [2000 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa] and [its] vehement anti-Semitism became the key for all of us to examine anti-Semitism on campus, in the community and in the world, because it is becoming a major and serious threat."

She said that although the McMaster JSA is not a political entity, "we certainly do our best to promote education on the state of Israel. We teach our students how to respond to negativity… we try to promote Jewish pride."

Schwartz, who has been director of McMaster JSA for five years, said anti-Semitism on campus has become an issue in the wake of the intifadah and 9/11.

"We've had two hate letters sent to our office this year. We've had to bring in the [police] hate crimes unit. We had a beautiful sign on our door. It was desecrated with vile words. The door had to be painted. They [the university] gave us another sign, a wood one. It was stolen. Then they gave us another one, and it was stolen. Now we just have a piece of paper on the door."

Regardless of anti-Semitism, she said, McMaster JSA has flourished this year and membership has increased from 150 to 200 members.

The JSA gives students a sense of who they are in an inclusive atmosphere, Schwartz said. "This is a vibrant office."

Carly Shiner, president of McMaster JSA, said the association strives for a non-confrontational relationship with McMaster's Muslim Students Association (MSA).

Emphasizing the importance of "constructive politics," Shiner said dialogue encourages mutual understanding, which results in peaceful coexistence between the two groups.

This year, the JSA had a poster campaign promoting harmony between them, which received positive feedback from both Muslim and Jewish students. The JSA and the MSA have discussed doing a poster campaign together.

"We want to find a common message and promote it to the rest of the school. We are trying to rise above the other clubs on this campus that are trying to incite the fight," Shiner said. "Tensions at this school are at a boil when it comes to the Middle East."

Anti-Semitism on campus has escalated because of misconceptions, she said.

"There is a general trend to leftist, socialist groups in the anti-war movement. Israel is seen as an American regime in the Middle East. A lot of people think that Jews are pro-war."

The JSA must provide a welcoming environment for all Jewish students, whether or not they share the same opinion about Israel, she said.

"We need to be inclusive. If we come off as being too right-wing, some students will leave the JSA."

Shiner said the JSA has worked hard to educate students to be passionate about Israel.

"Students have shown more of an interest in being educated, more of an interest in standing up for Israel.

"They aren't as afraid. There was a fear for awhile when the intifadah first started. We can see that the fear has fallen away as we've been educating our students. When it comes to the political aspect of this organization, we have brought speakers with political messages to the school. We have taken a stance in defending Israel, we have taken a stance in showing pride for Israel and showing that Israel has every right to exist.

"We are trying to keep Israel in a positive light on this campus."

DeSilva emphasized the importance of providing a nurturing environment for Jewish students, regardless of the political climate.

"No matter how much we do for Israel, we can't forget the cultural, social and educational programs… We've overcome a lot of hurdles this year, more than we've ever had to deal with… We get students involved, one by one. We are approachable."

With the increase in McMaster's student population next September due to the double cohort of graduating high school students in Ontario, there will be a greater need for the JSA to.provide a sense of community, deSilva said.

He said he is writing a booklet that will provide information to students of various religions on what is available to them both at the university and in the wider community.

In addition to educational, religious and social programming, the McMaster JSA provides High Holy Day synagogue seats to out-of-town students, monthly Shabbat dinners, a weekly kosher lunch and opportunities to volunteer in the community.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have a 15-year-old son who was slightly overweight as a child. He has now lost 35 pounds and says he would like to lose more. I think he looks neat, but I am concerned that his dieting tools may be a little drastic. Can teenage boys develop eating disorders?

A. Yes, and because most people don't think they can, the disorders often go unnoticed and untreated until the boys are quite ill. If you have any concerns, please make you son's doctor aware of them.

Q. My four-year-old does not eat well. Can I give her a kids' multi-vitamin daily?

A. Yes you can, but make sure that you don't use it as a crutch and not work diligently on improving her eating habits. Many people think that as long as you take a vitamin you are covered, and that's not so. The supplement will provide many essential vitamins and minerals, but a varied diet will provide many more.

Q. I have an elderly mother who lives on her own and has a very small appetite, as well as little energy or desire to prepare meals. I often cook for her and bring food over, but she doesn't even go to the trouble of re-heating it. Do you have some suggestions for easy, healthy foods that are soft?

A. I would stock her house with some of the following foods: cream of wheat cereal that requires only the addition of boiled water and is very high in iron, individual portions of canned fruit, bananas, yogurt, cottage cheese, sliced cheese, hard boiled eggs, rice pudding and party sandwiches (if possible).

Cold chicken or turkey is also great if she will eat them cold. Focus on small portions that are easy to chew, easy to serve and appealing to her.

Q. Everyone in my house just got over the stomach flu. I am never sure what fluids to give – water, apple juice or ginger ale?

A. Actually the best choice for first fluids is an oral electrolyte solution like sports drinks or pedialyte or gastrolyte. They contain the electrolytes lost from frequent vomiting or diarrhea and are much easier to digest, than water, juice or ginger ale. Most importantly, introduce the liquid in very small amounts and then increase as they are tolerated.

Suspected chemical weapons factory found

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. troops on Sunday found what they believe to be a chemical weapons factory near the Iraqi city of Najaf, about 160 km (100 miles) south of Baghdad. NBC news also reported that American forces had seized a second plant.

U.S. forces were reportedly checking other sites, as a result of leads from captured Iraqis and information found in documents.

According to the reports that first appeared on the Fox News Network and in the Jerusalem Post, coalition military leaders were keenly interested in a site they took control of in Najaf and were interviewing two captured Iraqi generals Sunday for information about Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's suspected biological and chemical weapons.

It was not immediately clear what chemicals were being produced, but both reports said the Iraqis tried to camouflage the facility found by the troops, so that it would look like the surrounding desert and would not be spotted from the air.

U.S. Central Command, which oversees the war in Iraq, said in a statement that troops were examining several "sites of interest," but also said it was premature to call the Najaf site a chemical weapons factory.

U.S. Lt.-Gen. John Abizaid, talking to reporters at Central Command headquarters in Qatar, refused to confirm the reports about the Najaf discovery. "I will not confirm that report," he said in response to a question. "We have an Iraqi general officer, two Iraqi general officers that we have taken prisoner, and they are providing us with information."

American special operations forces found documents in western Iraq that also could lead to chemical or biological weapons facilities, said Gen. Richard Myers, chair of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Myers said U.S. commandos found the papers along with a cache of millions of rounds of ammunition after a firefight Saturday, and the discovery "might save thousands of lives if we can find out exactly where and what they have.

"I just know they have some papers that they want to exploit as quickly as possible, and we're going to do that, of course," Myers said.

United Nations inspectors visited a cement plant in the Najaf area earlier this year to check on its explosives cache but did not report finding anything improper. A team of biological weapons inspectors also visited a university and school in Kufa, a few kilometres north of Najaf.

If the plant is confirmed as a chemical weapons factory, it would be the first find by the U.S.-led invasion force validating U.S. allegations that Iraq still has weapons of mass destruction.

About 30 Iraqi troops, including their commanding general, surrendered to U.S. forces as they overtook the installation, apparently used to produce chemical weapons, the Jerusalem Post reported. One soldier was lightly wounded when a booby trap exploded as he was clearing the sheetmetal-lined facility, the report said.

The 100-acre (40 hectare) complex is adjacent to military barracks and surrounded by an electric fence, the report said.

ABC News cited one unidentified official as saying of the captured Iraqi general: "He is a potential gold mine of evidence about the weapons Saddam Hussein said he does not have."

IDF not expected to lower Scud alert yet

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces was not expected to lower the level of alert this week, despite reports of the progress made by American forces in western Iraq, from which Scud missiles aimed at Israel would be launched.

As a result, the public was being instructed to continue to carry gas masks with them at all times, while the Arrow and Patriot anti-missile batteries and emergency crews called up by the Home Front Command remained on high alert.

However, the Israeli Air Force on Sunday reduced the frequency of its round-the-clock aerial patrols, as the damage the Iraqi air force has sustained from the U.S. assault has reduced the threat of an airborne attack on Israel.

A senior defence source said the Americans are making "very substantial" efforts in western Iraq to locate Iraqi missiles or launchers that could be used against Israel. But, he added, even if the Americans were to step up special forces activity in the region, they would not necessarily achieve total control over western Iraq, which would be needed for Israel to cancel its alert.

And the significant reduction in the Iraqi air force's capabilities is also not yet enough to eliminate its threat to Israel, he said.

Sources in both the General Staff and the Home Front Command added that because there is no change in the assessment regarding the possibility of an Iraqi attack, they are concerned by the public's apathy, which has resulted in widespread disregard of the Home Front's instructions on matters such as carrying gas masks and preparing sealed rooms. The sources urged the public to start obeying these instructions.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, speaking at a cabinet session Sunday, said that despite the heavy costs of the alert, it was the right decision in light of the potential threat.

Responding to an Iraqi television broadcast displaying what it claimed was an Israeli missile, bearing the inscription "IMI Jerusalem," that had been fired from an American plane – with "IMI" standing for Israel Military Industries – Mofaz said IMI has supplied the Americans with decoy missiles used to confuse anti-aircraft guns.

Israeli defence sources said Iraqi spokespeople had been mentioning Israel more frequently on the weekend and said they hoped this was not part of an effort to legitimize a planned attack.

'Jewish' to be erased from UK dog tags

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The British Army has allowed its Jewish soldiers involved in the war in Iraq to erase mention of their religion on their dog-tags, fearing they would be executed if taken captive.

There are about 15 Jewish soldiers among the 45,000 British fighters currently in action in the U.S.-led campaign. The British defence ministry made the move after Jewish community leaders in Britain expressed concerns.

The ministry added that kosher rations had been provided to Jewish soldiers who requested them.

During the 1991 Gulf War, the Iraqis would beat and parade prisoners in front of television cameras, and the British military fears Jewish prisoners would come in for a worse fate.

British dog-tags list a soldier's name, rank, identity number and religion, with the latter intended to facilitate proper burial in the event the body of a soldier can't be brought home.

Last Friday, Britain's chief rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, published a special prayer for the safety of the soldiers in Iraq. The prayer was to be recited in all synagogues on Shabbat.

CONFLATING TWO CAUSES:

The anti-war protesters often join an anti-Israel bias with their opposition to the war in Iraq. These young protesters over the weekend in London follow that pattern.

'Road map' to wait until after Iraq war

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States has reached a secret understanding with Palestinian prime minister-designate Mahmoud Abbas, better known as Abu Mazen, to put off the formal presentation of the U.S-sponsored "road map" for peace until after the new Palestinian cabinet is sworn in and possibly until after the war in Iraq.

Last week, Washington issued vague and contradictory statements about the timing and presentation of the road map, which outlines steps to end the Israeli-Palestinian dispute.

U.S. President George W. Bush announced two weeks ago that the United States expects a "contribution to this document" from Israel and the Palestinians "which would promote real peace. We will encourage them to discuss the road map with each other."

Washington sources assume that Abu Mazen wants to replace Palestinian Interior Minister Hani Al-Hassan and Justice Minister Ahmed Durmah, both supporters of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Abu Mazen is expected to keep Nabil Sha'ath, Yasser Abed Rabbo and Saeb Erekat of the old regime in the new cabinet. The United States believes that the important portfolios are interior, which controls the security branches, and the treasury. Salem Fayyad is expected to remain finance minister.

The Americans also expect the cabinet to include Jibril Rajoub and Mohammed Dahlan, the former heads of preventive security in the West Bank and Gaza, respectively.

A senior Jerusalem source said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon reached an agreement with the White House allowing Israel to present its comments and reservations about the road map. The Americans expect Israel's reservations to be "constructive" and conducive to the plan's implementation.

The source said Israel accepts this position. "We will insist on the essential issues," he said.

Government cancels funding of Israeli-Diaspora programs

By LILY GALILI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As part of its new economic plan, the Israeli government has decided to cancel its share of funding for two programs that bring young Diaspora Jews to Israel.

Surveys suggest the decision to cancel funding for Birthright and Sela, which aim to strengthen the connection between Diaspora Jews to Israel, could deal a mortal blow to Israel's ties with the younger generation of world Jewry. While polls show this generation is moving away from both Israel and Judaism, they also show that those who visit Israel tend to develop a stronger connection with both.

Some 40,000 Jewish students, aged 18 to 24, most of them from the United States, have made their first trip to Israel since Birthright was established in 1999. Many of the participants on Birthright, which provides young Jews with a free trip here, have since returned to Israel at their own expense.

A Brandeis University study found that seven to 10 per cent of the 12,000 students who came in 2002 have already made a second trip. Others have become more involved in Jewish activities in their own communities. There have even been a few dozen marriages among people who met on the program.

In the two years since the outbreak of Palestinian violence, Birthright has been the largest source of Jewish tourism to Israel. In the last three months alone, 8,200 people have visited Israel under its auspices.

Meanwhile, Sela has brought 6,200 Jewish students to Israel, most of them from the former Soviet Union. Run by the Jewish Agency, Sela brings students to Israel without their families, in the hopes that the families will follow. Most of the students have gone on to university in Israel; some do army service first. Today, some 2,000 of them serve in the Israel Defence Forces and another 400 are waiting to be drafted.

The end of state funding for Sela will greatly reduce the number of young immigrants, making Israel a magnet primarily for the elderly, said Jewish Agency Chair Sallai Meridor.

"Not only is it immoral to abandon them in this fashion, it's crazy from the state's perspective," a furious Meridor said. "These are people who have children here, who find jobs in high-tech and academia. They are the country's future. Without them, we are left with only the elderly immigrants."

People connected with Birthright do not understand either the Zionist or economic rationale for cancelling funding for the program, which is a joint venture between Israel and the international Jewish community. The government and international Jewish organizations each pledged to provide $70 million (US) to the program over a five-year period, while the remaining third of the funding comes from individual donors.

Shimon Fogel, the CIC's national director, said Graham displayed "quite a sensitivity" to the "triple threat" Israel faces: Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, Palestinian terrorism emanating from the West Bank and Gaza, and Iraq and Iran in the east.

Wilder described Iran – an Islamic fundamentalist state that severed relations with Israel after the 1979 Islamist revolution – as " a tremendous problem" and Israel's "greatest" enemy.

Calling Iran a "rogue state" that should be called to account and whose power should be curtailed, Wilder said Tehran is getting closer to developing and acquiring a nuclear arsenal.

The CIC told Graham that Iran organized and carried out the bombings of the Israeli embassy and the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in the 1990s.

"Iran, at the highest level of government, was responsible for the bombings," Wilder charged, saying Iranian leaders are complicit in the atrocities that destroyed two separate buildings and killed more than 100 people.

Wilder, however, acknowledged that Iran will not be as easy to isolate as Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority.

Nevertheless, he said, Canada should send an unmistakable signal to Iran by cutting off all trade except for essential goods such as pharmaceuticals.

In a litany of accusations, Wilder said that Iran aids and abets Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and was deeply involved in last year's Karine-A affair.

The Karine-A, a ship loaded with 50 tons of Iranian arms designated for the Palestinian Authority, was seized by Israeli commandos in the Red Sea in January 2002.

The CIC did not compare Iran to Iraq, Wilder said. "There was no need to."

He said Iraq did not figure in the discussions. "The war is progressing and we know Canada's position. We left it at that."

Several months ago, though, the CIC urged Canada to align itself with the United States' position on Iraq.

Wilder said the CIC expressed concern about Israel's isolation on the world stage and tried to "sensitize" Graham to Israel's current plight.

"Israel is a country under terrible siege, isolated and alone," Wilder said. "Israel is surrounded by a sea of hostile nations and needs support from friendly countries like Canada."

Characterizing Graham as "a friend of Israel," Wilder said he wants to be helpful and strengthen Canada's relationship with Israel.

"He understands the issues very well. We don't start with first principles with him."

Graham assured the CIC that Canada will not support any moves to demonize Israel at the United Nations and its related agencies, Wilder said, adding Graham also let it be known that Canada was open to deepening cultural and medical exchanges with Israel.

Fogel said Graham was accompanied by two aides, Amanda Sussman and Don Sinclair.

Participating in the meeting, in addition to Fogel and Wilder, were Keith Landy, the president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and David Cooper, the CIC's associate director of government relations.

Fogel said the CIC is in regular touch with the Department of Foreign Affairs.

"We meet routinely with Graham, and this seemed like a good time for another meeting."

"We asked for a quick meeting and got one," added Wilder. "We have regular communications to advance the interests of our community."

Muslim leader helps build synagogue in Azerbaijan

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BAKU — Contrary to the actions of a colleague in neighbouring Iran, who ordered the destruction of the Jewish community centre in Argentina in 1994, the Muslim spiritual leader of the Caucasus, Allahshukur Pashazadeh, recently donated $500 (US) from the local Muslim community to help construct a new synagogue in Baku, the capital of Azerbaijan.

Despite occurring a decade apart, these two acts illustrate the different approaches of the two Shi'ite leaders toward the Jewish community.

Pashazadeh, who chairs the Caucasian Muslims' Board (CMB), was guest of honour at the synagogue dedication ceremony two weeks ago. Berl Lazar, the chief rabbi of Russia, was also present. The building, which is faced with stone and built in the style of Jerusalem architecture, has two sanctuaries – one for the Ashkenazi and one for the Georgian members of the community. The three-story synagogue is quite magnificent, and in addition to its two sanctuaries, it includes a kosher cafeteria and several classrooms.

Construction of the synagogue cost $280,000 (US), a sum that was not easy to raise in a country where the average monthly salary in Baku is $50 (US), and much less in other cities. The Jewish community had hoped to dedicate the synagogue last Rosh Hashanah, but it was still $100,000 (US) short. That's when help arrived from an unexpected source: Pashazadeh offered his assistance.

"The [Jewish] community's leader, Gennady Zelmanovich, told the sheikh [Pashazadeh] that he would be very grateful for any donation, even $100, but Pashazadeh replied that it would be an insult for him to give such a small sum," says Eitan Naeh, Israel's ambassador to Azerbaijan.

The sheikh's words became the talk of the Jewish community, raising expectations beyond the sum he actually gave. Fortunately, however, millionaire Lev Leviev made up the shortfall.

> The sheikh's words became the talk of the Jewish community

Azerbaijan's strategic location between Russia and Iran has recently made it an attractive destination for smugglers, arms dealers and espionage organizations. Large international oil companies also operate in Azerbaijan, investing billions of dollars in rehabilitating the oil infrastructure that was neglected during the post-Communist era.

Since gaining independence in 1992, Azerbaijan has been ruled by Heydar Aliev, a former Soviet Politburo member and old opponent of former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. Aliev closely guards the secular nature of the state, and for now, he is managing to keep the religious influences from Azerbaijan's southern neighbour in check.

"From the perspective of inter-religious relationships, what is considered exceptional in the rest of the world is normal in Azerbaijan, and the opposite," says Naeh. "This country has a pluralistic tradition going back thousands of years."

Azerbaijan has a population of about eight million, 75 per cent of whom are Shi'ite Muslims, with the other 25 per cent comprised of Sunni Muslims, Eastern Orthodox Christians and Jews.

Since the beginning of the wave of immigration to Israel from the former Soviet Union in the early 1990s, some 45,000 Jews have arrived from Azerbaijan, leaving about 20,000 there. A few hundred of these are Georgian, some 4,000 are Ashkenazi and the rest are Jews who arrived in the Caucasus 1,700-2,500 years ago.

The first Ashkenazis arrived in Baku at the end of the 19th century with the discovery of oil, which turned the city into one of the Soviet Union's most prosperous. During the Communist era, many more Jews – mainly professionals who feared persecution in Russia – immigrated there. The land on which the city's original synagogue was built was donated to the community by the Baku municipality at the beginning of the 20th century.

The reason for the donation was that Baku lay beyond the borders of the Pale of Settlement, the area of Czarist Russia where Jews were allowed to live, and the Jews were afraid they would be exiled if they bought the land themselves.

Last November, Pashazadeh received an unusual visitor, MK Amnon Cohen, who at the time headed the Knesset State Control Committee.

"We had a very pleasant conversation in Tajiki," says Cohen. "I immigrated to Israel from Samarkand, Bukhara, when I was 12, and the sheikh spent seven years in Bukhara, so we shared our experiences there. The sheikh told me that personally, he is very fond of Israel, so I suggested that we arrange a meeting between him and Rabbi Ovadia Yosef in order to promote peace between our religions. Pashazadeh replied that the time is not yet ripe for that. I felt that he was a bit afraid that other Muslims might make problems for him."

French Jews beaten in Paris

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Two French Jews are recovering after anti-war protesters attacked them here over the weekend.

Yoni Odonnat, 17, was watching the anti-Iraq war demonstration Saturday from outside the headquarters of the Zionist youth group Hashomer Hatzair when a group of around 30 protesters from the Action Committee for Peace and Justice in the Middle East (CAPJPO) attacked him.

Odonnat was pushed up against a wall, beaten around the body and then pushed to the ground by demonstrators described by onlookers "as Arabs wearing keffiyahs."

Together with two other Hashomer Hatzair members, Odonnat was chased by a crowd shouting anti-Semitic obscenities before taking refuge inside the building.

He was taken to Paris' Hotel Dieu hospital, where he was treated for eye injuries.

Not far from the attack, Noam Levy, 24, was hit on the head with an iron bar as he gave an interview to a television camera crew. Levy was taken to the hospital and then released.

According to the television crew, those involved in the attack were all from CAPJPO.

Hashomer Hatzair spokesperson Yoni Smadjar said CAPJPO regularly holds activities on Saturday afternoons and there had been around 150 children inside the building at the time of the attacks.

Smadjar said the group would be filing an official complaint against the demonstration organizers who, he pointed out, included a number of left-wing, anti-globalization and pro-Palestinian associations.

"They saw Yoni's kippah and attacked him," Smadjar said. "There were around 30 of them and they were shouting 'Death to the Jews.'"

Edith Lenszcner, a spokesperson for the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jews, condemned the attack, saying CRIF "held no position on the Iraq war" and that it is unacceptable for Jewish organizations to be targeted during an anti-war demonstration.

Jewish Agency Chairman Sallai Meridor strongly condemned the incident and called on the French government to take responsibility for the security of its Jewish citizens and prevent violence against Jews or anti-Semitic acts under the guise of pacifist protest.

CAPJCO, however, denied its activists were involved in the attack. Its president, Olivia Zemor, said her members had "once again, been attacked by Jewish extremists from Betar.

"We are going to be speaking to the police and asking for protection." Asked to specify the number of injured from her own organization, Zemor said she did not know the "exact figure" before admitting that there had been no CAPJPO injuries.

Academy Award winning film tells story of German Jews in Africa

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Caroline Link's stolid two-hour feature film, Nowhere in Africa, is the saga of an assimilated, upper middle-class Jewish family from Nazi Germany trying to adapt to a new home in the British colony of Kenya.

The Academy Award winner for best foreign movie, Nowhere in Africa was adapted from Stefanie Zweig's autobiographical novel. Scheduled to open in local theatres on March 28, the film shifts seamlessly between Germany and Kenya as the vise tightens around Germany's persecuted and beleaguered Jewish community.

The narrator, Regina Redlich (Karoline Eckertz), is the teenage daughter of a couple who have seen the handwriting on the wall and drawn, however painfully, the appropriate conclusions.

The move brings lawyer Walter Redlich (Merab Ninidze) to a remote corner of Kenya to eke out a living as a farm manager. Regina and Jettel (Juliane Kohler), his elegant, spoiled wife, join him there in 1938.

In swift brushstrokes, Link paints a picture of a harsh, beautiful land of savannah, rolling hills, primitive native villages, extraordinary wildlife and incredible sunsets.

Tossed into this exotic, demanding milieu is a family European to its fingertips.

Of the three, Jettel adjusts with the most difficulty. "We can't live here!" she exclaims, refusing to unpack after arriving on the homestead.

An impractical woman who brings her china rather than her fridge, Jettel feels "dead" in Africa.

By contrast, Regina thrives here. Unlike her snobbish mother, she is curious about her new surroundings, eager to learn Swahili and has no compunction about befriending the locals.

Juliane Kohler and Merab Ninidze.

The plot thickens when, with the outbreak of World War II, Walter is interned as an enemy alien and Jettel and Regina are dispatched to a hotel in Nairobi, the Kenyan capital.

Link throws in further dramatic devices as Jettel has a fling with a British army officer, Walter is released from detention and then signs up as a soldier, Jettel learns of her mother's and sister's plight in Europe and Regina runs into a patch of subtle anti-Semitism in her private school.

Amid these trials and dislocations, the Redlichs' marriage deteriorates, but bounces back into shape after Kristallnacht. With no hope of returning to Germany, a chastened Jettel accepts her fate as an exile and displaced person with philosophical resignation.

Thanks to Link's firm direction, these pivotal scenes unfold with graceful fluidity.

But strangely enough, they do not really move us. The film is absorbing, yet emotionally static.

The performances, however, are uniformly commendable. Link has assembled a stellar cast led by Kohler and Eckertz.

Nowhere in Africa, which is in German, Swahili and English, unfolds to the rhythmatic beat of African drums, a mood-enhancing device that heightens tension and helps engage a viewer.

Ultimately, the film is bittersweet. The Redlichs, particularly Regina, finally adapt to Kenya, and feel good about it. But by war's end, they must cope with their personal Holocaust tragedies.

But for the Redlichs, Germany is not a completely lost cause.

After the war, Walter is offered an important judicial position in Germany, and he and Jettel, who is now quite settled and happy in Kenya, must decide what their next move will be.

Should they foresake Kenya? Or should they give Germany a second chance?

Link portrays their dilemma with intelligence and humanity, the hallmarks of Nowhere in Africa.

Grey Zone poses a moral dilemma

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Based on actual events, The Grey Zone is one of the most authentic and powerful Holocaust films ever produced.

It tells the story of Auschwitz's Twelfth Sonderkommando, a special squad of Jewish prisoners who were forced to assist the Nazis in their extermination of fellow Jews.

In return, the members of the Sonderkommando received better living conditions, more and better food and got the opportunity to live a few months longer, although everyone knew that in a short time they too would be placed in the gas chambers and the Nazis would recruit a fresh squad of Sonderkommandos.

But the Twelfth Sonderkommando was planning a revolt and was going to try to blow up the crematorium. Suddenly, their plans were placed in danger when they found a teenage girl who somehow survived the gas chamber. Do they hide her and try to save her life, thus threatening to disrupt their plans or do they put her in with the next group that will enter the gas chambers?

The Grey Zone is filled with moral dilemmas such as this and with the overall question of how far do you go in order to live a little longer and under better conditions.

Mira Sorvino

When actor/writer/director Tim Blake Nelson wrote the play, upon which the film is based, he placed the emphasis on the moral questions confronting the members of the Sonderkommando. He kept the same focus when he adapted the screenplay and directed the film.

The result is a moral roller-coaster ride for the audience that forces them to confront these and other questions in a very personal manner.

The film does not use cheap Hollywood tricks to stir up the emotions, but allows the facts to speak for themselves.

Blake also decided to choose an ensemble cast without any big name stars. The entire cast, headlined by David Arquette, Steve Buscemi, Harvey Keitel, Natasha Lyonne and Mira Sorvino, give uniformly excellent performances.

They are allowed to lose themselves in the role and to take on the characteristics of the people they are playing.

The DVD version has few extras. Nelson decided that a commentary track would distract from the seriousness of the subject matter, so none was added.

In addition, there are no behind the scenes featurettes. The DVD does have some deleted scenes and Nelson did provide a commentary for these, explaining why each of the scenes was cut from the film.

Overall, watching this film is a wrenching experience, but one that should be undertaken by everyone interested in learning about a little known aspect of the Holocaust.

The Grey Zone is distributed by Lions Gate Home Entertainment and should be available at most video stores throughout Canada and the United States.

Former SNL writer returns home to make movie

Jamie Cohen directs film about gambling addiction

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

Imagine you're a 23-year-old hopeful from Toronto entering the writer's room on the set of Saturday Night Live to find comedians Chris Rock, Adam Sandler and a rambunctious Chris Farley staring you down. You're there after months of phone calls to the show's Canadian creator, Lorne Michaels, who, it becomes clear when he enters the room, has forgotten he invited you. What do you do?

If you're Forest Hill filmmaker Jamie Cohen, you act like you belong and follow "Mr. Michaels" (also a Forest Hill native) to his office to talk about books and Toronto's Jewish community, until after 15 minutes, he offers you a production job on his legendary program. For Cohen, a graduate of York Mills Collegiate and the University of Western Ontario (in English), it's pretty unbelievable: a mere two months before, he sat depressed in his parent's basement because he couldn't find anything other than part-time work producing documentaries for SportsNet.

"I really wanted to try my luck in New York," Cohen says now in an interview while working on his latest project in downtown Toronto. "So I thought, who are the two most successful Canadian filmmakers? Norman Jewison and Lorne Michaels. I basically went through the phone book and called them."

Cohen recalls Michaels' words to him the day they met. "He said, 'I understand what it's like to want to strive for greater horizons and I do relate to where you are now in your life,'" Cohen says. "It didn't hurt that we were from the same community and he saw in me the roots of his own beginnings."

Three years later, after producing mock commercials for SNL, working on a variety of projects under the banner of Michaels' production company, Broadway Video, and meeting every celebrity he admired, Cohen returned to Toronto to direct a film he wrote about the destructive effects of gambling addiction.

Which brings us to the tiny Legion- Hall-turned-casino in Toronto's Queen and Broadview neighbourhood on a January evening for the filming of a gambling scene in Chances, where everything, down to the trail-mix in the kitchen, has been donated.

With $18,000 of his own money and $1 million in free equipment and staff, Cohen presides over the set like an expectant father in a deep state of introspection, yet immovable in his vision.

He describes the film as "a 90-minute, dramatic psychological thriller about Jay Chance, a brilliant law student and charismatic children's clown who commits immoral acts to finance his sports gambling addiction."

Jay's immoral acts include gambling away his girlfriend's tuition money, asking his football-playing best friend to throw a game and destroying his own promising law career, Cohen says.

The film is based on more than 100 interviews Cohen conducted with compulsive gamblers. One of those was his own father, Howard, who also plays the lead character's father in the movie.

Though not entirely autobiographical, the film draws heavily on Cohen's experiences as he watched his father fall prey to a sports gambling compulsion that destroyed his law career and nearly tore apart his family. For Cohen, who was 20 at the time, discovering his father's secret came as a huge shock.

"Unlike alcohol or drugs, gambling addiction is something you can't see," he says.

Once he got over his anger and confusion, Cohen began asking questions and discovered that gambling addictions can happen to anyone.

"In many ways, we were the 'Cleavers' of the Jewish community," he says. "We lived in a nice home, we took vacations and we went to good schools. But no matter how good your faith, family or education, you're still susceptible to this addiction."

Now an international speaker for Gambler's Anonymous, Howard Cohen has controlled his addiction for 10 years while working hard to educate people, especially within the Jewish community, about the illness. Like his father, Cohen aims to inform.

"This film deals with redemption," Cohen says. "The way I teach others about it is to write a movie, and show in an entertaining way through a believable young character, what gambling addiction is like, without preaching."

Depending on its distributor, Chances will appear in theatres or on television later this year.

Jamie Cohen directs a scene from Chances.

Eitz Chaim graduates revel in doing 'Odd Jobs' on TV

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jonas and Jeremy Diamond, two of the principals behind Odd Job Jack.

The Comedy Network's newest television series, Odd Job Jack, is the brainchild of a Toronto multimedia production company whose principals include brothers Jeremy and Jonas Diamond, graduates of Eitz Chaim Day Schools.

Odd Job Jack, hyped as the world's first "sit.com," premiered on TV and online on March 5 at 10:30 p.m. The Web site address is www.oddjobjack.com.

Starring Don McKellar and featuring the voices of several other Toronto actors, the series is an animated comedy about the misadventures in temporary employment of Jack Ryder, a 25-year-old "fully accredited sociologist."

Anyone who has ever worked, or plans to, will be drawn to Odd Job Jack's mordant humour. In each episode, Ryder copes with a new job, from funeral home nightwatchman to hamster wrangler. These jobs introduce him to an array of fresh characters, enable him to savour new experiences and give him a vastly different perspective on the working world each week.

The series, produced by Smiley Guy Studios, was originally intended to unfold in six parts. But the network and sponsor (Molson Canada) were so impressed by the first six episodes that they ordered an additional seven.

"The scripts are now in development," said Jeremy, a writer, actor and producer in Odd Job Jack.

Jonas, the show's executive director, has set his sights beyond Canada. "We are looking to distribute the show internationally," he said. "We have been fortunate to retain all copyright and distribution rights."

The sardonically funny series was inspired by real events, Jeremy said.

"The story idea – of getting out of school and not really knowing what to do with the rest of your life – was one we could all relate to, and knew others would relate to.

"Trying a new job every week seemed like it had unlimited potential in terms of storytelling, comedy, variety and interactivity."

Influenced by popular programs such as The Simpsons, South Park, Bugs Bunny, Malcolm in the Middle and Monty Python, Odd Job Jack was not a hard sell.

"We had been working on it, in one form or another, since 1998, so it didn't happen overnight," said Jeremy.

"The idea itself was easy to transmit and was always well received. Lots of funding agencies – Telefilm, New Media Fund and the Bell New Media Fund – were on the lookout for original ways of approaching storytelling, and were supportive of the project."

Jeremey said the show aims to target the 18 to 34 age group. "But we like to cast the net wide," he added.

"Our initial intention was to target people who were experiencing employment anxiety, liked cartoons and surfed the Web. People like us."

Born in Toronto, Jeremy and Jonas are the sons of Charles and Rochelle Diamond. Charles is a professional fundraiser and Rochelle administers an adult education course called Kaleidoscope.

Jeremy, 32, graduated from the University of Toronto, with a bachelor's degree in drama and a master's in English.

In 1997, he enrolled in the new media design program at Norman Jewison's Canadian Film Centre in Toronto.

While studying, Jeremy was a nightwatchman on the weekend shift at Benjamin's Funeral Home.

"I worked there for seven years – yikes! – and in the meantime, I got my MA and co-founded Smiley Guy Studios. When Smiley Guy Studios was bringing in almost enough work to support me and my partners – Denny Silverthorne and Adrian Carter – I said goodbye to the graveyard gig."

Jonas, 25, attended Yeshivat Har Etzion in Israel. He later dropped out of the University of Toronto, four courses shy of a degree.

He found work at a computer reseller. "I developed and managed their Y2K program, and helped prepare schools and hospitals across Ontario for the new millennium."

Jonas joined Smiley Guy Studios to help refine the Odd Job Jack concept. "My background was in sales, marketing and proposals, so it seemed a natural fit to work with these three talented, creative guys."

Since then, Jonas has run day-to-day operations and, as he put it, "emptied the garbage."

He elaborated: "Jer was writing, Denny and Adrian were directing, so someone had to do it."

Smiley Guy Studios, a writing, design, animation, sound and music company, specializes in original online shorts, games, greeting cards, promotional e-mails, multimedia projects, movie trailers and music videos.

Clients have included Alliance Atlantis, AOL, Ford, Kellogg, Canwest Global and Seagram.

In co-operation with the National Film Board of Canada, Smiley Guy Studios is poised to begin production of Legends of Me, an interactive show for kids.

But for now, Odd Job Jack is their ticket to solvency.

An Abba Musical: Encore Entertainment presents a concert version of the 1980s musical Chess, composed by members of Abba with lyrics by Tim Rice. Consisting of a diverse range of musical styles including pop, rock and neo-Puccinian elements, Chess is set against the backdrop of the Cold War, and uses the game of chess as a metaphor for the political game-playing of the Soviets and the Americans. Producer Merle Garbe says the story may be dated, but the music is still "vibrant and passionate." Toronto Centre for the Arts (Studio Theatre), 5040 Yonge St. $25. Book News

• London publishing house Weidenfeld and Nicolson recently published an English translation of the German-language book Impossible Love: Ascher Levy's Longing for Germany by Roman Frister. This five-generational family history of the wealthy and prominent Levys of Pomerania was first published two years earlier in Germany.

• Another family history of note is My Father's People: A Family of Southern Jews, by Louis D. Rubin, Jr. Published recently by the Lousiana State University Press, the book tells the story of a clan of Russian immigrants who arrived in the southern United States about a century ago.

At the Galleries

• Transcending, a show of paintings and ceramics by Usher Hammer, is on view at the Sidney and Gertrude Zack Gallery, Greater Vancouver JCC, until April 25.

• Avenue Road Arts School presents its 4th annual Adult Art Show, featuring works by adult students in landscape, portraiture, still life, photography, ceramics and mixed media. 460 Avenue Rd., four buildings south of St. Clair. March 29, 6 to 8 p.m., and March 30, 2 to 4 p.m. 416-961-1502.

• Romanian Mosaic, a photographic exhibition by Adrian Szasz, opens April 5, 5 p.m. Szasz has won many awards and his works have been shown widely from the United States to Israel. Transylvania Restaurant, 2579 Yonge St. Until May 5. 416-932-9915.

• A Web site – www.theartfair.com – was recently launched to help more than 30 Israeli artists and galleries sell their works in these difficult times. "Buyers feel the Israeli flavour and can even negotiate in real time for a price just like they would in a Jerusalem gallery," says organizer Menachem Szus.

Production lets you create your own play

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Television viewers who use their remote controls to surf, watching more than one show at a time, hate the idea of being confined to a theatre seat for a couple of hours without being able to change the channel.

In Tamara, a sexual and political thriller set in 1927 Fascist Italy, the audience is let loose to follow the actors through the halls, bathrooms, bedrooms and ballrooms of Toronto's Graydon Hall Manor.

Tamara is for "people who can't get the channel changer out of their hands," playwright John Krizanc says.

Krizanc and director Richard Rose developed the revolutionary theatrical form of Tamara, which premiered in Toronto in 1981. Since then, the play has been performed around the world, including for a 10-year run in Los Angeles.

The audience creates their own play by choosing one of the play's 10 characters to follow through the house. At intermission, to learn about the storylines and action they missed, people approach complete strangers and ask them, "Who did you follow?"

"Everyone is approachable," Krizanc says. "It's more fun than you usually have in the theatre."

"It's safe to say nobody had done anything like it before," he says. "That was before the notion of narrative trees in video games. There were no plays with nine scenes going on at one time."

In Tamara, the beautiful Polish Art Deco artist Tamara de Lempicka, played by Tamara Hickey, visits Italy's poet laureate and legendary Casanova Gabriele D'Annunzio, played by John Gilbert, to paint his portrait.

D'Annunzio is under house arrest at his luxurious palazzo, a hotbed of political intrigue, deception, desire and murderous intent. The story is based loosely on a diary kept by D'Annunzio's real-life housekeeper, Alis Mazoyer, who is played by Maria Ricossa.

Krizanc and Rose set out to create characters who represent different points of view; the action is seen from the perspective of an aristocrat, a servant, an atheist, a devout believer, a lesbian, a Jew and a Catholic.

D'Annunzio's valet, Dante, played by Roger McKeen, is a Zionist who has a child with the Catholic maid Emilia Pavese, played by Ellen Dubin. Dante wants to marry Emilia and take her to Palestine, but she refuses to convert.

The dancer Carlotta, played by Amy Walsh, is in love with the butler Aldo Finzi, played by Victor Ertmanis, until she discovers that he's Jewish.

Finzi, in real life, worked his way up in the Fascist party and by 1926, was the undersecretary to Mussolini's minister of the interior. During the early Fascist years in Italy, many Jewish nationalists joined the Fascist ranks because they saw Mussolini as the saviour of Italy, and until 1935, signs of Italian anti-Semitism were negligible. In 1927, Finzi was sent to live with D'Annunzio as his butler to keep an eye on him for Mussolini.

Moses Znaimer, founder of Citytv, was captivated by Tamara in 1981 and has backed its live productions ever since, including the Los Angeles show. Znaimer says he saw parallels between Tamara's form and the concepts he was applying to television.

"I never thought of Tamara as theatre," Znaimer says. "What appealed to me was that it was almost an entirely new form."

Once people get used to this new form, he says, they won't want to go back to being seated in front of a proscenium stage.

Tamara previews at Graydon Hall Manor from April 1, opens April 3 and runs to April 13. Presented by Znaimer and Citytv, Tamara is co-produced with Harbourfront Centre as part of the du Maurier World Stage festival. For tickets, call the Harbourfront Centre box office at 416-973-4000.

Zareinu helps developmentally delayed kids get an education

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Some 14 years ago, Zareinu Educational Centre opened its doors. Its purpose then, as now, was to provide special education and therapies to children with a wide spectrum of physical and developmental challenges.

But it had an underlying ethos: that all Jewish children, including those with special needs, have the right to a Jewish education in a Jewish environment.

Besides having access to speech, language, music, art and physical therapies, and whatever other special education they need, Zareinu students are also exposed to davening, Jewish holidays, Hebrew, customs and laws, insofar as each can absorb them.

Zareinu accepts students from birth to age 13, and principal Carol Goldman told The CJN in a recent interview that the school's board of directors is involved in strategic planning to add a secondary school level.

"We are not sure when that will be," she said.

When a child has been diagnosed with a particular disability, or there is a concern that something is wrong ("sometimes the diagnosis may not be there yet," Goldman explained), the parents and child meet with Goldman, a therapist and a social worker to determine the child's needs.

"Because space is limited, it is not always possible to take a child in right away," Goldman said.

But while the child is on the waiting list, the school will help the family access appropriate agencies, or help them apply for whatever special funding is available. "We help them explore all their options," she said.

When the child actually enrols in the school, an individual service plan is developed that takes into account his or her cognitive, academic, clinical and therapeutic needs. This plan is fully shared with the parents.

Zareinu staff will also go into the home to further assess a child's needs, as well as those of the family, who often need assistance coming to terms with the fact their child has special needs.

Not all students attend full time.

The infant intervention program, for instance, runs two mornings a week. Children as young as six weeks old take part in a multi-sensory program encompassing all areas of development. It also offers parents the chance to interact with other families facing similar challenges.

Some children divide their time between Zareinu and other schools, particularly the public school system. Zareinu will go into these schools to offer support, guidance and special therapies, including occupational therapy and speech pathology.

Goldman said Zareinu believes it has a responsibility to its students, even when they leave the school. "We nurtured the value of Jewish life and tradition – we consider we have the obligation to continue helping them remain part of this environment."

Some girls who have left Zareinu are now at Beth Jacob High School. While they take classes mostly on their own, they join the rest of the school for whatever activities they can.

If attempts to integrate the students into day or public schools are not successful, Goldman said, "the door is always open for them to return [provided they are not too old]."

Other programs Zareinu provides include crisis prevention, professional development for its staff and for outside teachers, sensitization programs for day schools and bar and bat mitzvah programs.

"The idea is to enhance the life of the child, and to make them feel a part of their community."

Goldman noted that some developmentally delayed students are capable of taking part in regular, albeit modified, day school programs.

However, promised provincial funding for students with developmental disabilities who attend private schools has not yet materialized, Goldman said.

But she noted that some support is available. The province, for instance, will send a nurse or physiotherapist to help with gastric feeding or to do chest compressions for children with cystic fibrosis.

One of the programs for which Zareinu is especially noted is MEDEK, directed by physiotherapist Ester Fink. Developed by Ramon Cuevas, a physiotherapist in Chile, it is a therapeutic intervention for the development of functional movement in children.

MEDEK has been very successful in teaching children to move, walk or run who would otherwise not have been able to do so, Goldman said.

"People come here from all over the world to see how it works. Some people even move to Toronto just to get this therapy," she said.

Zareinu offers practicums for students in university and community colleges in field ranging from physical and occupational therapy to special education and medicine.

240 EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Yeshivas Eitz Chaim, Toronto's oldest Orthodox Day School, is seeking an extremely hardworking, conscientious and talented administrator to serve as an integral member of the executive management team. Eitz Chaim spans three campuses and serves close to 1,000 students.

Responsibilities will include, but not be limited to, the daily fiscal operation and the business activities necessary for the support of all educational programs.

The position will require a skill set and experience base that not only encompasses a well developed knowledge of the Orthodox Jewish Day School system but also the capacity to supervise various support services. The Executive Director will liaise regularly with the Dean, other educational administrators and provide input to the Board on all matters falling into his purview. The ideal candidate will have a well respected track record as an administrator in a Jewish Day School environment.

Qualified candidates should forward their resume and cover letter to:

Argentine Jews mark bombing date

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telgraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Lea Kovensky can't give up the idea of pursuing justice for those responsible for the 1992 bombing at the Israeli embassy here, a bombing that left her with remnants of glass in her lips and fingers.

Since that March 17, when an explosion ripped through the building, killing 29 people and wounding dozens of others, Kovensky, a secretary at the embassy, has hoped for a day when the perpetrators would be caught.

"I never thought of quitting my work with the embassy, or emigrating, or making aliyah. Since then, I cannot have any other thought than the one that my country will fight to make justice," Kovensky, 47, said.

For Kovensky and approximately 1,500 other people who gathered this week in front of the hole left after the bombing, the wait continues after 11 years.

At the memorial ceremony last week, Israel formally accused Iran and Hezbollah of masterminding the attack.

Standing in front of a small stage, Israeli's ambassador in Argentina, Benjamin Oron, read a letter from Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom.

"Israel is certain that Hezbollah" was "the author of the terrorist attack against the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires," Oron read. "Knowing the activities of this terrorist organization, and according to additional information, we know Iran, including high members of its government, was informed about the attack plans and gave its authorization."

An Argentine judge recently indicted four Iranian officials in connection with the 1994 bombing of AMIA, Buenos Aires' Jewish community centre. That bombing killed 85 people.

The Supreme Court of Justice is in charge of the 1992 embassy investigation.

In 1999, the court said Middle Eastern terror groups may have been behind the embassy bombing. The court also demanded the capture of Imad Mughniyeh, a Hezbollah operative believed to be linked to the attack.

But the court didn't blame Iran.

"Honestly, we don't have many expectations" that the case will be solved, "but we will fight with all of our energy to keep the case open," said Mariano Fridman, director of the law department of DAIA, the Jewish political umbrella organization.

The looming war in Iraq made last week's commemoration more security-minded than ever. Beneath a warm sun, dogs and police officers patrolled the premises.

Many police were hidden on the roofs of neighboring buildings, observing with binoculars. No backpacks were allowed, and people had to check in before they were allowed on the street corner where the ceremony took place.

Norma Goldman, director of Jewish Studies at Tarbut Jewish day School, was at the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion studying Bible when the bomb went off.

"As an Argentine Jew, I couldn't be anywhere else today," Goldman, surrounded by 25 teenage students from her school, said.

Victims' relatives were far from the stage where a few Jewish leaders spoke.

The relatives were seated in stone and iron banks, drinking mineral water that was placed on a nearby table. Their attention seemed to be far from the speeches, their curved backs reflecting fatigue from an 11-year wait without any resolution.

For some, the numbers at the commemoration were too low, showing what they considered a lack of commitment by the Argentine Jewish community.

"If not, there should have been more people here," Hilel Rubinson, 80, said.

But those in attendance – rabbis, students and teachers, community leaders, and victims' relatives – said they wanted to remember and press for answers in the case.

"I am here because I just want justice," said Maia Avruj, an elementary school student.

Avruj was not yet born when the bomb exploded at the embassy.

Jonathan Furrer, standing close to Avruj, was eight years old at the time of the bombing. Furrer was born in 1984, a few months after the return of democracy to Argentina following more than seven years of military government.

Furrer remembers his teachers sending him back home that Tuesday afternoon.

"I sat over a cushion, in front of the television, with my mother," Furrer said. "I saw all the rubble and I cried. I felt that what had been destroyed was also mine."

Swiss official justifies attacks on Israel

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Swiss legislators are calling for the dismissal of a senior foreign ministry official who wrote a letter that appeared to sanction terrorist attacks against Israel.

In his letter to the Swiss-based group "Pro-PLO," the head of the ministry's Middle East department, Thomas Kupfer, described Palestinian suicide bombers as "resistance fighters" who did not "obtain the necessary success."

Kupfer, who is Jewish, added in the letter to "Pro-PLO" that such "acts of resistance are counter-productive and only provoke Israeli acts of excessive force, from which only Palestinian civilians will suffer."

Coming from such a high official, some wondered if the letter represented a change in Swiss government policy. Switzerland routinely condemns Israeli anti-terror actions for their alleged violations of Palestinian human rights, but such criticism has generally been balanced with denunciations of Palestinian bombings as terrorism.

The Israeli Embassy in Bern is trying to clarify the matter through diplomatic channels, a spokesperson said.

Simon Hubacher, spokesperson for Swiss Foreign Minister Michelle Calmy-Rey, confirmed the letter, which was posted on the Palestinian group's Internet site, was authentic. The minister will launch an investigation into the affair, Hubacher said.

Political observers in the Jewish community said it is scandalous that a government official would write to a Palestinian group that opposes Israel's existence and praises attacks against it.

Some members of parliament are recommending Kupfer be fired.

The uproar over the letter comes after a wave of recent anti-Semitic statements connected to the U.S.-led war on Iraq had rattled Swiss Jewry.

Some organizers of Carnival celebrations in Basel recently compared Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to Hitler. Others said Jews in Switzerland fight for the right of kosher slaughter, while in Israel they simply slaughter Palestinians.

After an outcry from the Basel Jewish community, the city's leading daily newspaper asked readers if the community's complaints were justified. More than 80 per cent said no, adding arguments such as, if the Nazis had succeeded, Swiss Jews wouldn't be able to protest now.

One reader wrote that Swiss Jews should go to Israel; another wrote that Hitler was far less dangerous than Sharon; while a third wrote that the Jews should just keep quiet.

Prior to the war against Iraq, U.S. officials noted a huge increase in anti-American rallies. One Israeli diplomat said recent anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic statements may be a sort of revenge for pressure U.S. officials put on Switzerland and its banks in the 1990s to provide restitution for Holocaust victims.

While most Swiss Jews supported the U.S.-led alliance during the last war against Iraq in 1991, this time is different. A significant segment of the community wishes the United States good luck, but prefers not to do so publicly for fear of an anti-Semitic backlash.

Hockey league caters to Sabbath-observant kids

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

For 30 years, the Avenue Road Hockey Association has thrived by offering week-night hockey games for a predominantly Jewish clientele who need not worry about a schedule conflicting with the Sabbath.

Since its inception, the league has grown from about 100 players to the 850 who participate today, ranging in age from four to 18 years old. The league grew out of the Avenue Road Boys Club, which in the 1940s, brought together groups of kids for a variety of social activities.

Hockey became its mainstay in the early '70s when an Orthodox Jew named Gary Orzach took over.

"It's not a Jewish league per se," said Bernie Gropper, a division convener. "There's very large participation among the community and there's participation from all aspects of the community."

The majority of the players compete at the house league level, while 12 select teams in various age groups skate as members of the Avenue Road Mighty Ducks. They play in the North York Hockey League.

The top Avenue Road club this season was the Novice Tier II team that went undefeated at 6-0-3. The Atom and Juvenile Tier II squads finished tied atop their respective divisions.

Games and most practices are held at Baycrest Arena on Sunday through Thursday nights, where all kids involved are guaranteed an hour of ice time each week. The season runs from late September until early to mid-April.

Co-general manager Don Mintz says professional instructors are hired to run practices to make sure kids get the most out of being on the ice for that hour.

"The four- and five-year-olds don't play hockey," he said. "They're in a learn-to-play program run by professionals who teach the kids how to skate and be involved in the game. They only do skills. Only towards the end of the season do they play in games."

This Avenue Road select team plays as part of the Avenue Road Hockey Association.

Sharp named Toronto's best player in Aussie-rules football tourney

Joshua Sharp was named Toronto's best player at a recent Australian rules football tournament in Phoenix, Ariz., although his team, the Toronto Downtown Dingos, were eliminated from playoff contention while posting a 2-1 record.

Sharp registered three out of a possible nine votes to win the best player accolade while scoring the most goals for the Dingos – seven – from his position on defence.

An Australian working in Canada, Sharp led the Dingos to a fifth place finish out of 12 teams. The Canadian Kangaroos, Canada's other entry, finished third.

With no one on the bench to call on for relief, the Dingos were undermanned throughout the tournament.

In Game 1, the Dingos defeated Tennessee 11:10:76 (11 six-point goals and 10 "behinds," or singles) to 9:5:59. Goals are scored by kicking the ball through the other team's uprights. Behinds are scored by kicking the ball over the behind posts in the corners of the field.

Game 2 pitted the Dingos against the Orange County Titans, the defending champions. Toronto jumped into an early 22-3 lead but the Titans fought back to take a 12-point halftime lead.

Toronto narrowed the gap to five, but with six players able to come off the bench (supplied by the Titans' B team, Orange County's second entry in the tourney), the Titans scored a late goal to go ahead by 11. Final score: Orange County 10:7:67, Toronto 8:8:56.

Game 3 saw the Dingos run up against a weak entry from New York. The Dingos surged to a 49-3 lead, but let up in the second half when they heard Orange County had stacked its B team with A players so the B team could make the wildcard playoff spot with a 130-point win over Washington.

Writing on the Ontario Australian Football League (OAFL) Web site, Chris Buczkowski said the Dingos "needed to win by the same margin, but we were much too tired."

Final score: Toronto 9:5:59, New York 6:12:48.

The next morning, shortly before the semi-final that pitted the Kangaroos against the Chandler Outlaws, Arizona's number one team, Sharp and three other Dingos were asked to lace up for the Red Roos. It was their fourth game in two days, yet Sharp scored two goals and was again named Canada's best player.

A native of Melbourne, Australia, Sharp has been living in Toronto for less than a year, working in the area of finance. Prior to moving to Canada, he played for Ajax, a Jewish club in Melbourne that sports a Star of David on its "jumper" (uniform) and which has won the championship in D Division of Australian club football.

This past season, Sharp helped propel the Dingos to a second place finish in the OAFL.

The Dingos' 2003 pre-season begins at the end of April. Anyone interested in trying out for the team can contact Sharp at: Joshua.Sharp2@tdsecurities.com.

יעל זליגר

ימים רבים, אוטוביוגרפיה

מאת: שלמית הראבן

"תמיד חשבתי שתרבות מתחילה במקום בו יודעים להבדיל בין ואחישי לצבורי. אופנת החשיפה הנוכחית, שאינה מכירה בצנעת הפרט, נובעת בחלקה משיקולים מסחריים, מפני שתמיד יימצאו מציצנים בשוק; אבל גם משיקול - לעניות דעתי, מוטעה לגמרי - של חלק מן המחקר הספרותי: אם לא יידע החוקר עם מי וכמה זמן היה לסופר רומן בגיל תשע עשרה, איך יידע למה התכוון המשורר בשירו?" כך פותחת שולמית הראבן את הקדמתה לספרה האוטוביוגרפי-החדש.

BANANA NUT MATZOH KUGEL

4 matzot broken into 1/2-inch pieces
4 eggs
4 tblsps. honey
1/4 cup melted butter
2 bananas, peeled and sliced
1/2 cup chopped walnuts
cinnamon

Place matzoh pieces in a bowl and pour cold water over them; drain immediately. Squeeze out a little water. Beat eggs with honey and butter. Add matzoh pieces to egg mixture and mix well. Spread half of egg/matzoh mixture in greased square baking dish. Arrange sliced bananas on top. Sprinkle with nuts. Top with rest of matzoh. Dust top with cinnamon. Bake at 350°F for 45 minutes or until lightly browned.

About Food

Dear Norene

Passover is just a few weeks away and it is important to include the children in your Passover preparations. Chocolate-dipped matzot are a fun project. You can melt the chocolate for the kids and they can do the dipping. Don't stop with matzah – dried fruit or fresh strawberries also work well. As an alternative, the children can write their names (or the names of your seder guests) on the matzot. If you don't have a pastry bag, pour the melted chocolate into a ziploc bag, then seal the bag and snip off one corner with scissors.

CHOCOLATE-DIPPED MATZOT

12 ounces bittersweet Passover chocolate, broken into chunks
1 tbsp. oil
1 (1-lb.) box matzah

In a microwaveable glass bowl, combine chocolate with oil. Microwave on medium power for 2 to 3 minutes, until chocolate has melted, stirring every minute. Cool slightly.

Break or cut matzot into halves or thirds. Dip into melted chocolate, using tongs or your fingers. Place matzot on a baking sheet lined with baking parchment or waxed paper. Refrigerate until set. Makes about 3 dozen.

Here is another recipe that is perfect to make with the children. It comes from Passover Cookery: In the Kitchen with Joan Kekst (Five Star Publications, $37.50 Cdn). Kekst understands that everyone recalls the aroma and nostalgia of childhood Passovers with their grandparents. Her user-friendly, comprehensive book helps both the new and the experienced cook capture and create traditional Passover flavours. It contains a complete Countdown to Passover guide to help busy cooks and their families organize holiday preparations into easy steps. Kekst includes Sephardi and Ashkenazi specialties, dishes that can be made in advance, foods that children will love, and low-fat, low-cholesterol and vegetarian recipe suggestions. To order, call 416-226-2466.

FARFEL COOKIES (Pareve)

½ cup chopped almonds, toasted
½ cup golden raisins
1 cup matzah meal
1 cup matzah farfel
1 scant cup sugar
2 large eggs
⅓ cup vegetable oil
½ tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease or spray 2 cookie sheets. On a sheet of foil, toast almonds in oven until golden, about 5 minutes. Cool, coarsely chop and set aside. Soften raisins in hot water 15 minutes; drain and pat dry.

In a large bowl, combine matzah meal, farfel, sugar and half the toasted almonds. With a wooden spoon, add eggs and oil; combine well with dry ingredients. Add cinnamon and raisins.

Drop by the teaspoon onto prepared cookie sheets. Centre a few almonds on each cookie mound. Bake 20 to 25 minutes. Cool on a rack. Store airtight. Makes about 48.

Carleton Jewish students denied protest rights

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The director of Ottawa's Jewish Students Association-Hillel (JSA) was preparing to contact members of Carleton University's administration Monday as The CJN went to press over an incident last week in which Jewish students were barred from protesting an anti-Israel display.

Controversy reached Senate

The exhibit, titled Carleton Under Occupation, was organized by the university's Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) group last Thursday in Baker's Lounge, a public area with a high volume of student traffic.

The controversy even reached Canada's senate, when Marcel Prud'homme read an e-mail to his fellow senators from SPHR's executive board last Thursday, alleging that "different bodies within the university community are trying to prevent" the exhibition for no reason.

Ann Silverstone, JSA director, said in an interview Sunday that she had contacted Carleton's equity office last Wednesday to express concern about SPHR organizers impeding traffic and forcing people to go through the display.

She said she was assured by Kimberly Bryce, the incoming president of Carleton University Students Association (CUSA), which has jurisdiction over Baker's Lounge, that traffic flow would not be impeded.

The News in Brief

Canada

Iraq Rapped on PoWs

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress said last week Ottawa should urge Iraq to comply with international law in its treatment of prisoners of war and should convey Canada's dismay to Iraq's ambassador for Iraq's "breaches" in this regard during the current conflict. "We strongly condemn the Iraqi regime for its illegal and unethical exploitation of PoWs for propaganda purposes," CJC president Keith Landy said, adding that postwar investigations should treat such actions as war crimes.

Israel

Israel off Coalition List

JERUSALEM — Israel has been kept off a list of nations taking part in U.S.-led military action against Iraq, as part of an attempt to keep a low profile. The U.S. State Department listed 30 nations last week that it defined as a "coalition of the willing," but said several other nations had asked to be kept anonymous. "It's clear that Israel is 100 per cent behind the United States, but everyone understands it's in the interests of a successful operation that Israel keep a very low profile," an Israeli diplomat in Washington, D.C., said.

Al Aqsa Attack Call

JERUSALEM — The Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade last week called for attacks on U.S., British and Israeli targets around the world because of the war in Iraq. The group, which is affiliated with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah party, said the three countries are trying to take control of Arab and Muslim resources through "terror and massacres." PA officials said the statement doesn't reflect Fatah policy.

Nation of Web Surfers

JERUSALEM — According to a recent survey, 2.2 million Israelis over age 13 – about 33 per cent of Israel's population– currently use the Internet. The survey found 50 per cent of all Jewish households have an Internet connection. Ninety per cent of users surf at least once a week, and 69 per cent do so daily.

World

Pesach Kits for Troops

NEW YORK — Chabad-Lubavitch is sending 1,000 Passover packages to U.S. Jewish troops in Afghanistan, Iraq, Kuwait and elsewhere. A team of rabbis and rabbinical students assembled the kits, containing Haggadahs, matzah, horseradish, gefilte fish and seder plates, at a New Jersey warehouse last week, a Chabad spokesperson said. Meanwhile, the Jewish Community Centers Association, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's New York region and the Jewish Federation of Rockland County, N.Y., have organized a $25,000 (US) effort to send Jewish soldiers kosher-for-Pesach foods, the New York Jewish Week reported. The United Synagogue is also sending solo seder kits to soldiers. There are an estimated 1,500 Jewish troops in the Persian Gulf.

Embassy a Target?

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Captured Al Qaeda leader Khalid Sheik Mohammed has named Israel's embassy in Washington, D.C., as a possible target of future terrorist attacks, along with other U.S. sites such as Chicago's Sears Tower. During questioning by U.S. authorities, Mohammed also named a dozen Al Qaeda operatives plotting such attacks, Time magazine reported.

Jews Mull Emigration

PARIS — More than one-quarter of French Jews have considered emigrating because of anti-Semitism, a newly released poll says. The survey of 493 French Jews, conducted last October by U.S. pollster Stan Greenberg for The Israel Project, found 26 per cent of French Jews have strongly considered immigrating to Israel or the United States due to rising anti-Semitism, with 13 per cent "very seriously" eyeing emigration. Thirty-eight percent say they have experienced an anti-Semitic incident. Overall, 82 per cent say anti-Semitism is a serious problem.

Swiss Apologize

ZURICH — Switzerland's foreign ministry apologized for a letter a senior official wrote to a pro-Palestinian group that appeared to condone terror attacks on Israel. The head of the ministry's Middle East department, Thomas Kupfer, who is Jewish, had written to the Swiss-based group "Pro-PLO," describing Palestinian suicide bombers as resistance fighters. "We apologize that this happened," a ministry spokesperson said. "The content of the letter does not reflect Switzerland's view."

Woman Heads CCAR

NEW YORK — The Central Conference of American Rabbis, the central body of 1,800 North American Reform rabbis, has elected Rabbi Janet Marder, 48, as its first-ever female president. The senior rabbi of Congregation Beth Am in Los Altos Hills, Calif., began her two-year term March 29. She succeeds Rabbi Martin Weiner, senior rabbi at Congregation Sherith Israel in San Francisco.

NEW YORK — The Jewish Telegraphic Agency's foreign editor Mitchell Danow died March 20 of a heart attack in Kyoto, Japan. He was 55. Born and raised in New York, Danow attended Yale University, where he studied philosophy. He worked at Newsweek and the Forward before joining JTA in 1993.

Lawyer Chastised at Seifert Hearing

VANCOUVER — A competency hearing to determine whether Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert can be extradited to Italy saw Victoria, B.C., lawyer Doug Christie revert to old patterns, questioning an expert witness whether he was Jewish and suggesting he might be hostile to his client.

Judge Selwyn Romilly disallowed that line of questioning, saying it should not be permitted in a Canadian court. Earlier, Romilly criticized Christie for using delaying tactics and for an irrelevant and long-winded cross-examination. "In 29 years on the bench, I have never had a fitness hearing that has been so protracted," he wrote in a ruling.

Seifert, 79, faces extradition to Italy for a 2000 conviction in absentia by an Italian military court for murdering 11 prisoners at the Bolzano concentration camp in World War II.

Earlier in the competency hearing, a psychologist testifying for the defence said Seifert suffered brain damage from a fall last year and that he may not even know he's in a courtroom. But a clinical neurologist testifying for the Crown said that while Seifert had low intelligence and little education, he was able to communicate with Christie.

Eves defends education tax cut at CJC plenary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Providing a tax credit to parents of children in private schools is the right thing to do, Ontario Premier Ernie Eves said at last weekend's Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region's 31st triennial regional plenary.

"Canada, like the United States, was founded on the principles of freedom of religion and choice, and the key to strengthening education is to provide parental choice. It is all about the issues of fairness and equity," said Eves, the keynote speaker at the plenary luncheon.

The Equity in Education Tax Credit (ETC), which he said will not take away from the public school system, "is merely an acknowledgement of this choice."

Eves comments came after last week's provincial budget reversed the freeze on the ETC that he had imposed last summer.

As a result, the credit will be worth 20 per cent, or $1,400, of the first $7,000 in tuition fees, for 2003. For the 2002 tax year, it's worth 10 per cent, or $700, of the first $7,000 in tuition fees.

At a political plenum session following the luncheon that included Conservative MPP Steven Gilchrist, Liberal MPP Gerard Kennedy and NDP MP Michael Prue, Gilchrist said weaknesses in the public school system were due, in part, to the fact there had been no competition or choice.

"The tax credit is back on track, and the reality is that you will see fairness return to the education system," he said.

Prue, in speaking out against the credit, said his party believes in the public school system and is opposed to funding private schools. Within that framework, he said, he sees no problem with bringing back religion as an elective to the public schools.

"It is of fundamental importance to the people of our province that the public school system not be denegrated any further," Prue said.

The tax credit will allow teachers with no accreditation to teach in private schools, he said. "We need to make sure schools teach the curriculum."

Kennedy said that, first and foremost, the government needs to build confidence in the public school system. "Right now, classes are large, textbooks are old, and special needs kids are losing their programs.

"An education policy [needs to focus on] bringing about excellence in the public system," he said.

Kennedy said he understands and appreciates the right of religious minorities to have the access to religious education, he said, but he rejects the claim the need can be met by a tax credit.

"That will affect public school funding, because every time a student leaves the public school system to attend a private school, the public school loses funding. It will undermine the system."

When asked if he can come up with a plan that will work better than the tax credit, Kennedy said the matter has been up for discussion in his party "and we do not think there is an easy alternative. Can we [come up with an alternative on demand?] The answer is no."

In other matters, Eves told delegates at the luncheon that although foreign policy is not within his jurisdiction, he felt it is his responsibility to voice his opinion on the position Canada has taken with regards to the war in Iraq.

"I respect the prime minister, but he has made the wrong decision. We need to support our allies in their time of trouble and in their time of need."

The Sept. 11 attack was not just against the United States, he said, but against all citizens, and two dozen Canadians perished in the attack.

"We must stand firm in our resolve not to let indifference overcome justice. We must defend the rights and freedoms of all individuals."

His government supports the United States, he said, in order to ensure that the free flow of people, and goods and services continues.

Canadians must not tolerate hate, he said, and synagogues, churches and schools cannot be vandalized with impunity.

"[Perpetrators] should be punished to the fullest extent of the law, and under our government they will be. Anti-Semitism is unacceptable here or anywhere. We need to lead by example.

"We need to live in a society that defends the rights and freedoms of everyone in the province. That is the only way we can say we made it to the Promised Land."

The canard of linkage

From the editor's desk

It is a phenomenon hard to ignore. Protesters take to the streets to express their opposition to the western coalition trying to disarm and overthrow Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. Their anger, however, is aimed primarily at the United States.

To be sure, many protesters are genuinely pained, expressing deeply held convictions that war in general – and this war in particular – is wrong. They do not disregard Saddam's perfidy. Rather, they believe that even worthy ends, such as removing Saddam from power, cannot be achieved through such unworthy means, namely by violence.

But it is equally true that many protesters are not so genuine. These protestors hold a rigid, ideological view of the United States as an imperialist oppressor of Third World regimes around the world. In the main, they are indifferent to, if not actively supportive of, the sadistic brutality of Saddam and his vicious regime. They view the attempt to disarm and remove him as illegal, an irredeemably unholy act by the western alliance, incapable of any modicum of moral justification.

But their most vociferous disdain is reserved for Israel, whom they also view as oppressive and imperialistic, a malevolent, colonialist surrogate of the hated West (read the United States) in the Middle East, religiously, culturally and historically alien there, an unwelcome Jewish state in a Muslim domain.

Thus, at virtually every anti-war demonstration, whether in North America, Europe or the Middle East, one sees the Palestinian flag fluttering prominently among the clutter of anti-war placards. It is a visual anchor in the anarchic collage of mass demonstrations. But it is also a coded public proclamation and a rallying point among the anti-Israel masses of their unambiguous rejection of the legitimacy of a Jewish state.

With reflexive, raw emotion, these protesters draw a link between the war in Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The war is unjustified ab initio; so too is Israel – in their minds.

Lately, we have also heard other suggested linkages between the fighting in Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Pat Buchanan and his fellow right-wing travellers have reprised their contumelious rantings from the last Gulf War. In their minds, Washington's Iraq policies are being dictated by Israel and its supporters. Their views are the poisoned fruit of the sick trees that populate the dark woods of believers in the "worldwide Zionist conspiracy."

But the most troubling linkage – because it emanates from an esteemed individual – came from British Foreign Minister Jack Straw. Last week, he speculated about the West's "double standard" toward Israel.

It is important that this attempted linkage be refuted and the "double standard" argument dispatched. The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) helps us do so.

In the latest issue of the CIC Insider (available on its Web site, www.cicweb.ca), its research department examines "five fallacies" surrounding the so-called linkage.

I reproduce the bare-bones highlights from those five fallacies.

• The UN Double Standard: The charge of a UN double standard in the treatment of Israel vis-à-vis Iraq is baseless. It rests on a serious misunderstanding of the key differences between the two cases, including the very different application of UN resolutions toward each country.

• Nuclear Weapons Disarmament: Iraq, not Israel, has been judged by the UN Security Council to be a threat to international peace and security… The UN has passed numerous Chapter VII resolutions demanding that Iraq disclose and destroy any nuclear-related materials.

• Quid-Pro-Quo: Any attempt by the international community, especially through the UN, which has a reprehensible record of passing polemical one-sided resolutions against Israel, to "impose" a solution is almost certainly bound to fail. Peace that is artificially imposed instead of emanating from a sincere desire between the participating parties to achieve reconciliation cannot last.

Trusted third parties, including the United States, can be catalysts in moving the process of reconciliation forward, for instance, by helping to promote an atmosphere for confidence-building measures. But this is very different from attempting to dictate terms to Israelis and Palestinians.

• Misplaced Efforts by the United States: The United States is confronting Saddam because it has determined, as has the UN, that the Iraqi leader, with weapons of mass destruction in his hands, poses a grave risk to the stability of the Middle East and beyond. This determination derives from U.S. national interests and has nothing to do with Israel.

The idea that Israel's government determines U.S. Middle East policy and that the United States is Israel's puppet is not only flagrantly wrong, it is a gross caricature of the relations between the two countries. A variation of this distortion… that the campaign against Iraq is being carried out as a favour to Israel, is a staple of anti-Israel, anti-Semitic propaganda.

• Settling Scores: Israel is not looking to use a war on Iraq as a pretext for waging war on the Palestinians. Nor does it want to subjugate them. Since its creation, Israel has yearned for peace and acceptance by its Arab neighbours. It has fought five wars in an ongoing struggle for survival. Despite continued violence, it has pursued peace with the Palestinians and with its Arab neighbours. To suggest that Israel will use a war on Iraq to take advantage of the Palestinians not only ignores history but is scurrilous and malicious.

Only we'll keep private school tax credit, Tories warn

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Top provincial Tories delivered an unabashedly political message – and warning – last week, saying only they will preserve the Equity in Education Tax Credit (ETC) for parents of children in private and faith-based schools.

The pronouncements came less than a week after Premier Ernie Eves reversed the freeze on the credit he had imposed last summer, placing the measure back on its original implementation schedule.

That means the ETC will be worth 20 per cent, or $1,400 of the first $7,000 in tuition fees, for 2003.

The credit, a hugely popular measure in the Jewish community, provides the first financial relief for parents of day school students after 30 years of lobbying governments.

Last June, when Eves announced a one-year freeze of the ETC at 10 per cent of tuition, there was widespread disappointment in the community and fear the credit would remain at that level permanently.

Even though it is now unfrozen, Tories say that further legislation is needed to fully implement the credit beyond 2003. It is supposed to be phased in at a rate of 10 per cent a year, up to a maximum of 50 per cent of tuition, or $3,500, for 2006.

At a sparsely attended information meeting at Associated Hebrew Schools' Thornhill campus last week, Jim Flaherty, the former finance minister who introduced the controversial credit in his 2001 budget, warned that the opposition parties have promised to repeal the measure and that "only the Progressive Conservatives will defend it."

Tina Molinari, the Tory MPP for Thornhill, said the same thing in her brief remarks: "If the PC party is not re-elected, you can know for sure the ETC will be repealed."

Flaherty, now Minister of Enterprise, Opportunity and Innovation, said Liberal Leader Dalton McGuinty mistakenly believes the ETC will result in $300 million being taken out of the public education system.

"He's confused. He's wrong," Flaherty said.

Flaherty said the credit will come out of general funds and not the education budget. "It will not reduce the flow of dollars to education."

The meeting was sponsored by the Jewish Political Action Committee and Jewish Parents for Equity in Education Funding. Also in attendance were Corinne Korzen, the Tory candidate in Eglinton-Lawrence in the coming provincial election, and Joshua Cooper, who is seeking the federal Canadian Alliance nomination in Thornhill.

Flaherty used the meeting to counter what he called myths about the credit and about private schools in general.

He said the ETC will not weaken the four publicly funded education systems in the province. (In fact, he said, direct funding of public schools has increased faster than enrolment.)

An expected 25 per cent increase in private school enrollment will translate into annual savings of $175 million for public school boards, Flaherty said.

As for the charge that private schools promote intolerance, Flaherty said research shows the opposite: that former students of private and independent schools are more tolerant and involved in their communities than those who went to public schools; and that the "most notorious" cases of hatred and racism have come out of public schools, specifically, the cases of Holocaust-denying teachers Jim Keegstra and Malcolm Ross.

For Tories, the ETC "is a matter of fairness," Flaherty said. "We believe passionately in choice. Parents are better able to decide how their children are to be educated than the government."

As well, all schools stand to benefit from a newly created competitive atmosphere. "There's no reason the spark of competition cannot improve standards at our schools," he said.

Rules for claiming the credit

Ira Walfish, co-president of the non-partisan Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, presented the financial and tax-related nuts and bolts of the ETC at last week's information meeting.

The following are the highlights:

- Because the calendar year 2002 included two academic years, the credit can be applied to 10 months in 2002: from January to June (school year 2001-2), and September to December (school year 2002-03).
- The ETC can be claimed regardless of income.
- Students must be between four and 21 years old. Any child born in 1998 is eligible only for four months of the credit's value in 2002. The credit's value for last year is 10 per cent of the first $7,000 in tuition fees, or $700.
- The credit is available only to parents and legal guardians.
- The ETC can be claimed in addition to federal charitable benefits, but is calculated on net tuition (full tuition less 40 per cent of the tuition amount for which a charitable donation tax receipt is issued).
- Parents who get subsidies for their child's education can also claim the ETC, but the credit is reduced.
- If charitable receipts are in both parents' names, either parent can claim the ETC.
- Parents are advised to pay at least 40 per cent of tuition fees by the date the school issues the ETC statement in order to maximize the credit's benefits.

Trio organizing pro-U.S. rally

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Pollsters report that many Canadians support the federal government's position on the war in Iraq, but three Toronto men say they are finding something else. They report a surging groundswell of support for their view that Canadians must show they stand with the United States in difficult times.

Josh Cooper and his friends Richard Diamond and Mark Waldman are organizing a large rally at Nathan Phillips Square in downtown Toronto on Friday, April 4, at noon, to show that Canadians support the United States, regardless of their views of the war.

Based on the number of volunteers who are eager to participate in planning the rally, and considering the number of phone calls and e-mails they are fielding, some from as far away as Winnipeg and Halifax, they expect a large turnout at the City Hall rally.

A group in Niagara Falls has been inspired by the Toronto trio and are planning a pro-America demonstration on April 12. Cooper said the two organizing groups have merged and have begun working together as Friends of America.

"The goal of the rally is simply to show our friends in the United States we support them," Cooper said. Like old friends, "you support them regardless of what they do, and we have not done that."

Cooper, 33, said recent statements from senior government ministers, including Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, have angered him, particularly when Graham told reporters the United States would hear of Canada's position through the six o'clock news.

That's not the way you treat your best friend, Cooper said, adding that Canada has, in effect, abandoned the United States.

"If you don't want to send military support, send a field hospital, send medical aid, send a bouquet of flowers, send anything, but show them you support them as a friend," he said.

"No-one wants to become the 51st state. We're Canadians who love America."

Cooper believes many Canadians feel the same way. After fans of the Montreal Canadiens booed the U.S. national anthem at a recent game against the New York Islanders, he was concerned something similar might happen when he took his son to a Toronto Rock lacrosse game. Instead, the U.S. anthem was cheered heartily, more so than the Canadian one, he said.

The idea for a rally germinated when he and his buddy, Diamond, a real estate developer, were discussing how embarrassed and upset they were at hearing Montreal fans booing the American anthem.

Meeting later with Waldman, the three decided the best way they could show support for the United States while telling Ottawa it doesn't speak for all Canadians would be to hold a rally. At their first organizational meeting, 16 volunteers showed up, eager to help. At their third get-together, there were 50 volunteers ready to join their organizing group.

"Everyone is really gung ho to pull this off," said Cooper, a golf pro, owner of a golf camp and a political hopeful for the Canadian Alliance.

As news of the rally spread through word of mouth, volunteers began calling in greater number and cheques and cash started rolling in. Corporate representatives began calling, eager to support the rally and hang their corporate banners at the square. That offer has been turned down. Contributions are welcome, Cooper said, but they must be anonymous. Nevertheless, corporate sponsors are maintaining their support.

The money is being spent on ads, signs, flags, banners, buttons, the sound system – all the details needed to make a rally a success. Some volunteers are putting in 18-hour days. "They stopped their lives to work on this full time," Cooper said.

For more information, the group has set up a Web site at www.friendsofamerica.ca.

CHAT hosts special ceremony for new citizens

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Twenty-seven people from 10 countries became Canadian citizens in a special ceremony at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto on the first day of spring and at the end of a week that saw the United States go to war with Iraq.

On March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, Judge Sigmund Reiser joined Liberal MP Art Eggleton and Toni Silberman from the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada in welcoming the new citizens – a group that included families from Kenya, Bosnia and the Philippines, as well as a couple from England – Paul Shaviv, the principal of CHAT, and his wife Judy.

CHAT's Tanenbaum campus co-hosted the session, along with Citizenship and Immigration Canada and the League for Human Rights, as part of the high school's civics curriculum.

Before the ceremony began, Eggleton responded to questions from Grade 10 students who challenged Canada's decision to stay out of the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

"As former minister of defence, I know there are repercussions to war," Eggleton told the students. He went on to remind them that World War I and World War II began as regional conflicts and then escalated out of control.

Eggleton said "disarmament was one agenda, but regime change is [U.S. President George W.] Bush's agenda."

"No one likes Saddam Hussein, but there are a lot of brutal dictators" and no country should have the right to decide on its own which leaders should be removed, Eggleton said.

The former cabinet minister said he doesn't believe there will be any negative consequences to Canada's decision to stay out of the war.

"I understand the Americans are not happy about the stupid comments and derogatory comments being made about our closest friends and allies," he said. But Eggleton noted that Canada has disagreed with the United States before on Vietnam and Cuba without suffering any long-term consequences.

Eggleton told the students that "Canada can play a role in rebuilding Iraq," and that even if the United Nations has a lot of imperfections, it's the only institution that can promote international order.

"When we look around and see worlds torn apart… in the name of racial superiority, we realize how important it is to find a solution to racism," Silberman told the students.

Reiser reminded the new citizens that it will be their responsibility to express their views while respecting other perspectives.

"Canada has the most tolerant, open and diverse population that is based on the shared value of respect for the dignity of every human life," he said.

Paul and Judy Shaviv became Canadian citizens recently in a special ceremony at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Shaviv welcomed the group to CHAT and told them that a school is the most appropriate place for a citizenship ceremony.

"Education is the oxygen of democracy and freedom," he said.

"I lost 49 pounds. Hypnosis put me back in control!"

My name is Stacey Harrington. I dropped 49 pounds in five short months and made my marriage sizzle.

I couldn't stop eating. I had become overweight during my first year of college. My weight kept increasing from there. In desperation, I started dieting.

I felt starved and deprived. Once I stopped the program, I gained my weight back plus more.

I was easily insulted in those days. People told me, "You have such a pretty face." I knew what they meant: Too bad you're so fat.

I was desperate, yet I couldn't stop eating. I craved and binged. Every day I'd hide a sleeve of chips in my desk drawer.

One day I saw a story in the newspaper about a woman who had lost 47 lbs. I wanted to look like her. I called to schedule my free weight loss consultation.

BEFORE

Glimmer of Hope. I told my consultant about my past failures. How my weight was hurting my marriage. She understood.

Choosing hypnosis was the best decision of my life. I lost my weight at an average of 10 lbs. a month: 49 lbs. in all. When I first started, I was stretching the seams on my size 16 jeans. I recently bought my first pair of size 6's!

Easy and Fun! I noticed a change in my eating habits after my first session. When I'm full, I stop eating. I don't feel like I'm depriving myself. I don't fight it with will power.

It's automatic.

Passport to a New Life. I used to let the scale determine my mood in the morning. Now, I just wake up in a good mood. I no longer think about my weight. If I'm thirsty, I reach for a glass of water. If I'm hungry, I eat a well-balanced meal.

AFTER

Before hypnosis I stayed home all the time. I didn't want people to see me. Now I'm out and about all the time.

I've thrown out all my fat clothes. I would never have done that before. That's how confident I am that I've lost my weight for good.

One night my husband gazed into my eyes and said, "Stacey, I think you're the sexiest woman alive." The best part was that I believed him. I actually felt sexy. Our passion has been sizzling ever since.

I have not been paid to write this. I believe in hypnosis. It's given me my life back.

Now it's up to you. If you're feeling miserable and desperate about your weight, don't wait another minute. Just pick up the phone and call. Don't worry. They won't pressure you. So call now. If you're like me, it will be the best decision of your life.

Straw man argument, dangerous and false

We marvel at and commend the courage and bravery of the coalition forces currently fighting in Iraq. They are up against a foe whose tactics are proscribed neither by international conventions nor by the barest civility of human conscience. Reports emanating from the various fronts bear this out.

Whether it is Iraqi soldiers feigning surrender, irregular Iraqi militia shooting at fellow countrymen running to shelter away from the fighting, suicide bombings, or fedayeen hanging an old woman who had deigned to wave at coalition forces, the allied soldiers are now retraining in the field, as it were, to cope with a different kind of warfare.

We have no doubt the men and women of the allied fighting forces will carry, with humanity and dignity, the many life-and-death military burdens that have been placed on their shoulders and that in the end – may it come soon – they will prevail.

But the statement last week by British Foreign Minister Jack Straw to the BBC, purporting to link the propriety of allied intervention in Iraq with a need to intervene in the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, causes us concern.

The successful disposition by the allies of military burdens in Iraq should not result in political burdens, or worse, for Israel.

"The West has been guilty of a double standard," Straw said, "on the one hand saying the Security Council resolutions on Iraq must be implemented; on the other hand, sometimes appearing rather quixotic over the implementation of resolutions about Israel and Palestine."

The motive behind Straw's statement was quite obvious. He was throwing a sop to the leaders of the European Union and the Arab world – in particular, attempting to quell the bubbling mass of ferment and turmoil in the agitated "Arab streets" of the Middle East. But his effort was clumsy, ill-timed and regrettable.

There is no substantive, causative or historical link between the war raging in Iraq and the conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians (see page 4 of The CJN). That Saddam Hussein wishes there to be one, and that he tried desperately and maliciously in 1991 to establish one, effectively proves the opposite. Suggesting there is such a nexus merely reiterates a variation of, and lends false credence to, the "root causes" argument that individuals inimical to Israel hastened to make after 9/11.

This is not to deny, of course, the importance and the urgency of the need for Israel to reach an agreement with its Palestinian neighbours. A mutually acceptable, enforceable peace treaty is the best guarantor of Israel's and the Palestinians' national fulfillment. But no such treaty can ever be signed as an attempt to appease a mass of angry demonstrators whose roiling emotions are ignited, in the main, by their anger at the very thought of a Jewish state in their part of the world.

York University responds

Your newspaper recently carried a report of allegations that York University is now investigating ("Jewish students attacked in York anti-war protest," CJN, March 13). Your readers may be interested to know that the students cited in your article came forward to the university in the last few days and made their complaints relating to the events of March 5. Armed with the information that they have provided to us directly for the first time, the university is now in a position to conduct a thorough investigation with the full co-operation of the complainants. If their allegations are upheld, those concerned will be held to account for their behaviour. One of the incidents is also under investigation by the police.

York University does not tolerate acts of racism or assault against Jewish students or any other members of our community. York has always and will always welcome people of all nations and creeds.

Applauds Gerber's views

I was very impressed by Jean Gerber's recent piece for two reasons ("Let them hate, so long as they fear," The CJN, March 20).

What she said was sad but true, and she said it well. Israel's permitting of continual expansion of the settlements and the extreme irrational fervour of some members of the so-called settler movement, including dreadful acts such as shooting at Palestinians who are trying to harvest their olive crop on their own land, have together formed the most serious barrier to peace on the Israeli side of the table. On the Palestinian side, the "laurel wreath" easily goes to the bomber-killers and their instigators and supporters.

Condemns Gerber's views

In Jean Gerber's column of March 20, "Let them hate, so long as they fear," she depicts the heroic settlers of Yehudah and Shomron as motivated by hate and she compares them to idolators (while she, presumably, is motivated by love). She perceives an inverse relationship between their valuing of the land of Israel ("land grabs") and the lives of Israeli soldiers. She accepts the European view that the Palestinians are victims and the Israelis are oppressors.

In order that I might understand her articles more clearly, I would ask that Gerber define her terms. What is a "radical?" What is Zionism? Like so many journalists, she fails to define the terms she bandies about in her articles. For example, doesn't the term "radical" mean someone or something that would upset the prevailing order? Her view, then, is radical. As we've already seen for more than 10 years, the consequences are the tragic transformation of the quality of life for the residents of Israel and, ultimately, the demise of a Jewish state.

Gerber should take a trip to Israel and visit the various "settlement" communities. Such a trip would be therapeutic for her. She would learn, if she allowed herself to, that the settlers of Yehudah and Shomron are motivated by their love for the Jewish people and the land of Israel.

Chaim Forer
Thornhill, Ont.

It's time to stand up and be counted

I am in total agreement with Sylvia Kamen's letter ("Silence is acquiescence," CJN letters, March 20) on the proactive stance we should be taking against anti-Semitism. Let's not just talk about boycotting. Let's do it!

Later this spring, in May, when we walk for Israel in our respective communities, let's make it the best turnout yet. Let's stand up and be counted. Now more than ever, we should show the world what we are made of and say "never again."

Linda R. Goldman
Toronto

CJN stance wrong

Once again, your newspaper is out of step with ordinary Canadians ("Rendering hollow the word 'ally,'" CJN editorial, March 27).

The people of this country do not support the United States invasion of Iraq. One of the world's largest peace marches recently took place in the streets of Montreal. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is right, in this case, to respect the will of his citizens.

And what is it that you are actually supporting? The United States will inevitably kill and maim countless thousands of innocent Iraqis. It will also kill some of its own troops, and probably expose them to toxins, for which they will be denied compensation. How does this guarantee anyone's security?

It is irresponsible to claim that Jews, or Canadians, or any decent people, should support U.S. President George W. Bush.

Ivansk, Poland, memorial

I am part of a small international group of Jewish descendants from the small Polish town of Ivansk (Iwaniska), who came together a few months ago through the Jewish genealogy (JewishGen) Web site. We were concerned that the Web site had information about other shtetlach, but none on Ivansk. There is no Yizkor book on Ivansk, either. One member of our group, who has been to Ivansk twice in recent years, took many photographs of the town, but found almost no evidence of the Jews who once lived there.

We are in the process of collecting oral histories from the few remaining natives, and are searching for photographs and any other material about Ivansk. Our aim is to find out everything we can about the town and its families and to create some sort of memorial, perhaps a little book, for YIVO and Yad Vashem. We ask anyone who has stories, tapes, photographs, letters, postcards, family trees, or anything at all relating to Ivansk (even jokes and quips), to contact us so that we can copy and include your submission in our project.

We hope that we may be able to bring the lost Jewish town of Ivansk back to life in some small way by preserving all the memories of it that still exist.

Marking 100 years since the Kishinev pogrom

By BARUCH COHEN

Almost 50 tombstones in a Kishinev, Moldova, Jewish cemetery were vandalized last Passover, according to a statement by the president of the Kishinev Jewish Community, Yakov Vayselbukh, reproduced in full in the April 9, 2002 issue of Nezavisimaya Moldova. Many of the tombstones have been damaged beyond repair. Without giving the exact date of the attack, Vayselbukh pointed out that it took place not only during Passover, but also around the time of the anniversary of the infamous 1903 Kishinev pogrom. The community has asked the police to investigate the incident.

The name Kishinev became known to the world as a result of two pogroms. The first, organized by the local and central authorities, took place during the Easter holiday on April 6-7, 1903. Forty-nine Jews were killed, more than 500 were injured, 700 houses were looted and destroyed, and 600 businesses and shops were looted. Both Russians and Romanians joined in the riots. On October 19-20, 1905, riots broke out once more. Nineteen Jews were killed, 56 injured, and houses and shops were again looted and destroyed.

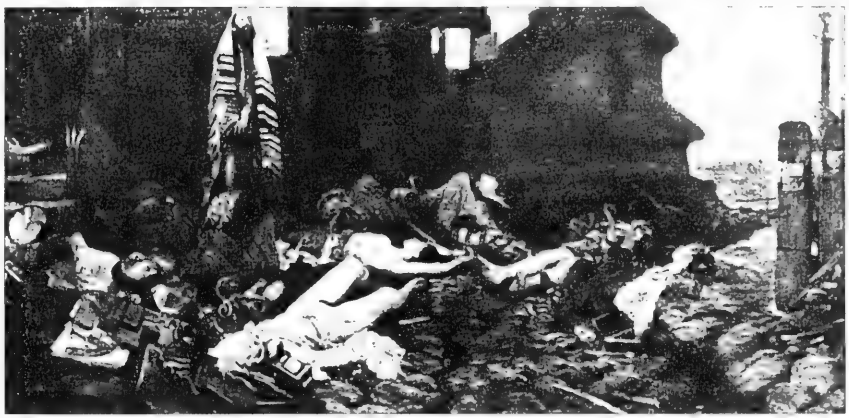
The first pogrom was preceded by a poisonous anti-Jewish campaign led by Pavlochi Krushevan, director of the Bessarabian newspaper Bessarabets, who incited the population through a constant stream of vicious articles. Agents of the Ministry of the Interior, V. K. von Plehve, and high-level Russian officials of the Bessarabian administration were involved in its preparation, evidently with the backing of the minister himself.

There was no lack of incendiary material, and Kishinev, the capital of Bessarabia, in southern Russia, was one of the criminal nests of the arsonists. Close to 50,000 Jews lived there, together with a Christian population of more than 60,000. They were generally free from clashes that would have seemed natural under the gloomy and crude superstitions of the local Moldavians and Russians.

The seeds of anti-Semitism, however, were disseminated by Russian officials who were "enlightened" in the spirit of the semi-official Novoyevremya newspaper. Krushevan, a local tax collector who launched his career through anti-Semitic agitation, began in 1897 to publish Bessarabets, which would become one of the most vicious organs of anti-Semitic propaganda. For several years, Krushevan's paper carried on uncurbed agitation against Jews.

At the end of the 19th century, most Kishinev Jews were engaged in commerce, handicrafts and industry. About 20,000 Jews worked in a variety of occupations, in particular the garment and timber industries, and the manufacture and trade of agricultural products.

Jews owned many flour mills, plants for curing tobacco and drying fruit, and wine cellars. In 1898, 29 of the 38 factories in Kishinev were owned by Jews. Large commercial houses and printing presses were also owned by Jews and employed thousands of Jewish workers. But because Russian authorities had a policy of deliberately fostering anti-Semitism and passing legislation that restricted the sources of livelihood open to Jews, there were also a particularly large number of poor and destitute Jews who were supported by various charitable institutions.



"After the Pogrom," an oil painting by S. Fabjanski. The painting was exhibited in Munich in 1910. [Encyclopedia Judaica photo]

Kishinev was the seat of the Bessarabian headquarters of several important Jewish institutions: the Jewish Colonization Association (ICA) and, after World War I, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. There were Jewish schools that taught in Yiddish and Hebrew, and a tarbut (cultural) school. In 1898, there were 16 Jewish schools with 2,100 pupils. Seven hundred Jewish pupils attended general schools.

The Protocol of the Elders of Zion, a popular recurring anti-Semitic forgery, was first published in 1903 under the auspices of the secret police in the czar's press, although the czar himself believed it to be a fraud. A certain Sergei Nilus is believed to be the author. Nilus got the idea from the notorious French anti-Semite Edouard Drumont, the editor of La France Juive. The Protocols are a total fabrication that served to incite hatred toward Jews.

Whatever the origin of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, they were adopted and preserved and, in the end, launched on the world by pogromshchiki, professional instigators of pogroms. The hundreds of local massacres of Jews that occurred in Russia between 1881 and 1920 were by no means spontaneous outbreaks of popular fury: they demanded long-term planning, careful organization and, above all, intensive agitation. Sometimes this work was carried out by the police, but sometimes private individuals – above all, unscrupulous journalists – lent a hand. These were the people who made the Protocols their own.

Krushevan, the first person to publish the Protocols, was a typical pogromshchik. Just four months before he printed the Protocols in his St. Petersburg newspaper Znamaya, Bessarabets succeeded in provoking a pogrom in his native province of Bessavochia. In 1902, at Easter – always a favourite time for pogroms – Krushevan announced that a Christian youth, found dead in a well, was the victim of a Jewish ritual murder. That time he was unsuccessful, as the real murderer was quickly identified, but the following year, the murder of a boy at Dubossary enabled him to renew the charge, this time with success.

Krushevan also put it about that an imperial ukase (proclamation) had been issued permitting Christians "to execute bloody justice on the Jews during the three days of Easter." An agitator named Pronin published an article in Znamaya in which he praised the rioters as true patriots who defended the czar and Holy Russia against a fearsome international conspiracy.

Easter Sunday, April 6, 1903, coincided with the last day of Passover. At first, with their inhibitions loosened by alcohol, groups of murderers vandalized Jewish property, many Christian businessmen and homeowners marking their property with crosses to protect themselves. Because police refused to intervene to stop the rioting, and because the bishop blessed the Christian crowd as he usually did on this holy day, many in the crowd were even more convinced that the czar had given them three days to beat the Jews. And so they did.

The Kishinev pogrom began on Easter Sunday – the holiest day on the Orthodox Church's calendar – and lasted two full days.

By the time the violence ended, a total of 50 people were murdered. Forty-nine of the dead were Jews. Of these, 38 were men and boys and 11 were women and girls. The only Christian casualty was killed in a scuffle with drunken comrades.

An interesting outcome of the pogrom was that Theodor Herzl, the founder of Zionism, succeeded in helping Russian Jews emigrate. Herzl, who had called for the creation of Jewish nachtasyls (havens) throughout the world, had tried in vain for years to gain support from Russian statesmen or members of the imperial family for the emigration of Russian Jews. But in the wake of the Kishinev pogrom, thousands of Jews left the town and many more left other parts of Russia.

Other long-standing practices also contributed to the Kishinev pogrom. It has been shown repeatedly in Jewish history that when the government and Church in Christian Europe (the two most powerful institutions) discriminate against the Jews, they legitimize popular actions against Jews.

The slogan "Save Russia, beat the Jews" was well-received by many Orthodox Russians and Romanians, who were taught it from birth in their homes and churches. It was accepted as well by the government that the Jews were Christ-killing, child-murdering, blood-sucking villains who deserved whatever they got from the rioters.

The same social/political/psychological dynamics also can help "explain," dare one say it, the Holocaust. To borrow from the words of renowned French writer and scholar Jules Isaac, without the "teaching of contempt" and hatred for the Jews planted in the hearts of the multitude, crimes against them could never have been conceived.

It is no coincidence that legendary Hebrew poet Chaim Nachman Bialik's great poem on Kishinev seems to have been written in 1943 rather than 1903.

The Kishinev pogroms of 1903 (and 1905) deeply shocked the whole civilized world. On behalf of the Jewish Historical Commission in Odessa, Bialik went to Kishinev to interview survivors to prepare a report on the atrocity. Before leaving, he wrote On the Slaughter (Al hash'chitah), in which he called on Heaven either to exercise immediate justice or, if not, to destroy the world, rejecting with contempt mere vengeance, with the famous lines: "Who cries Revenge! Revenge! Accursed be he!/ Fit vengeance for the spilt blood of a child and/ The devil has not yet complied…/ No, let that blood pierce world's profundity,/ Through the great deep pursue its mordications,/ There eat its way in darkness, there undo,/ Undo the rotted earth's foundations!" (translated by A.M. Klein).

In 1904, Bialik wrote In the City of Slaughter, (Be'ir ha'aregah): "What is thy business here, O son of man?/ Rise, to the desert flee!/ The cup of affliction thither bear with thee!/ Take thou thy soul, rend it in many a shred!/ With impotent rage, thy heart deform!/ Thy tear upon the barren boulders shed!/ And send thy bitter cry into the storm!" (translated by A.M. Klein).

These lines are a searing denunciation of the Jewish people's meek submission to the massacre. Bialik is incensed at the cowardice of the Jews, bitter at the absence of justice and struck by the indifference of the world and of nature.

So 100 years later, remember Kishinev, remember stones overturned, remember dilapidated hearths.

Zachor! Remember!

Going home for a visit

My wife Lisa and I just returned from a family trip to Israel. On our departure, the woman checking us in at the airport surveyed our children and, after some hesitation, said "I hope you make it home OK." Being a rabbi, (and blessed with rabbinic telepathy), I knew what she was actually thinking: "What sort of a lunatic takes four little kids to a dangerous country like Israel?"

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Actually, the danger is exaggerated. Attacks on Israel receive disproportionate media attention, which distorts reality. The most dangerous part of our trip was when Uri, the cabbie who took us from the airport, drove at breakneck speed and tailgated while yammering on his cellphone. Indeed, statistically speaking, you are far more likely to die in a car accident in Israel (or Canada) than in a terrorist attack.

But I appreciate that it's reasonable to worry. Bombs and Scuds are remote, but genuine, possibilities. When we arrived, the Jerusalem Post had a full page ad with the headline "Are You Prepared," which advertised protective suits and gas masks. It reminded us that Israel constantly lives with the possibility of war.

This reality is distressing. An Israeli friend told us how her 11-year-old son, tired of conflict, wants to move to New Zealand, an isolated country without enemies. My own children, on their first visit to Israel, were touched by the conflict as well. At the Air Force Museum, my seven-year-old son asked: "Abba, why does Israel have so many enemies?" Living with this question is Israel's tragic burden.

So why did we go? We went to watch our children visit a school in Be'er Sheva and feel right at home in the classroom with their Israeli brothers and sisters. We went to meet the remarkable volunteers from ZAKA, who are available 24/7 to help at accident and terror scenes, administer first aid, and, if necessary, locate body parts for a proper burial. We, a group of 80 parents and children, went to express our solidarity with Israel.

Most importantly, we went because Israel is home. It was a pleasure to see our children discover Israel for the first time: Hebrew everywhere, kosher McDonald's restaurants, archeological sites. They visited Be'er Sheva, the city of Abraham and Sarah, and Jerusalem, the city of David and Solomon. Watching our children connect to the Kotel was a priceless experience.

When we arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport, I glanced at an ad. I don't remember much about it, except for the words "higatem habaytah"– "you've come home."

When I saw these words, my eyes began to tear, and I understood why we went. Israel is our home. It might seem crazy, but we had to take our children home for a visit.

U.S. win in Iraq unlikely to affect Mideast conflict

The overwhelming support of Israelis (more than 77 per cent) for the war against Iraq is no surprise, since Israel has long had a strategic interest in weakening Saddam Hussein. But it is a mistake to believe, as some Israelis do, that a victory in Iraq will create more favourable conditions in future negotiations with the Palestinians. Unlike the situation after the Gulf War of 1991, the present Israeli-Palestinian relationship is affected more by dynamics on the ground between the two communities.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The 1991 war left unfinished the business of disarming Iraq. However, in its aftermath, with a shaken Arab world and weakened PLO, former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin boldly seized what he viewed as a 10-year window of opportunity. He distinguished between the "first circle" of hostility to Israel – the countries along its borders (Egypt, Jordan, Syria and the Palestinians) – and the "second circle" – Iran and Iraq – which posed a potential nuclear threat. Rabin believed that within a decade, the threat to Israel from the "second circle" would resurface and therefore Israel should actively seek peace agreements with more "first circle" countries (former prime minister Menachem Begin had already signed a peace agreement with Egypt in 1979). This was the basis for his overtures to the Syrians and his acceptance of the Oslo accords for peace with the Palestinians.

Rabin may have been right in his 10-year analysis. While the 1991 war slowed Saddam down, it destroyed neither his capacity nor his designs. This time around, the United States wants to strike a decisive blow. But it is doing so in a region where Rabin's vision of peace between Israel and the "first circle" has been only partially achieved: although Israel signed a peace treaty with Jordan in 1994, negotiations with Syria were unsuccessful and Israel remains locked in conflict with the Palestinians.

That conflict adds significant tension to the atmosphere surrounding the war in Iraq. In extremist Palestinian circles, anti-Americanism is used to fuel vitriolic rhetoric and violent actions against Israel and any notion of peace.

And on the other side, Palestinian Authority President Arafat's abject failure to restrain extremist factions has strengthened Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's argument that links Israel's war against terror with that of the United States. As a result, Sharon has enjoyed virtually unbridled support from U.S. President George W. Bush. Some Israeli political and military leaders also believe that once Saddam is defeated, the Palestinians can be intimidated into making significant concessions to Israel.

But these arguments miss the central point. For Israelis and Palestinians locked in conflict, the issue is not the identity or actions of Iraq's ruler. For their own sake, Palestinians have to deal with reform of their regime, the failure of terrorism to advance their position, and the challenge posed by fundamentalist groups such as Hamas to the future of Palestinian society. And Israelis must deal effectively with their need to maintain security without continuing the burden of occupying three million Palestinians – also for their own sake.

American success in Iraq will again lessen Israel's vulnerability to "second circle" countries, and it will likely create atmospheric change in the region. However, victory is unlikely to significantly affect the substance of an Israeli-Palestinian deal. Too much has already happened. In spite of the failure of the Oslo process, by now, a majority of Israelis and Palestinians accept the concept of a Palestinian state alongside Israel in virtually all of the West Bank and Gaza. Moreover, the shock waves of 30 months of violence have had more impact on both societies than the war in Iraq.

Nevertheless, a victory in Iraq could affect the pace and process on the Israeli-Palestinian front. In an effort to garner support at a critical moment in the pre-war debate, Bush recently announced that he would soon turn his attention to the Palestinian issue. But the big question remains: in the days during and after Iraq, how much attention will Bush give to a conflict he has thus far relegated to the margins of his grander vision of war against "the axis of evil"? And if he does, will he do so from a position of greater strength or weakness? At least in the Middle East, history has shown that waging war is easier than making peace.

Needed: a Jewish al-Jazeera

Several years ago, I wrote a column that advocated setting up an international Jewish television station that would be available to subscribers worldwide. This was well before the beginning of the second intifadah, the latest Iraqi war and the emergence of Al-Jazeera as a respected force on the world media stage and in the homes of North American Arabs.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The time has come to renew the call. It was a good idea then, but it seems an absolute necessity now.

By my estimate, the annual cost would be millions of dollars. Al-Jazeera's annual budget is reportedly $30 million (US). A station run by Hezbollah costs $10 million. Costs could be partially defrayed through advertising and subscriptions. Such a high-quality station, with an accompanying Web site, could complement projects like Birthright Israel or Holocaust museums in securing the Jewish future.

Such an international Jewish television station should be available at least 12 hours a day. It would broadcast mainly in English, though certain shows might be in Hebrew and some other languages.

The idea is not to create a propaganda outlet for the Israeli government – though its representatives would be welcome – or for any single point of view on Jewish affairs. It should present a wide spectrum of opinion, as can be found on Kol Israel or in Jewish living rooms throughout North America.

Such a station seems indispensable for Jews, and indeed many others, who might want to see perspectives on world affairs not often presented on CNN, BBC and CBC.

Such a station could have two dimensions. The first might be a news and current affairs mandate, with a large focus on Israel and the Middle East. There could be room for reporting and discussion on political issues affecting Jews in North America and throughout the Diaspora. Jewish perspectives on issues ranging from war on Iraq and its fallout to globalization and cloning could be the subject of analysis and debate.

The station's second mandate could be cultural. It could include programming for children, as well as American sitcoms with a Jewish flavour or the best high-brow cinema, music and theatre with Jewish themes. There is a large inventory of material that could be rebroadcast, and the station could also run current Jewish content productions.

Programming would also have to be pluralistic, and indeed could work to break down barriers between Jews. And why not show international Israeli soccer or basketball matches?

In short, the station could be a combination Jewish CNN, PBS, Bravo and Family Channel. Programming would be flexible, as events warranted.

This could be accomplished if it became a collective project for our Jewish communal leadership.

There are many talented Jewish artists, broadcasters, journalists, and writers working in print, radio and television who could participate. The station could also give a boost to younger creators with innovative ideas. And there are a large number of Jewish philanthropists, many with media experience and savvy, who could help with funding and organization.

There is enough of an English-speaking market in North America, Israel and the rest of the Diaspora to sustain the project. And many non-Jews will also watch, just as many tune in, both deliberately and by accident, to local Jewish cable shows.

Such a station might have to be headquartered in New York City. But Canadian Jews would be well placed to play key roles. The Canadian Jewish community is, on a per capita basis, far more Jewishly identified than the American one. One can easily imagine a diverse cast of Canadian Jews– from A to Z, Asper to Znaimer – playing roles in such a project.

There are clouds on the Jewish horizon. The seductions of cultural assimilation continue, while events in the Middle East have given a renewed impetus to anti-Semitism. This is not homegrown Canadian anti-Semitism nurtured by Prairie populism à la Social Credit, or French Catholicism in Quebec à la Lionel Groulx, or upper class WASP snobbery. Today's anti-Semitism is international in scope, fuelled by the Internet and by influential subgroups within immigrant minorities who wish Israel, and perhaps Jews, ill. This new virtual dimension of geo-political struggle requires a sophisticated response that can sustain Jews in the years ahead.

So strike the committee.

If not now, when?

The Kirshner File

Europe's interest in virtual Jewish culture

At a recent international klezmer festival in Fuerth, Germany – the birthplace of Henry Kissinger, the former U.S. secretary of state – one of the featured bands was Sukke, which is based in Berlin. None of its four members were Jewish, and few Jews were sighted in the audience, according to a story in the Jewish Chronicle of London.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Ruth Ellen Gruber, an American journalist living in Europe, would not find that strange. Nearly 60 years after the Holocaust, Jewish culture, often marginalized, repressed or forgotten after World War II, has become a viable component of the public domain in countries once occupied by the Nazis.

This philo-Semitic phenomenon, in which Jewish music, literature and history are increasingly recognized and cherished in nations where Jews are all but invisible, is the subject of Gruber's fascinating and important book, Virtually Jewish: Reinventing Jewish Culture in Europe, published earlier this year by the University of California Press. From Cluj in Romania to Krakow in Poland, Jewish festivals, exhibitions and workshops of all types abound, while readings, lectures, seminars, talk shows and films spotlight Jewish issues.

In league with these developments, private volunteers and civic organizations have renovated abandoned Jewish cemeteries and placed plaques on empty synagogues, new Jewish museums have opened, often in towns where Jews have not lived for decades and thousands of new books on Jewish topics have been printed in local languages.

At the same time, decrepit Jewish residential quarters have been restored, Jewish-style restaurants and cafes with Jewish-sounding names have appeared, and kiosks, shops and markets have popped up – all designed to cater to prosperous tourists.

Gruber, who has written on Jewish subjects before, believes that this phenomenon – which coexists with widespread ignorance of Jews, flareups of anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial – is fraught with complexity and is not just a passing fad.

It reflects, she thinks, a "third-generation" syndrome: the desire to discover and appropriate knowledge withheld, denied or ignored by older generations.

"Memory – memory of Jews – is employed as a vehicle for self-discovery and self-exploration," she observes.

Various degrees of philo-Semitism – an idealization of Jews, sometimes linked to guilt or uneasiness about the Holocaust, and a fascination with exotica – play a role, as does a sense of nostalgia.

As she sees it, changing conditions and postwar catalysts are at the root of the non-Jewish embrace of this intriguing phenomenon.

Gruber cites a host of variables: the attempt by the 1960s student generation to confront the past, the Vietnam-era protests and political groupings, the Vatican's efforts to atone for anti-Semitism and improve relations with Jews, the general revival of interest in lost traditions and veiled history, the Eichmann trial, the Six-Day War, the role of Israel on the world stage, the collapse of Communist regimes and the end of the Cold War.

Not too surprisingly, perhaps, this phenomenon is most evident in Germany, which conceived, planned and implemented the Holocaust. But there are skeptics. Gruber quotes Rafael Seligmann, a Jewish writer in Germany, as saying: "Don't many of the German philo-Semites resemble butterfly collectors, who have great affection for and a lively interest in the objects of their benevolence, and know a great deal about them, but can deal with them best when they are already preserved – dead, in other words?"

One can readily understand this attitude, but skepticism is not the undercurrent that runs through Gruber's illuminating study. In Virtually Jewish, she illustrates the myriad ways in which Christians, for whatever reason, have adopted and enacted Jewish culture.

In Prague, she profiles a local rock group, Shalom, whose leader, Petr Muk, wears a kippah onstage and claims to be studying Judaism. Trying to plumb his motives, Gruber says that, in the wake of the fall of Czech communism, things Jewish were perceived as potent symbols of post-Communist freedoms and counterculture.

Gruber interviews Milan Kundera, the Czech writer, who voices a kind of nostalgia for the pre-war Jewish community: "Aliens everywhere and everywhere at home, lifted above national quarrels, the Jews in the 20th century were the principal cosmopolitan, integrating element in Central Europe."

In Bavaria, Gruber meets Gisella Blume, a German woman who volunteered to clean up, document and photograph the 6,500 tombstones in Fuerth's historic Jewish cemetery. Blume tells her how the project has changed her life.

Travelling through Austria, which was annexed by Germany in 1938, Gruber describes the manner in which scores of cities and towns have reclaimed and exhibited long-submerged local Jewish history. She refers to this process, an intellectual and emotional rendez-vous with the past, as "Jewish archeology." It enables Austrians to "set things right" and "fill in the blanks."

Gruber spills a considerable amount of ink, justly so, on the Festival of Jewish Culture in Kazimierz, Krakow's old Jewish quarter. The festival was founded by two Polish intellectuals, Janusz Makuch and Krzysztof Gierat, as Poland's Communist government was in its death throes. Gruber, in passing, takes note of the fact that the festival was proceeded by "a renaissance of interest in the Jewish question" in Poland.

Ruth Ellen Gruber

Makuch feels he has a mission to bring Jewish artists to a country where approximately three million Jews were murdered between 1939 and 1945. It is both a means of honouring the dead and underlining the durability of the Jewish people in the face of immense adversity.

Gruber also writes about two dedicated Poles – Tomasz Wisniewski, a journalist from Bialystok who publishes guidebooks about Jewish heritage sites in and around his home, and Monika Krajewska, a photographer from Warsaw who photographs Jewish cemeteries. Neither of them – both began their work before the collapse of communism – received help or encouragement from local authorities.

By Gruber's reckoning, the care of and research of Jewish monuments in Poland during the communist period was often the pasttime of isolated individuals. Their activities frequently became a subtle means of expressing opposition to communism, especially after the 1968 anti-Zionist campaign. Wisniewski tells Gruber that the reintegration of the Jewish component in Poland was an indirect method of building democracy and a tolerant society.

For the first three decades after the war, a number of synagogues were restored or converted into museums, libraries and concert halls. But usually, shuls were left in a derelict state, used as warehouses and workshops, or simply razed. Of late, she suggests, the movement to preserve synagogues has taken hold.

To no one's surprise, the tourist trade has become part and parcel of the recovery of Jewish heritage. Since the late 1980s, a blizzard of Jewish guides, brochures, pamphlets and maps, some published by tourist boards in Poland, Germany, Austria, France, the Czech Republic and other countries, have suddenly appeared. This converged with or preceded the growth of Jewish tourism to heretofore shunned destinations like Poland. Tourism by Jews, especially Israelis, was particularly encouraged by the Communist government after the establishment of low-level diplomatic relations with Israel in 1986.

"Holocaust" tours, such as the March of the Living, became a standard forum for educating Jewish youth. Gruber takes a jaundiced view of these tours. As she puts it: "The themes of destruction and redemption were hammered firmly home, along with… what could only be described as Jewish triumphalism. Contemporary Poles were branded responsible for Nazi crimes and sometimes help up to derision. Poland was represented as a vast Jewish graveyard, and nothing more; a place to weep, mourn, disdain and then leave."

Gruber regards Jewish museums as useful institutions for presenting, representing and interpreting Jewish history. But they must not forget to address the dark corners of European civilization: the persecution of Jews.

Klezmer music, in her opinion, has been a vital avenue for Christians to explore Jewish culture. Scores of klezmer bands and Yiddish music groups have sprung up in Germany, and others have emerged in Holland, Switzerland, Scandinavia, Hungary, Poland, Italy and elsewhere. This, in turn, has spawned a plethora of klezmer workshops, festivals and societies.

Gruber realizes that this current interest in things Jewish is not without its pitfalls. Philo-Semitism and anti-Semitism can be sides of the same coin, and it is easier dealing with dead Jews than with living ones. Furthermore, virtual Jewish cultural products may displace real Jewish culture. Yet, she believes, it may serve as a means of demythologizing Jews and creating more open and tolerant societies.

Computer Kids

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
בתי הלמוד התורה המאוחדים בטורונטו

In the hands of a great teacher, today's computer is like yesterday's chalkboard. From Junior Kindergarten to Grade 8, computers are a vital teaching tool. We teach the children to use specially selected hardware and software. We encourage them to use the in-class computers to write an essay, create a graph, analyze data, or create an entire presentation. We teach "safe surfing", and how to use the internet as a research tool. In the computer lab, middle school students work on complex projects and learn advanced applications, preparing for the rigors of high school and university. Our integrated approach to computer education pays off.

Promoting a pro-Israel agenda

By DARCIE RICHLER

Israel advocacy presents many different challenges. While some are a result of obviously hostile and inherently anti-Israel outlooks, many stem from ignorance and the belief in half-truths. It is important to be able to deal with this second type of challenge, because it offers a real prospect of shifting someone's understanding of the Middle East and the Arab-Israel conflict.

When reading the following scenario, consider which answer most directly promotes Israel, in addition to responding to the question.

You are at work and discussing the Middle East and the current war in Iraq over lunch with colleagues. One turns to you and says: "Israel's illegal occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is a violation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 242. Why does Iraq have to adhere to UN resolutions while Israel does not? Is there one law for the rest of the world and another for Israel?"

Assuming you don't know that Resolution 242 is a Security Council recommendation that calls for negotiations based on a formula of "land for peace" while the resolutions on Iraq are binding and require unilateral compliance, what would be the best response?

A) Israel is not occupying any land illegally. Israel has a right to secure borders, and that is clearly stipulated in Resolution 242, which says Israel need not withdraw from land it has held since 1967 until it gains full recognition from the Arab world and secure and defensible borders.

B) Israel is the only legitimate democracy in the Middle East. There is no comparison between Israel, which promotes peace, freedom of expression, freedom of religion etc., and Iraq, which promotes terrorism, violence against its citizens and fear among those who live in the region. The world's response to a legitimate democracy should be fundamentally different than its response to a rogue regime.

C) Israel, like every other legitimate democracy, has a right to defend itself. It is also the only country in the Middle East that is constantly fighting for its survival. The Security Council resolutions on Israel reflect that reality and don't call for unilateral Israeli actions.

Ideally, choosing "B" would bring about the most successful results. The goal in advocacy is to send out key messages that resonate with a target audience. As well, one should never feel pressured to limit a response to the narrow issue being discussed. While "A" and "C" are both true, they also allow the agenda to be controlled by the other side. One might be unfamiliar with Resolution 242, but, as noted above, it is not necessary to delve into the legalities of it in order to respond to the original comment. The point is to find the better answer, which in this case is rejecting any comparison between Israel and Iraq.

It is also important to stick to key messages. Israel is the only legitimate democracy in the Middle East. Israel is also the only country in the region where women are treated equally, multiculturalism is promoted and gays don't live in fear of being tortured or murdered. Like Canada, Israel has advanced tremendously in fields such as science and technology, the environment, medicine and education.

The particular argument examined here is especially pertinent given current developments. It is likely that this type of issue will come up in newspaper articles, radio debates and everyday conversation. It is therefore important to find ways to keep Israel out of the Iraq debate. To learn more, see http://www.cicweb.ca/publications/CICInsider/vol3/no2/index.shtml.

Finding appropriate answers and strategies takes time and practice. Local Israel Action Team (LIAT) workshops place a strong emphasis on effective answers and arguments. If you would like to join a new LIAT in your city, please contact me at dr@cicweb.ca. It would also be interesting to hear about how you would deal with a given scenario. Feel free to send in your possible responses. If you want to learn more about Resolution 242 or other Israel-related issues, visit www.cicweb.ca.

The balance at the table

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Passover comes in two short weeks and many people have already begun their preparations. Some of the holiday's themes – freedom, redemption and escape from oppression – are very relevant in today's world. But interestingly, with all these complex issues weaving into the holiday, there is still a strong emphasis placed on children and their participation in Passover.

The Talmud tells us that on the eve of Passover, Rabbi Akiva would leave the house of study at an early hour so he could conduct his seder at a time when his children were still awake. Certainly we know of the Four Questions that are asked by the youngest child and of the many symbolic foods on the table that are shown and explained to the children. Through these explanations, we are able to bridge between the concrete and the abstract so that the children are able to connect and experience as much as possible.

The bitter herbs are not merely vegetables but a bridge to the understanding of despair. Children can well relate to the salty taste of tears, and through the salt water on the table will understand that tears tasted the same thousands of years ago. And children can relate to the concept of slavery: their daily routines are so orchestrated by adult authorities that they are even told by their teachers when they may visit the washroom. If children can connect so easily with these overall concepts, why do we go to such lengths to involve them on both a concrete and abstract level?

When looking closely at the involvement of the children, it becomes clear it is not the issue of slavery that is central to our instruction, but rather the issue of freedom. The movement from slavery to freedom is a difficult one both on the concrete and the abstract levels. When a slave has received provisions from the master, the practical question of feeding himself becomes an issue of freedom. When a person has had their thoughts controlled, the question of liberating that mind is an issue of freedom. We know that the transition from slavery to freedom often takes a generation to complete.

At the seder table, we are educating our children to be free. They must ask questions and we challenge them to inquire and teach them to think as free individuals. Yet we also challenge them to connect with the suffering that preceded the freedom.

Tears taste of salt, whether they are your tears or someone else's. The power of freedom must be balanced with the attribute of compassion, so that we do not omit the element of suffering.

In today's world, children watch movies and play video games that are filled with violence and can easily desensitize them to human suffering. They must be told that we reduce the wine in our cups when we list the plagues because even the suffering of our enemy is suffering nonetheless – we reduce our joy.

The midrash tells us that we only say a full Hallel on the first day of Passover and not throughout the holiday because the Egyptians died, and we are not to rejoice in the face of human suffering. As we educate our children to be free thinkers and responsible Jews, we must not forget to dip the vegetable in the salty water and as they taste ancient tears, we must talk to them of the power of compassion.

Jewish Life

Jewish genetic disorders, pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began our look at the information on Jewish genetic disorders on the Internet. Today, how to find information about genetic diseases more common among Jewish communities.

Once again, a caution that the Internet should not be considered a substitute for professional medical advice.

The best place to start is at the National Foundation for Jewish Genetic Diseases' Web site [http://www.nfjgd.org/]. The foundation has supplied online information and Web links about genetic diseases more common among Jews, such as Bloom's syndrome, Canavan disease, familial dysautonomia, fanconia anemia, Gaucher disease, mucolipidosis IV, Niemann Pick disease, Tay-Sachs disease and torsion dystonia. You can find links to specialized sites dedicated to those illnesses at [http://www.nfjgd.org/internet.shtml]. (I will devote a future article to Jewish genetics, cancer and the Internet.)

Several universities and medical centres have established divisions that specialize in Jewish genetic diseases, such as the Albert Einstein Healthcare Network [http://www.einstein.edu/jewishgenetics/], the Jewish genetic disorders program at Children's Memorial Hospital in Chicago [http://jewishgenetics.org/] and the Center for the Study and Treatment of Jewish Genetic Diseases at the University of Pittsburgh. [http://www.pitt.edu/~geneorb/ctr-jewish.html] Their sites all provide helpful information, as does the Mazornet Guide to Jewish Genetic Diseases. [http://mazornet.com/genetics/]

Less known than Tay-Sachs or Canavan disease is the connection between schizophrenia and the Jewish community. [http://www.hopkinsmedicine.org/epigen/ashkenazim.htm] The Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine wants to identify the susceptibility to schizophrenia among Ashkenazi Jews and develop new treatments.

Why study Ashkenazim? The site explains that "Jewish individuals are in a unique position to assist scientists in understanding genetic disorders. Due to a long history of marriage within the faith, which extends back thousands of years, the Jewish community has emerged from a limited number of ancestors and has a similar genetic makeup. This allows researchers to more easily perform genetic studies and locate disease causing genes." The site explains that the risks for schizophrenia and bipolar disorder are about 1 per cent for any population, but some studies have suggested an increased risk in the Jewish population, although those studies have not been adequately substantiated at this time.

Sephardi Jews also carry genetic disorders, but as Dr. Gideon Bach of Jerusalem's Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center explains, the way these diseases appear is quite different than in the Ashkenazi population. "The high-frequency genetic disorders specific to Ashkenazim are different from those of the surrounding populations [e.g., Poles or Germans]. Sephardim, however, tend to share hereditary diseases with their host population. This is believed to result not from intermarriage, but from natural selection. Kurds and Kurdish Jews, for example, have a genetic predisposition toward thalassemia, an inherited blood disorder. Crippling though thalassemia can be, it protects healthy carriers against a severe form of malaria, and may thus have been genetically selected." [http://www.hadassah.org.il/news/jewish-gen-disease-had0101.htm]

Once you have read through all the Web sites, you may want to make a personal connection. An excellent way to learn more about a rare Jewish disease is by meeting others facing similar challenges. You can join that worldwide community through e-mail lists such as the Genetic Disease E-Mail-Discussion List [http://www.gaucherdisease.org/list.htm]. You must supply your name to join the list, but the information will be kept confidential.

Hopefully, the genetic links that join people from around the world will be better understood thanks to links created by the Internet.

Halachah: on whose authority?

By RABBI EDWARD ELKIN

The Torah portion we read this week, Tazria, deals with the subject of ritual impurities, and in particular the impurities that arise from various afflictions of the skin. This material may seem very remote from our own experience, and indeed it was already out of practical use in the time of the rabbis, when the Temple had been destroyed and the system of purity and impurity described in the parshah had fallen away with the end of the sacrificial service.

Yet for the rabbis, all material in the Torah is relevant, if one looks closely enough and studies hard enough, because it is all part of God's eternal revelation to the people of Israel.

The Talmudic rabbis tell a fascinating story pertaining to the material in this parshah. The premise of the story is that just as there are yeshivot here on earth where rabbis and scholars debate issues of Jewish law, so too is there a yeshiva in heaven where such debates are engaged.

It seems that the sages in the Heavenly Academy, and God as well, were having an argument over a particular point of Jewish law related to the diagnosis of skin afflictions. In a case of doubt, God says that the person in question should be declared "clean." However, all the other sages in the Heavenly Academy declare that that person should be declared "unclean."

The question then arises: in a case where there is a dispute between God and the sages of the Heavenly Academy, who decides what is to be the law?

Well, it seems that there was a sage named Rabbah bar Nahmani who was particularly expert in the diagnosis of skin afflictions. And so, a messenger was dispatched to bring this Rabbah bar Nahmani up to heaven to resolve the dispute between God and the sages.

This image portrayed in this story is extraordinarily daring. God, of course, gave the law and authored the Torah from which it was taken. How could any human authority understand the law better than God? And yet that is the fancy of this story.

What could the rabbis have intended by portraying God as deferring to the legal knowledge of a human authority?

We often assume that the purpose of Jewish jurisprudence is to study Jewish texts in order to uncover God's will for us in a particular instance. But in this Talmudic story at least, the rabbis were saying that the purpose of studying Jewish law in a particular instance is not to discern God's will. God has the divine point of view, but we've got our human point of view. We arrive at it through our very human processes of study and deliberation and reflection and prayer. And in the end, it's our human point of view that is given the authority to determine the law. This chutzpahdik story validates the authority of the human partner in the covenant between God and the people of Israel.

This story gives rise to an important question: can we extrapolate from an Aggadic account pertaining to the extremely esoteric branch of Jewish law found in parshat Tazria and apply its message to other areas of Jewish life? Did such extraordinary authority as attributed to Rabbah bar Nahmani exist only for rabbis of the Talmudic period, or does it extend to today?

Would the vision of halachic decision-making in this story, if applied in our own time, undermine halachah, because it removes the confidence that what rabbis decide is what God necessarily wanted? Or would it strengthen halachah by empowering contemporary rabbis to deal with new situations as they arise, with the confidence that the authority to determine the law really is theirs?

The Israel Mall

An estimated 30,000 shoppers visited last week's Israel Mall at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. The four-day event featured jewelry, food, flowers, clothing and art from more than 75 Israeli vendors whose businesses have suffered because of Palestinian terrorism. At least 500 local volunteers participated. Among them were Gitel Rosensweig, top right, displaying travel candlesticks for Shabbat, and Becky Wener, bottom row, with necklace. Vendor Itzik Zadok of Jerusalem discusses his silver and gold-plated giftware with Loretta Grammer, top row, centre. Two rooms of art included work by Haifa-born Yuval Mahler.

Eilat leaders visit Toronto to share ideas with twinned city

Eight men and women from Israel's Eilat/Eilot region arrived in Toronto — Eilat's twinned city — over the weekend excited to meet with their Toronto counterparts.

The visit was made possible by UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 Program (P2K), introduced in 1987 by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA's overseas' partner.

Partnership 2000 directs a portion of funds raised through UJA Federation's annual campaign toward educational, social and therapeutic projects in Eilat/Eilot. P2K also represents the concept of Gesher Chai (a "living bridge") designed to develop connections between the people of Eilat/Eilot and Toronto's Jewish community.

"Toronto is such a wonderful city in the Diaspora with such a strong Jewish community, and I want our people to see how it works so well," says Chagit Shilo, JAFI's assistant regional director who is leading this visit. "What we really want to see is how Toronto's Jewish community is organized and how it functions so well within a multicultural city."

Members of the contingent, all between the ages of 25 and 45, have been given an extensive tour of Jewish Toronto, including a visit to the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto

"It's hard to describe the unique bond we feel with the incredible people of Eilat," says Karen Goldstein, Chair, Toronto's P2K Young Leadership. "We're thrilled and excited to host them again."

"I was very excited to come back to Toronto and be greeted by our wonderful Young Leadership friends here," says participant Cochi Zani, 42. "We look forward to building and developing many programs, including a new museum in Eilat, with the help of Toronto's incredible Jewish community."

'Let your children visit Israel,' urges CD-ROM

A new CD-ROM produced by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) is encouraging young people to visit Israel.

"We are certain that it is possible to overcome parents' fears. Within the past two years some 50,000 young people, primarily students, have visited on birthright israel and other programs," says Zvi Lev-Ran, Director of the Jewish Experience of Israel Project.

Recent birthright israel participants

"I think this CD is a great idea, I'd go back to Israel in a heartbeat," says Torontonian, Josef Rogovsky, 27, a member of a recent birthright israel contingent, who made a subsequent trip on his own. "I've never felt threatened in Israel," he says. "When you are there, you just need to ask the people working in hotels where to go."

The new CD includes video clips that show various programs from the point of view of parents, young people, and experts; and information on the Web site www.israelexperience.com.

Groups of parents from the U.S. have recently started to come to Israel on "pre-trips" before sending their children on Jewish Agency summer programs. The parents followed the same itinerary as the one designed for their children and expressed their complete satisfaction with security measures taken.

'Faith-lift' for the BJCC

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) recently hired a new Jewish educator in an attempt to enhance "all things Jewish" in the facility.

Ilana Heimlich, a 26-year old part-time history and geography teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), began her quest at the BJCC in the summer of 2002.

"The idea is to enhance and improve the overall feeling of Jewishness at the Centre," says Heimlich, a graduate of CHAT. "We want the BJCC to be, first and foremost, a Jewish community centre, and not only a community centre for Jews."

Currently, items on her "to do" list include changing the aesthetics inside the building, by adding signs in Hebrew to complement English ones, and placing inspirational Jewish messages throughout the Centre, each one connecting an activity with a Jewish value.

"There will definitely be sayings near the athletic facilities," she says. "After all, it's considered a mitzvah to take care of one's body."

It hasn't taken long for members of the BJCC and the Jewish community to notice some of the fruits of Heimlich's labour. There were, for example, megillah readings at the BJCC every two hours this Purim.

"You could see people were excited," says Heimlich. "Many of them were telling me how nice it was to feel like they were in a real haymish place."

An upcoming program will see new mezuzot being rededicated in several locations around the Centre with the covers designed by Ilana's volunteers as well as those involved in the Koffler Centre's art classes.

"It's a great way to not only beautify the BJCC and give it a new sense of Jewishness," says Heimlich, "but it's a great way to teach the kids – especially those not attending Jewish day schools about Jewish traditions and meanings."

Heimlich is proud of her Jewish Community Service Project, established to provide youth with a Jewish environment in which they can complete Ontario Ministry of Education mandated community service hours, while, at the same time, enhancing life within the JCC. The project recently received a UJA Federation continuity grant.

"It's really not about their mandated hours," says Heimlich, "it's about bringing these kids to the BJCC to infuse the place with a new wave of Judaism and excitement."

"You want to complete the work even if it goes beyond the 18 hours because you feel a sense of responsibility to the group and what you are doing," says Sabrina Hinitz, one of Heimlich's volunteers, and a grade nine student at CHAT. "It's not just for community service hours, it's for what you get out of it. By bettering someone else's life you better yourself."

UJA Federation's Global Jewish Action Plan

As the economic and social service emergency facing Israel continues, and as anti-Semitism in the form of hateful anti-Israel rhetoric spreads, UJA Federation is mounting an urgent campaign for Israel and the Jewish people. Campaign 2004 is no less than a Global Jewish Action Plan. In this in-depth interview, Campaign 2004 Chairs Allan Silber and Richard Venn and Barbara Bregman, the Chair of UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy, reveal the disturbing issues faced by Jews everywhere in an insecure world and how UJA Federation is dealing with them.

Q What are the key issues for Campaign 2004?

RICHARD: "Firstly, we must sustain our support for Israel in its ongoing crisis, through financial assistance to victims of terror and for Israel's hard-pressed social service infrastructure. Secondly, we must address the need – domestically as well as globally – to combat a rising tide of virulent anti-Israel sentiment, which is often tinged with anti-Semitism. Finally, we must recognize the impact of what's going on in Israel, as well as the worldwide resurgence of anti-Semitism, on a new Jewish generation and give members of this generation the tools to deal with it."

ALLAN: "We are living in such a changing and precarious world, fraught with insecurity for Jews. Anti-Semitism is spreading and, in many circles, including some diplomatic forums, it has become common to question Israel's legitimacy as a sovereign state. As its economy continues to deteriorate, Israel is now faced with having to cut $4 billion from social services to support defense. These proposed cuts include laying off 6,000 teachers and unprecedented decreases in the aliyah and absorption budgets. We, as Jews, must understand these troubling new realities and support Israel, as never before."

BARBARA: "My goal, as Chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, is to contribute as much as possible to the general campaign, to show strength and commitment. Anti-Semitism, often disguised as anti-Zionism, is on the rise again, especially on our university and college campuses. We must do everything we can to educate our students in order to provide them with the tools to counter this dangerous rhetoric."

Q How have you prepared yourself to be part of North America's third largest UJA Campaign?

ALLAN: "To prepare yourself for something you feel so passionately about is easier than you'd expect. Campaign 2004 is really a Global Jewish Action Plan — a Campaign for the Jewish People — in a troubled world. A successful campaign will benefit Jews everywhere and the State of Israel, which is central to Jewish life, in every corner of the globe. Although there will be some learning on the job, my deep belief in the need for UJA Federation to deal with the world's disturbing new realities fuels my passion for this position."

RICHARD: "We are inundated through personal experiences — as well as through the media — with the crisis confronting our community and the needs that Campaign 2004 must address. There's no doubt that I'm in the midst of a learning curve as I prepare for Campaign 2004. However, I am very fortunate to have a superb, excited, passionate partner in Allan Silber and an extraordinary team of volunteers and staff with me. There are so many motivated volunteers who continue to, year-after-year, contribute their strong and unwavering support for the UJA Campaign. First and foremost, the extraordinary generosity of UJA Federation's leading donors offers a strong sense of motivation for me."

BARBARA: "It's an honour to hold this position although it's not really a job that you can actually prepare yourself for. Aside from Richard and Allan, I will be surrounded by countless UJA professionals and volunteers — all of whom share the same passion and ultimate vision for Campaign 2004."

Q What is it about your background that has motivated you to take on this tremendous responsibility?

RICHARD: "Our freedom, our way of life, our very existence is being threatened. I lost a large part of my family in the Holocaust. We were too complacent then. The similarities are too striking. Our children treasure the Jewish values and traditions we have given them. Can there be any more crucial responsibility than this?

ALLAN: "As a child of Holocaust survivors, I understand the urgency of fighting for Israel's survival and the survival of the Jewish people. I bring to this position all of the Jewish values, transmitted to me by parents, which I see every day at UJA Federation. I consider it an honour to be involved."

BARBARA: "The obvious reason for taking this job is my commitment to Israel and the Jewish community. I also wanted to be a role model for my son and my three daughters. It's a way to get the whole family involved. Another reason is that I am a very goal-oriented person. I like to set goals and develop a game plan for reaching those goals."

Q How would you respond to someone who asks you: 'Why should I support the UJA Federation Campaign?'

ALLAN: "As Jews, I see little choice but to support this Campaign — this year — more than ever before. The issues are clear both at home and abroad. The number of anti-Semitic incidents in our own community is rising and anti-Israel sentiment is sweeping across local college campuses. Through UJA Federation Campaign 2004, our community members have an exceptional opportunity to do something about these dangerous developments and help so many Jews in need here in Toronto and around the world."

RICHARD: "The UJA Federation Annual Campaign helps to sustain Israel and Jews in need everywhere. Therefore, with that much responsibility, the UJA Federation Annual Campaign must be the cornerstone —the top priority — of giving within the Jewish community."

BARBARA: "There are some critical issues facing our local community, facing Israel and facing the world today. And the UJA Federation campaign allows donors to help resolve these urgent issues. You can't be complacent and lazy and simply hope that someone else will do it. It's up to all of us to make a difference."

Shalom downplays Israel's involvement in war

Israel is determined to maintain a low profile in the Iraq war, according to Israel's new Foreign Minister, Silvan Shalom.

In a briefing, sponsored by United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization for North American Jewish Federations and the Jewish Council on Public Affairs, Shalom cited both reduced danger to Israel from the war in Iraq and complete preparedness by Israel for any eventuality.

"One the one hand, there are a lot of dangerous things about Saddam Hussein, and we know we can be affected by attacks," he said. "But on the other hand, we want to keep a low profile … I'm not saying that we are completely out of this war, but each day that we stay out of it minimizes our chances of being involved."

Shalom also expressed complete support for the American war effort and Israeli hopes for a quick coalition victory. "Saddam Hussein is known for his cruelty. The way the Americans are handling it is to help us have a better world," he said.

In response to a question about protests against the U.S. and Israel on the streets of Amman, the capital of Jordan, Shalom assessed King Abdullah's regime as stable and noted the contrasts between Jordan's attitude toward Iraq now and 12 years ago.

Jewish Agency-sponsored students in Israel learn how to wear gas masks.

"Jordanians have changed their attitude," he observed. "In '91, they were the only country to support Hussein. Now, they are siding with the Americans … These kinds of demonstrations are happening in other Arab countries as well. We understand it, but we don't think it will destabilize the Jordanian regime."

Baranovski trial resumes

After weeks of delay, the trial of the three young men charged in connection with the death of Dmitri "Maiti" Baranovski resumed last week in a Toronto court, as young witnesses described the awful events the night the Russian teen was beaten to death.

Dmitri Korabline, now 18, testified he was frisked, threatened and robbed by five unidentified young men on the night of Nov. 14, 1999, while sitting with friends on a picnic bench in G. Ross Lord Park.

Korabline told the court he was asked for a cigarette and when he offered one, someone grabbed his pack. He was also asked for money and drugs and when he said he didn't have any, he was told that if he was lying he'd be killed.

Recounting the incident, Korabline said one of the men stated, "'If you're lying to me, I'll kill you' or something like that."

Korabline was the fourth youth to testify at the trial.

In its opening address, the Crown said the evidence would show Baranovski, then 15, was killed after he spoke up when a group of thugs demanded cigarettes and money from another group of teenagers hanging out in the north Toronto park.

Crown attorney Michael Blain said evidence will show Baranovski was kicked and beaten and that one of the blows was fatal, causing his head to extend and rotate, bursting an artery in his neck.

Korabline said that while he couldn't remember the exact words that were used by those threatening him, the word "kill" was used.

"I was threatened and I was searched," he said. Korabline said if he didn't co-operate, a fight would have resulted. He said he left the park immediately after the incident and didn't know Baranovski was killed until the next day.

Korabline said he could not identify the people who threatened him.

So far, none of the Crown's initial witnesses have been unable to identify the people who threatened them. Korabline described one as having medium build, wearing a black hat and jeans tucked into his socks.

Dmitri Lebedev, the second witness to testify, said he left the park to report the robbery of cigarettes after seeing Baranovski pushed to the ground. Lebedev, who was 17 at the time, said he called police and later saw another friend running from the park, saying an ambulance was needed for Baranovski. He testified he then saw Baranovski lying motionless on the ground, unconscious and bleeding.

Lebedev said he could remember a few details of the men who attacked Baranovski. One was tall with a bandanna over part of his face and the other was shorter and stockier with a black leather jacket and a black hat. But he wasn't able to identify anyone in police photo lineups a few months later.

Other early witnesses also testified they couldn't identify the three accused men in photo lineups while the first witness, Alex Grinevitch, said he was behind some bushes nearby and could not identify anyone involved in the fatal attack.

Charged with second degree murder in connection with Baranovski's death are Daniel Weiz, 22, William Cochrane and Meir Mariani, both 20. All have pleaded not guilty.

Israel comes to Toronto

"The Israel Now Consortium is so proud to be involved in this important endeavour. The long hours and considerable resources were all worth it when you see the smiles on the faces of the merchants and customers."

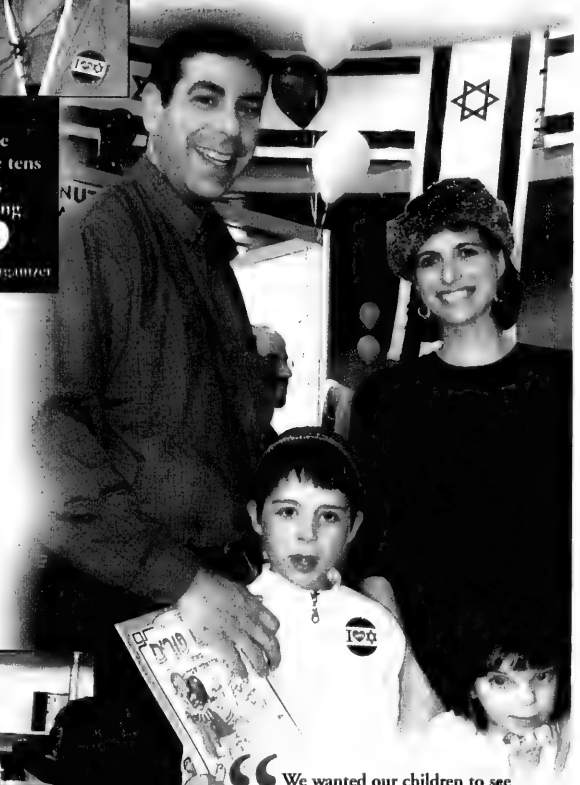
— Dani Fine, Israel Now Consortium

"The merchants are so grateful for everyone involved – from the countless volunteers to the tens of thousands of customers who have taken this opportunity to once again prove Toronto's strong emotional bond with the people of Israel."

— Izzy Kaplan, Mall organizer

"The show of support from Toronto's Jewish community has been absolutely tremendous. The Israeli merchants are very encouraged by what they see."

— Anne Maurer, Mall organizer



Mall welcomes record crowd

Over 30,000 people shopped for some of Israel's finest goods last week at the second annual Israel Mall, a project of UJA Federation's Israel Now Consortium, the Toronto Zionist Council, State of Israel Bonds, and the Israel Economic Mission to Canada.

More than 75 Israeli vendors displayed their wares at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Merchants and shoppers alike were enthusiastic as a constant stream of buyers chatted with the Israelis and, more importantly, went home with bags of goodies. The Mall was critical to Israeli merchants whose businesses have suffered with declining tourism.

An extensive variety of products was on hand during the four-day shopping spree, including giftware and foods for Passover, ceramic and wood Judaica, books, skin-care products, art, jewellery, and architectural glass pieces.

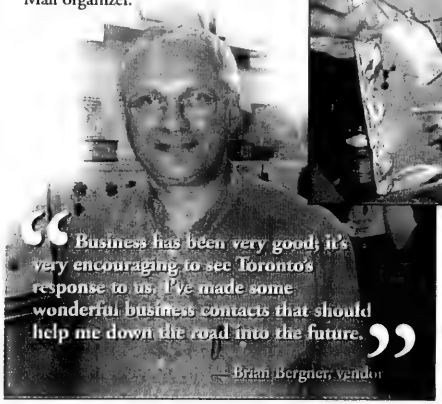
"This is the second Israel Mall I've been involved with, and I'm already eager to start work on the third one, which will be coming to Toronto soon," said Eli Poch, a Mall organizer.

"Merchants in Israel today are having a very hard time and Toronto, like any good family, has come to us to offer help when we need it. Thank you Toronto."

— Osnat Reich, vendor

"We wanted our children to see the importance of Eretz Israel to us, particularly in a time such as this. Also, since it's almost Pesach and we need to buy some things, it's very important now to buy Israeli."

— Etan & Judy Diamond, with their children Eli, 5, and Shira, 3



"Business has been very good; it's very encouraging to see Toronto's response to us. I've made some wonderful business contacts that should help me down the road into the future."

— Brian Bergner, vendor

Canadian rabbis express solidarity with French Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

On a recent trip to Paris, Rabbi Lionel Moses of Montreal and an American colleague conducted an experiment. In the wake of a widely reported increase in anti-Semitic attacks in the French capital over the past two years, the two rabbis, who went for a conference, spent a free morning visiting a museum. They travelled there by Métro (subway), and deliberately wore their kippot.

"Neither of us encountered an anti-Semitic comment, or even a side glance," Rabbi Moses said from Montreal, where he is spiritual leader of Shaare Zion Congregation.

The immediate past president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, who is also on the executive of the North American Association of Boards of Rabbis (NABOR), was one of three Canadian rabbis who attended NABOR's annual conference, held in Paris last month. Rabbi Martin Berman and Rabbi Arnold Fine, president of the Toronto and Ottawa boards of rabbis respectively, were among three dozen North American rabbis at the annual event.

This year, NABOR's meeting was held in conjunction with the European Jewish Congress, which sponsored the concurrent second annual European Conference of Catholics and Jews.

Following the two-day congress, NABOR members visited a synagogue and a Jewish school that had been firebombed, and they met with Jews who had been attacked.

"The purpose was to express our solidarity with the Jewish community of France," said Rabbi Berman, spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Congregation in Thornhill.

The subway experiment notwithstanding, Rabbi Moses said French Jewish officials made it clear the Jewish community is "uncomfortable." France's Muslim population is now ten times that of the Jewish population, about 6 million versus 600,000, Rabbi Moses said.

Rabbi Martin Berman

He met a couple who are applying to immigrate to Canada because their children face anti-Semitism from Muslim schoolmates. He said they also have friends who would "very much like to leave."

The NABOR rabbis – accompanied by a police escort whenever they travelled as a group – heard that the rabbi of the synagogue they visited in Clichy-sous-Bois (a working class suburb of Paris) was being harassed by Muslim youth until the local imam and the mayor, who is Christian, became involved. "That settled down, but it took months of negotiation," said Rabbi Moses.

In 2002, he noted, there were almost 500 reported attacks on Jews and Jewish institutions in France.

Rabbi Moses said that, although French President Jacques Chirac is "no great friend of Israel, my sense is that the current government is making every effort to curtail acts of anti-Semitism." A government representative who met with the NABOR group said reported anti-Semitic acts do not go unpunished and that the French ministry of education is developing a curriculum on tolerance, he said.

"We got different impressions from different people," said Rabbi Berman, adding that a French Jewish official told him the level of anti-Semitism in France has been exaggerated outside the country. "[But] the people who are in the trenches, especially Sephardi Jews who live in neighbourhoods near large Arab populations, feel it's a very serious situation."

When the rabbis visited Paris' Grand Mosque, the religious leader they met there was "very cordial," said Rabbi Berman. "I think he is trying hard to make relations between Jews and Muslims comfortable. Obviously, politically, when it comes to Israel, his opinion is going to be different."

The visiting rabbis were not instructed to keep a low profile, but they noticed that institutions like the synagogue in Clichy and kosher restaurants they visited had little if anything to identify them as Jewish.

Among the more positive aspects of their four-day visit was evidence of the development of Catholic-Jewish relations across Europe and specifically in France, said Rabbi Fine, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation and co-founder of a Christian-Jewish dialogue group that has been in existence more than 20 years. "It was quite impressive, and quite hopeful."

Rabbi Fine said the conference of Catholics and Jews, where Rabbi Moses presented a paper on Jewish-Catholic dialogue in Quebec, was on an extremely high intellectual level and included the chief rabbi of France and a representative from the Vatican.

In his paper, Rabbi Moses said that in his experience, much of the interfaith dialogue does not trickle down to the lay level "and certainly does not get down to the youth level."

While at least one program in Montreal brings Catholic youth on synagogue tours, the reverse is not the case, he told The CJN. Rabbi Moses said bringing "reasonably sophisticated and strongly [Jewishly] committed" upper level high school students to meet Catholic leaders and youth "is important if we want our kids to understand the world they live in… so that they won't just be let loose at university campuses where the issues of faith and religion don't [necessarily] come up."

Judy Urowitz

Her friends wanted to make her a dinner party to celebrate her 60th birthday, but she refused.

"I woke up one morning and decided that I was going to throw myself a birthday party, a lunch with a purpose, for some 40 friends," she said. "I would do all the cooking, the invitations and the decorations; and the theme would be Cook for the Cure, which raises money for breast cancer research."

Cook for the Cure is a joint project of the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation (CBCF) and KitchenAid Canada. Guests are invited to a cocktail reception, lunch or dinner, and in lieu of a gift for the host or hostess, they are asked to make a donation to the CBCF.

Urowitz chose the symbolic pink ribbon of CBCF as the theme throughout the party – in the self-made invitations, name cards, table settings, cakes and drinks. Even her birthday outfit was pink.

In Canada, breast cancer will strike some 20,500 Canadian women and as many as 5,400 will die, according to the CBFC statistics.

"I have family members who have survived breast cancer and some friends who haven't," Urowitz told The CJN. "I was thrilled to do what I love to do to support a cause that is so important to me and to honour my friends."

Raised in Buffalo, N.Y., Urowitz graduated from State University of New York at Buffalo. She worked as a dental hygienist and married Toronto rheumatologist Murray Urowitz, whom she met at Camp Massad. They will celebrate their 40th anniversary in September.

Over the years, Urowitz said, she has taken numerous cooking classes. "I studied in Italy, New York, and wherever I find myself, as Murray speaks all over the world and I now travel with him."

She said she is overwhelmed with the success of her birthday lunch. "Even people who were not invited but heard about the party are sending in donations to the Breast Cancer Fund."

She emphasized that along with creative cooking, "in our family, education is important." Her daughters, she said, will all earn PhD degrees. "Anna already has her doctorate and Sara and Rachel are PhD candidates."

Her daughters recently led the Women's Passover Experience at Beth Tikvah Synagogue where the Urowitz family are active members.

Urowitz's birthday invitation reflects her philosophy. It includes the words, "I'm 60 and I'm blessed so, I'll Cook for the Cure," and "Supporting a cause will never have tasted so good!"

If you are interested in hosting a KitchenAid Cook for the Cure party, you can get information by calling 1-800-618-CURE or go to the Web site: www.cbcf.org. A KitchenAid Cook for the Cure hosting guide with recipes is available free of charge.

Passover Greetings

Visiting Israeli seeks funds for Shomron

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the popular media, no doubt fed in part by Palestinian propaganda, West Bank Israelis have a particular image: aggressive, gun-toting individuals who push Arabs around and possess a fanatical zeal.

If so, Pinchas Gerber is the opposite of that stereotype. A soft-spoken man who is trained as a social worker, Gerber is a resident of Ginot Shomron, one of the towns of Karnei Shomron (Light of the Shomron), a community in the West Bank that lies on the highway between the Arab towns of Kalkilya and Nablus. The area is gorgeous, Gerber said, with a landscape of rolling hills, lush vegetation and, in the winter, temporary streams of runoff that slice between the mountains.

Eighteen hundred families live in Karnei Shomron. Most are middle class, well-educated professionals who commute to work in nearby Kfar Saba and Tel Aviv. It's a 20-minute drive to Kfar Saba, which sits just inside the border of pre-1967 Israel, only a few kilometres from Kalkilya. Commuters make the trek on a bypass road that was constructed following the first intifadah, when drivers were often confronted with rock-throwing Palestinians.

The much more violent second intifadah has hit the Shomron hard. Although the road is well patrolled and fairly safe, the Shomron communities have experienced losses in a number of ways, Gerber said. Not only have 47 people been killed – 10 per cent of the Israeli total – and families torn apart, but quality of life has taken a major hit. The central government is faced with a budget crisis and is cutting allocations by three to six per cent. Because the shortfall has been difficult for the Shomron Regional Council to address, a decision has been taken to solicit the support of Diaspora communities.

As deputy director of the council's social services department, Gerber has been given the job of travelling to North America to increase awareness among Jews here of the difficulties facing the Shomron and to solicit their financial support.

The council, he said, represents 33 communities in central and northern Shomron that range in size from 27 families living in caravans to communities of 1,800 families or more living in detached houses with beautifully landscaped grounds. The council's catchment area, at 2,800 square kilometres, represents 10 per cent of the size of Israel.

Being on the front lines of the intifadah, the communities have suffered from numerous terrorist attacks. The high number of dead and injured, coupled with government cutbacks, have put the communities under tremendous stress and services are suffering.

Money from abroad is earmarked for a number of projects: help for disabled children, respite for caregivers, including social workers, support for a travelling dental clinic, sending children to summer camps outside Israel, providing supplementary education for children in after-school therapeutic learning centres, providing basic necessities (such as kitchen appliances) to recent arrivals, supplying a trauma centre, establishing a telephone hotline for advice and referrals, providing stress management programs for Shomron families; training and equipping civilian emergency response teams; and acquiring bullet-proof vans to transport children with special needs to after-school development centres.

Gerber, who was born in Cincinnati and raised in New Jersey, was chosen as the council's North American representative because of his command of the English language and rapport with Canadians and Americans. As a trained social worker with a PhD from Bar-Ilan University, he discussed community needs through the perspective of a caregiver.

He also addressed the question of support for communities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which he acknowledged can be a contentious political issue. Despite the intifadah, the population of Shomron increased by six per cent this year, he said.

"Whether it's legal or illegal, I have to deal with the facts on the ground and people who need support. I have to help. People who want to contribute to us will do so.

"No question, there is a tremendous amount of support now. Because of the intifadah, Jews want to help other Jews. They know we're proud living where we are. They know there is an element of suffering and Jews in Toronto want to help other Jews in their time of need."

When he and his family first emigrated to Israel in 1986, living in Shomron was not on their agenda. In fact, they hoped to live in Ra'anana, but economic realities pushed the family to Ginot Shomron.

"I'm a de facto settler or resident of the area, but having lived there, I feel a unique attachment and bond to our biblical heritage," he said.

Gerber acknowledges that as many as 60 per cent of the residents of Shomron are not particularly religious. Of the council's 33 communities, only seven can be described as religious in nature and the rest are combined of observant and secular Jews. There are even four churches in Ariel, Shomron's largest city, serving many Russian immigrants, he said.

Gerber said many Israelis living in the West Bank and Gaza would be prepared to give up their homes if there was a realistic prospect for peace with people who actually wanted to end the conflict.

During his one-week visit to Toronto, Gerber established new contacts and met with rabbis, philanthropists and professionals. He addressed a coffee klatsch and spoke at a seudah shlishit at the BAYT, one of Toronto's largest synagogues.

Gerber said the response here has been positive, with several local dentists helping get a travelling dental clinic off the ground. Following his visit to Toronto, he was scheduled to spend a few days in New York City and New Jersey. He plans to return to Canada in the summer.

African Canadians connect with Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Davies Bagambiire says his recent trip to Israel was the culmination of a lifelong love affair with the country.

Bagambiire, a lawyer and lecturer on race and law at York University who was born and raised in Uganda, says his attachment to Israel goes back to 1971 when he assumed the role of former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir as part of a university assignment.

"For six days, I was the prime minister of Israel," he said. "That opened the window of interest in the country I have maintained until today."

Bagambiire travelled to Israel at the end of last year, along with Ed Morgan, a law professor at University of Toronto and chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Njoke Wane, professor of sociology, Ontario Institute for Studies in Education; and Henry Ojambo, a Ugandan lawyer and doctoral student, University of Toronto.

Morgan, who had been invited to attend a conference on law and terrorism at Haifa University, said that after the terrorist bombing of Hotel Malindi in Mombasa, Kenya in December, he was prompted to invite a group from Africa to accompany him.

"After that bombing, many Africans suddenly realized they had something in common with Israelis. I thought they could learn from the [Israeli experience]."

The group spoke about their trip at a panel sponsored by the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning at Holy Blossom Temple.

Bagambiire said that Uganda and Israel have a historical connection dating back to 1902, when Uganda accepted a proposal by the Zionist movement to set up a temporary refuge in Uganda for Russian Jews.

"[It fell through] but there was the possibility that it would work."

A second connection between Israel and Africa, he said, occurred after the independence of Ghana in 1956, when Israel became one of the first countries to establish an embassy there.

"Extending its hand was seen as a great move on Israel's part, who at that time was grappling with its own issues of growth and development."

Africa can learn several lessons from Israel including how to irrigate its dry land and raise poultry, and how to defend itself, said Bagambiire.

Over the years, he said, Africa and Israel relations has had its ups and downs, "but by and large most African countries and Israel have had good relations on a bilateral level."

One of the reasons for his travelling to Israel, he said, was to stress upon African leadership "the importance of a strategic alliance that transcends regional politics, and focus on what is beneficial to our continent and our people in the long run."

Ojambo said that before going to Israel, he had thought all Israelis were united. "What I saw was a democratic country with people who would have passionate arguments one minute and share ideas the next," he said. "Their ideas clash, but it does not lead to war."

Wane, a sociologist from Kenya, said she went to Israel to observe people. "I saw black Jews from Ethiopia who have moved to a developed country. Moving from Africa to Israel is like night and day. How do they reconcile their two cultures?"

The transition is difficult, she said, because they believe Israel is home, but at the same time they find everything unfamiliar.

"Transcending African rituals [and moving] into Israeli culture can be very difficult," she said. "When people are determined, however, there is nothing they can't achieve. [The Ethiopians] felt a sense of belonging and they were willing to do whatever it takes to be part of the community."

Wane's visit to Israel "will be a part of my life that will be difficult to match," she said. "My feeling of Israel will never be the same because I visited there."

Toronto's Indian Jews celebrate Purim

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Eighteen-month-old Gideon Joseph and his 2½-year-old sister, Judith, love dressing up for Purim. But while other Jewish boys were pulling on Bob the Builder overalls or Darth Maul capes, Gideon and Judith drew cheers as Indian movie stars Salman Khan and Aishwarya Rai.

On Sunday, March 23, at a Markham banquet hall and restaurant, Judith and Gideon dressed up and went with their parents and grandparents to the annual Purim celebration of Congregation BINA, Toronto's only congregation of Indian Jews.

Rani Pollock, four years old.

Congregation BINA was established by just a few families in 1979. The acronym stands for Bene Israel of North America. (The word "bina" also means "understanding" in Hebrew.) The Bene Israel are the largest group of Jews of Indian origin; others include the Cochin Jews and the Iraqi Baghdadis.

Founding member Hannah Rubin says there were only seven or eight children at the synagogue's first Purim social. Along with Judith and Gideon, more than 20 children attended this year, in costumes ranging from traditional Gujarati dress to… well, Bob the Builder.

Purim wasn't a big holiday in India, where most BINA members were born, says Sabrina Kerbel, a first-generation Canadian. Rubin agrees: "We didn't celebrate to that extent." But it has grown here: 80 members gathered this year for a Purim party with an Indian flair. Hamantaschen were nowhere in sight, but fragrant dal (lentils) were steaming during the children's Purim play.

Because the Indian community was cut off from mainstream Judaism for thousands of years, Bene Israel became highly assimilated within the surrounding culture. But the community held on to many Jewish traditions, such as cooking Tandoori chicken in lemon juice rather than in yogurt and butter like most Indians.

In India, intermarriage was almost non-existent. Hindus were forbidden to marry out of their caste, and Bene Israel had no formal caste, though their traditional occupation and Shabbat observance earned them the caste-like designation of "Saturday Oil-Pressers."

For 2,000 years, the Bene Israel enjoyed more intellectual and spiritual freedom than many European Jews. The community grew to almost 30,000 at its peak in the 1950s, but most left soon after for Israel and elsewhere. Today, there are fewer than 5,000 Bene Israel in India, mostly around Mumbai (Bombay).

In Israel, Bene Israel were often met with discrimination, and many later left for English-speaking countries. The second largest group of Congregation BINA members have come from there; many clapped and sang along with Hebrew Purim songs.

With about 120 families, BINA holds services on Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Simchat Torah, plus occasional life-cycle events such as bar mitzvahs and weddings. Because it doesn't have a permanent location, its services take place at the National Council of Jewish Women building. BINA also runs a weekly Hebrew school, classes for adults on traditional Indian-Jewish melodies, Purim and Chanukah celebrations and a summertime picnic social.

Though some BINA members belong to other synagogues as well, social events are an important link to 2,000 years of history. There are no special Indian Purim foods, Kerbel says, but "what we eat is different from average Jewish people."

Because the Purim party took place in a restaurant that serves non-kosher meat, the menu was vegetarian: crispy pakoras and tender poli flatbread complemented with spicy Indian sauces and basmati rice.

Judith Joseph, two years old, with Hannah Rubin. [Jennifer Paquette photos]

Though Purim might not have been a big deal in India, there is a link between the two: the Megillah says Haman's evil decree reached all the way from India (in Hebrew, Hodu) to Ethiopia (Kush).

Dressed in an elegant sari, Rubin, who came to Canada in 1974 and worked for 19 years at children's aid societies in this country, proudly watched as her own grandchildren, BINA's next generation, ran around enjoying the festivities.

"It's great to see them," she said. "It's very nice to have them here."

Toronto to host librarians' convention

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Almost 300 librarians are expected to take part in the Association of Jewish Libraries (AJL) 2003 convention, being held here for the second time, June 15 to 18.

The annual convention is a forum for AJL members to share information and learn new skills, and take information back to their own communities.

Co-chairs are Gloria Jacobs, a librarian with the Toronto Public Libraries, and Rosemary Cohen, a retired librarian from Associated Hebrew Schools.

Zena Glassman, librarian at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Max and Beatrice Wolfe Library, who is chair of the convention's programming committee and a past president of AJL/Ontario, said the convention gives librarians a unique opportunity to meet with other librarians and learn from them. "It's not often people with so much experience meet in one place."

The Sunday sessions, some of which are open to the public, include meetings with poets and writers such as Simcha Simchovitch, Ken Sherman, James Sturm, Richard Ungar, Lesley Simpson, Cary Fagan, Paul Brown and Vivian Kaplan.

AJL represents every kind of library, from small synagogue and school libraries, to large libraries at universities such as Hebrew University or those with significant Hebrew collections, said Jacobs.

Members benefit, she said, by being able to exchange ideas, and talk to other members through the association's Web site, www.jewishlibraries.org.

Libraries are an important part of the Jewish community, "because books and information are an essential part of Jewish life," said Cohen. "We live in a knowledge-based society, and librarians – who are now called information providers – are the gatekeepers."

The field has changed dramatically in the past 30 years, she said, "and it is necessary to ensure that this information is free and accessible to the average person. People need access to as many viewpoints as possible."

The use of libraries is skyrocketing, Cohen said, because people need guidance in seeking the information they need.

"The Internet, for example, is not easy to navigate. There is a lot of misinformation out there. It is important to know, not only how to find a site, but to evaluate it – to make sure material is current, relevant and unbiased," she said.

Glassman said the "old stereotype of librarians does not exist any more. People really don't think about what goes on in libraries. Gone are the days when a librarian sits behind her desk surrounded by books.

"They need to be knowledgeable, technical, and be able to do five things at once. Library users come from all walks of life, and librarians have to move quickly from helping toddlers, to seniors, to professionals who need an extensive search," she said.

For information on the convention, contact Jacobs at gjacobs@cuic.ca or 416-393-7706, or Cohen at rosemer@idirect.com or 416-633-9092.

Passover Food Ideas

Passover Sephardi style

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

Because my ancestors were from eastern Europe, specifically Latvia, Lithuania and Vilna, I am Ashkenazi. Just as I thought all Jews spoke Yiddish, a language I delight in because it's so colourful, I grew up thinking Jewish cooking was my mother's brisket and carrot tzimmes, my Granny Fanny's chopped liver and my Aunt Dorothy's blintzes with sour cream.

That's not to mention the dishes my brothers and I used to giggle about because their names were so amusing – knaidlach, kreplach and knishes.

Now that we've all grown up, I'm not sure what was so funny. Maybe that's the joy of childhood – you laugh at anything. Recently I've become fascinated by Sephardi cooking – maybe because I didn't grow up with it, maybe because the combinations are so creative, maybe because its evolution is so interesting.

Although we are one people, we have two cuisines, and nowhere is this more significant than at Passover, when we commemorate our flight to freedom and the birth of the Jewish nation.

At sundown on the eve of Passover, we begin the first seder, which is probably our longest meal of the year, as we intersperse feasting on Passover delicacies with retelling the story of Exodus.

To personalize our people's joy, sadness, bitterness and optimism, we eat symbolic dishes, recite poetry and sing songs, as dictated by the Haggadah.

Passover lasts eight days (seven in Israel), during which we observe traditions honouring our people's frantic flight to freedom. It is in honour of that passage that one of our most interesting food traditions was born.

Fermenting agents such as yeast are banned, as are the five types of grain – wheat, barley, rye, oats and spelt. Bread, cakes, biscuits and all foods containing ingredients made from these grains are chametz. The Ashkenazim are also forbidden rice, dried corn, dried beans, peas and lentils, although the Sephardim allow them.

Because of the demands of cooking without grain or leaven, a whole range of ingredients are used in non-traditional ways. Instead of stuffing poultry and meat with breadcrumbs, we use matzah farfel, mashed potatoes, fruits, vegetables, nuts and seeds. While Ashkenazim don't use grains, Sephardim use cracked wheat, ground rice and some other cereal seeds.

Pastries are made from ground almonds, walnuts and hazelnuts, potato flour, potato starch, matzah meal and matzah cake flour. The favourite cookie at Passover is macaroons, made of coconut, ground almonds, sugar and egg white. Fritters are made of matzah meal. And pancakes are replaced with matzah brei, using matzah soaked in beaten eggs.

Sephardim in Morocco barbecue during the holiday to remind us that our people left Egypt in such a hurry that they grilled foods over a wood fire. A popular Sephardi dish at Passover is fava bean soup as it was a favourite of the Egyptian slaves.

EARLY AMERICAN SEPHARDI CHAROSET BALLS

Adapted from Jewish Cooking in America by Joan Nathan, Knopf, 1998

This delightful dish – a favourite of children and adults alike – represents the mortar and mud bricks used by the Israelites to build Pharaoh's cities. Although the Nathan family would never use a food processor, instead preferring an old-fashioned grinder, it does make the preparation easier.

3 cups raisins
2 cups whole almonds, blanched
1 green apple, peeled and cored
½ tsp. cinnamon or to taste

PASSOVER SEPHARDI STYLE

In a food grinder, coarsely grind raisins, 1½ cups of the almonds, apple; and cinnamon. If using a food processor, grind in quick pulses so as not to over-process. Set aside in bowl.

Using your hands, press mixture into balls the size of large marbles. Press one of the remaining almonds into each charoset ball. Makes about 4 dozen balls.

INDIAN SALADE COCHIN
(Indian toasted mango salad)

The simple combination of mangoes and cucumbers is at once sweet and tart, aromatic and pleasing. Regular cucumbers may be substituted if English aren't available.

¼ cup fresh mint, chiffonade
¼ cup freshly squeezed lime juice zest of 2 limes
1 tbsp. ground coriander
½ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup walnut oil
¼ cup red wine vinegar
1 tsp. ground cumin
½ tsp.white pepper
kosher salt to taste
10 English cucumbers, skinned, seeded and sliced thin
3 large mangoes, peeled and sliced into ½-in. pieces

In a large mixing bowl, add first 9 ingredients. Whisk together until smooth. Add salt. Toss cucumbers with dressing. Brush mangoes with a little oil; grill until a nice brown color is achieved. Dice and add to salad. Serves 6.

MOROCCAN PASSOVER CHICKEN SOUP

Chicken soup knows no boundaries and is equally popular with both Sephardim and Ashkenazim. When done well it is as highly prized as a vintage wine. The variations are endless.

2 tbsp. olive oil
2 onions, sliced
2 leeks, sliced thin
3 carrots, sliced into rounds
1-2 lb. chicken breasts, boneless and skinless, sliced
2 quarts chicken stock (see recipe)
1 cup fava beans, dried and rehydrated with hot water
3 stalks celery, thinly sliced
2 cups water
1 cup white wine
1 tbsp. ground coriander
pepper to taste
1 cup cooked chickpeas
kosher salt and white pepper to taste

Heat a large stockpot until very hot; pour oil into pot. Add onions, leeks and carrots; heat until onions start to become translucent. Add chicken breast to vegetable mix. When chicken is no longer pink, add broth, fava beans, celery, water and wine. Add coriander and pepper. Let soup come to boil; turn down to simmer. Skim soup for residue on top every 10 minutes or so, until it is clear. When vegetables are al dente add chickpeas, salt and pepper. Serve hot. Serves 6.

CHICKEN STOCK

8 lb. chicken bones
6 quarts cold water
1 onion, halved
2 stalks celery, halved
2 carrots, quartered
1 packet bouquet garni or ½ tsp. each dried thyme, whole peppercorns, garlic and parsley stems tied in a cheesecloth
kosher salt to taste

Combine bones and water. Bring slowly to boil. Skim surface for coagulated residue. Simmer stock for five hours. Add onions, celery, carrots and sachet. Simmer for one hour more. Strain, cool and store in refrigerator until used.

POULET AUX DATTES (CHICKEN WITH DATES)

Adapted from The Book of Jewish Food by Claudia Roden, Knopf, 1996) This Moroccan combination has roots that go back to medieval Baghdad. It is important to taste and adjust the seasonings, for the right balance of flavours is a delicate matter in this dish. It usually needs plenty of black pepper to counteract the sweetness.

6 chicken quarters
4 tbsp. peanut or sunflower oil
2 large onions, coarsely chopped
2 tsp. cinnamon
¾ tsp. mace
½ tsp. nutmeg
1 tbsp. honey
salt and plenty of black pepper to taste
1 cup pitted dates
Juice of ½ to 1 lemon
pinch of saffron
½ cup blanched almonds, toasted or fried

In a large pan, sauté chicken pieces in oil for a few minutes, until lightly coloured, turning them over once. Remove chicken. Add onions; cook on low heat until tender. Stir in cinnamon, mace, nutmeg and honey; pour in 1¼ cups water. Stir well; add chicken pieces. Bring to boil, add salt and pepper; lower flame and simmer for 25 minutes. Add dates, lemon juice, and saffron; cook for another 5 to 10 minutes, or until chicken is tender. Place on serving platter, sprinkle with almonds.

TEZPISHTL
(TURKISH ALMOND-NUT TORTE)
WITH FIG TOPPING

The perfection of this dish depends on the freshness of the nuts.

Syrup
2 cups sugar
2 cups water
2 tsp. lemon juice

Cake
5 eggs
1 cup sugar
¼ cup sunflower oil
juice and zest of 1 orange
2 tsp.ground cinnamon
1¼ cups Passover fine matzah cake meal
1¼ cups almonds, blanched and finely chopped

Honey and marinated fig topping
½ lb. dried white figs, washed and dried well
1 bottle sweet wine
½ cup sugar
1 tsp. lemon juice
1 cup honey
pinch of nutmeg
pinch of cinnamon

For syrup, in a saucepan mix sugar and water together; bring to boil. Add lemon juice; simmer over low heat for 10 minutes. Cool.

To make cake, beat eggs until frothy; add sugar; continue to beat until golden and well mixed. Add remaining ingredients, one at a time; stir into batter. Pour into oiled and floured 13x9x2 cake pan; bake at 350 for 30 minutes. Test for doneness with a toothpick.

Remove cake from oven; pour cooled syrup over it. Let cake stand for 2 hours before serving to allow syrup to be absorbed. Makes 1 cake, about 18 pieces.

Place figs and port wine in large bowl; marinate overnight. Drain figs; reserve wine. In large saucepan add sugar, lemon juice and honey. Simmer, being careful not to burn sugar. Raise flame to medium. Add reserved wine, nutmeg and cinnamon. Reduce by half and add figs. Stir well. Serve with torte.

PASSOVER OFFERINGS FROM COR

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council provides kashrut and food related information to families across Canada, the United States and as far as Israel and Europe, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the council's executive director.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list, (there is no charge), call the Kashruth Council 416-635-9550, or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3V2.

Here are some of this year's Passover recipes from the COR flyer.

PESACH SANGRIA

½ gal, red grape juice, chilled
1 26-oz. bottle Club Soda, chilled
1 sliced orange (with rind)
1 sliced lemon (with rind)
1 sliced apple (with skin)
½ small pineapple cut into small chunks

In a large pitcher or punch bowl, combine chilled grape juice and chilled Club Soda. Add fruit. Add a tray of ice cubes. Mix well. Yield: 3 quarts.

FILLET OF SOLE ROLL UPS WITH MUSHROOM OR TOMATO SAUCE

8 sole fillets – dry fillets, sprinkled lightly with salt, pepper, paprika

Filling:
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
¼ finely chopped onion
½ cup finely chopped celery
½ cup finely chopped carrot
½ cup grated cheddar cheese
6 oz. thinly sliced almonds (optional)
2 tbsp. finely chopped flat leaf parsley (please check fresh parsley carefully)
2 cups matzah meal
2 tbsp. ketchup

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a rectangular baking dish (12x7x1 inches). Melt butter or margarine in saucepan. Add onion, sauté 5 minutes, add celery and carrot and sauté 5 minutes longer. Cool. Add remaining ingredients. Mix together. Divide mixture on filets — roll up — fasten with a toothpick or skewer. Place rolls in baking dish. Dot with butter or margarine. Bake 20 minutes. Serve with mushroom sauce (see below).

Note for leftover filling: Place in greased muffin tins; bake 15-20 minutes at 350.

Mushroom sauce:
¼ cup oil
½ Spanish onion, finely chopped
1 lb. mushrooms, sliced
1 level tbsp. potato starch
2 cups cold water or pareve stock
salt and pepper to taste

Heat oil, sauté onion until limp, add mushrooms, sauté 5 minutes longer. Dilute potato starch in cold water or stock, add salt and pepper. Cook in saucepan until mixture thickens, stirring constantly. Add to mushroom mixture. Pour over fish.

Variation: Heat one can tomato mushroom sauce mixed with 1 tbsp. lemon juice and pour over fish. Serves 8.

SWEET POTATO CASSEROLE

6 medium sweet potatoes
4 tsp. sugar
4 tbsp. butter or margarine
2 medium oranges, unpeeled, thinly sliced
½ cup orange juice
¼ cup honey

Crumb mixture:
¼ cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. shredded coconut (optional)
2 tbsp. butter or margarine

Preheat oven to 350. Cook potatoes until tender, in enough boiling salted water to cover. Drain, peel and cut into ½-inch slices.

Arrange a layer of potatoes in a greased casserole. Sprinkle with 2 tbsp. sugar, dot with 2 tbsp. butter or margarine and cover with a layer of oranges.

Repeat layers. Combine orange juice and honey and pour over potatoes. Combine crumb mixture and sprinkle over top. Cover casserole and bake for 30-40 minutes removing cover the last 15 minutes. Serves 6-8.

FRESH VEGETABLE SALAD WITH TOASTED FARFEL

Part 1
1 head romaine lettuce (prepackaged available)
1 cucumber, thinly sliced
2 ribs celery, thinly sliced
1 large tomato, cut in thin wedges
1 cup radishes, thinly sliced
1 cup toasted farfel (recipe follows)
½ Bermuda onion, thinly sliced

Wash lettuce thoroughly, dry and tear into bite-sized pieces. Place in salad bowl with other vegetables and toasted farfel.

PASSOVER OFFERINGS FROM COR

Part 2 – Dressing:
1 cup oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. white wine
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
2 cloves garlic, crushed

Place dressing ingredients in blender, food processor or jar. Blend well. Pour over salad.

Part 3
½ cup grated Swiss or cheddar cheese

Sprinkle over salad. Toss salad gently. The farfel will soak up the dressing or add dry farfel. Chill at least ½ hour before serving. Serves 6-8.

TOASTED FARFEL

1 cup farfel
1 egg, well beaten
dash salt
dash garlic powder (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Combine all ingredients. Spread on lightly greased cookie sheet. Bake 20-25 minutes or until lightly browned. Good with any salad or soup.

DESSERT CREPES

4 eggs
¼ cup potato starch
2 tbsp. oil
½ cup water

Mix ingredients in blender or mixmaster, or use rotary beater. Strain. Lightly grease a 6-inch skillet and heat until a drop of water dances on the surface. Remove from heat.

Pour 2 tbsp. of batter into the skillet. Tilt from side to side until the batter covers the bottom evenly. Return skillet to heat and cook crepe until underside is lightly browned. Turn out on towel. Return crepe to skillet on other side to brown lightly. Turn out on towel. Cook remaining crepes in same manner.

Filling:
2 tbsp. sugar
6 peaches or nectarines, peeled and sliced, or canned peaches (well drained) extra sugar
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
Passover liqueur or brandy

Preheat oven to 400. Sprinkle sugar over fruit. Spoon some fruit on each crepe. Roll up and sprinkle lightly with extra sugar. Melt butter or margarine in baking dish. Place crepes in dish and place in oven until hot and glazed. Heat Passover liqueur or brandy in small saucepan. Ignite and pour over crepes.

Variation: Any fruit or combination of fruits.

Serve with yogurt, sour cream or whipped cream. Yield: 12-15 crepes.

CHOCOLATE MARSHMALLOW FARFEL SQUARES

¼ cup butter or margarine
5 cups (approximately 40) Passover marshmallows
5 cups farfel
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup chocolate chips
½ cup chopped nuts (optional)

Place butter or margarine and marshmallows in greased 9x13-inch glass casserole dish. Microwave uncovered on high for 2-3 minutes until melted, stirring every minute. Add remaining ingredients. Mix well. Spread evenly in casserole. Wet hands and pat down evenly. Refrigerate ½ hour. Cut into squares. Store in refrigerator. Yield: 48 small squares.

Easy desserts too good to pass-over!

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Passover desserts are always a challenge. Biblical injunction prohibits us from eating foods containing regular flour during Passover, which means that our usual repertoire of flour-based cakes, cookies and tortes are excluded from our dessert menus. This is the time for cooks to become extremely creative, but since most of us are rushed for time, we need simple solutions.

Here are some quick, easy treats for your Pesach seder. You will also find more delicious Passover recipes on my Web site at www.gourmania.com. Enjoy!

CHOCOLATE BARK

Melt 1 lb. (500 grams) bittersweet Passover chocolate. Stir in 2 cups of toasted almonds and spread out on a parchment or foil-lined pan. Refrigerate until set. Break into irregular-shaped pieces. (Note: You can substitute raisins, dried apricots or shelled pistachios for the almonds.)

EASY CHOCOLATE TORTE

Make a double batch of your favourite Passover brownies (or use 2 packages of Passover brownie mix). Line two 9-inch round cake pans with baking parchment. Spread batter evenly in pans; bake according to directions.

When cool, carefully remove layers from pans. (The parchment makes it easy – just invert brownie layers onto a plate and peel off parchment.) Place on a serving plate. Spread top of first layer with raspberry preserves, then top with second layer. Frost top and sides with your favourite Passover chocolate frosting or whipped pareve whipped topping (e.g., Rich Whip). Decorate with chocolate curls and fresh strawberries.

SUSAN'S PASSOVER HONEY CAKE
(Pareve)

My friend Susan Binnington of Edmonton writes, "This delicious honey cake is always a big hit at my seder. The recipe comes from The Great Hadassah Cookbook and I have been making it for years. It is pareve and quite simple to make. You just need a mixer for beating the egg whites, or a very strong arm and a whisk!"

10 eggs, separated
1 cup sugar
¼ cup oil
1 cup honey
1 cup cake meal
1 tbsp. potato starch
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. allspice
dash of salt

Beat egg yolks, sugar, oil and honey. Add sifted dry ingredients. Beat egg whites with a pinch of salt until stiff. Fold into batter.

Passover Food Ideas

CELEBRATE PASSOVER CREATIVELY

BY JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Tastes of Jewish Tradition, by Jody Hirsh, Idy Goodman, Aggie Goldenholz and Susan Roth, is the culmination of one community's efforts to turn the holidays into major festive family events. With the able assistance and support of the staff and parents of the Milwaukee Jewish Community Center's parenting centre, and with input from rabbis and local artists, this fun-filled compilation of recipes, activities, commentary and stories for the entire family was originally conceived as a cookbook.

"We sent out a mailing and gathered 400, 500 recipes," says Roth, the parenting centre's director. "Then the mothers were saying to us, 'We really would like art projects for the holidays.' Everything came from the parents in terms of what they want."

The Traditions and Text sections for each holiday bring the biblical portions to life. In a sidebar to each text are interesting, little-known facts. For example, "Did you know… Persian families hit each other with green onions during Dayenu?"

The authors of this valuable resource book take very seriously the injunction: "In every generation, all are obligated to see themselves as though they themselves had gone out of Egypt."

"On Passover, we are encouraged to remember the exodus as though we too had been there," Goodman says. "It involves your whole body. You re-enact the story through all your senses. Suddenly, you're all Egyptians or Israelites. Through the activities, you feel what it must have been like to be a slave and work so hard."

Set the mood for the seder by creating a Bedouin tent, donning Middle Eastern head covers called keffiyahs, and making plague bags. The book even includes a magic trick to simulate the parting of the Red Sea and suggests musical selections to accompany your virtual crossing.

Children will enjoy creating their own tambourines, burning bush centrepieces and afikoman bags. Use your imagination, the authors advise.

Indeed, throughout we are encouraged to use the book as a springboard to further study and fun.

"We feel the title to be especially apt as we provide you with a 'taste' of Jewish tradition," the authors tell us in the introduction.

"Judaism is a rich, multi-level, ancient – while contemporary – religion and culture. Our expectations are that you and your children [and grandchildren] will use Tastes of Jewish Tradition to deepen your understanding of Judaism and find a place for its rituals and traditions in your homes."

But what about the food? "Oh, what a plague, a week without pizza!" declares the Kids in the Kitchen page with its kid-friendly recipe. In fact, most of the recipes can either be prepared by kids themselves or are easy but delicious time-savers that kids really like.

What could be easier than the potato kugel that uses boxed stuffing mix and frozen hash browns and onions and has a crispy, crunchy texture?

After Passover, try the Honey Pecan Crusted Chicken with cornflake crumbs instead of matzah meal, and it will become a staple all year long.

Wondering what to prepare for lunch during the week? Kids as well as adults will love the creamy (and nutritious) Passover macaroni and cheese.

"The flourless chocolate cake is to die for," Goodman told me. Indeed, it is a chocoholic's dream.

QUICK AND EASY FLOURLESS CHOCOLATE CAKE

12-oz. semisweet or bittersweet chocolate chips
1 stick butter
¼ cup sugar
¼ cup strong freshly brewed coffee
2 tbsp. of your favourite liqueur
3 eggs

Preheat oven to 425. Butter an 8-inch springform pan. Sprinkle additional sugar to coat sides and bottom of pan. In a medium glass bowl, combine the chocolate, butter, sugar, coffee and liqueur. Microwave on high for 1 to 2 minutes or until the chocolate and butter are melted and smooth when stirred. Whisk in the eggs until smooth and well blended. Turn the mixture into the prepared pan. Bake for 10 to 15 minutes. The cake will not completely set in the middle. The sides should pull away slightly from the pan. Cool to room temperature, then refrigerate until cold. Serves 10 to 12.

HONEY PECAN CRUSTED CHICKEN

8 pieces skinless chicken breast halves
¼ cup honey
salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
¼ tsp. paprika or seasoned salt
⅛ tsp. garlic powder
1½ cups matzah meal
¼ cup chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 400. Combine honey, dash of salt, pepper, mustard, paprika and garlic powder in a bowl. Combine matzah meal and pecans in a shallow dish. Brush chicken pieces with honey mustard and then dredge in the matzah meal mixture. Lightly spray chicken with vegetable spray and place in a baking pan. Bake at 400 for about 40 minutes or until done. Serves 8.

PASSOVER LASAGNA

4 eggs
1½ lbs. cottage cheese
clove garlic minced or ⅛ tsp. garlic powder 9 whole matzot
milk as needed
½-1 lb. mozzarella cheese, shredded
1 jar tomato sauce
salt and pepper to taste
oregano to taste

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, combine the eggs, cottage cheese, salt, pepper, garlic and oregano. Wet matzot in the milk. Pour a little tomato sauce into the bottom of a casserole or lasagna pan. Layer ingredients as follows: matzot, cheese mixture, tomato sauce, mozzarella cheese. Continue layering until you have finished all the ingredients. End with a layer of mozzarella cheese. Sprinkle the top with Parmesan cheese. Bake at 350 for 45 to 50 minutes. Let the lasagna rest for 5 to 10 minutes before cutting. Serves 6.

Outstanding gift baskets and delectable trays brimming with Kosher for Passover packaged sweets, chocolates, dried fruits and nuts.

Pour into an ungreased angel food tube pan. Bake at 350 on the second lowest rack in oven for 65 minutes. Invert cake pan until cold before removing cake. Serves 20. (If you follow Weight Watchers, 1/20 of this cake is about 4 points.)

CHERYL'S FROZEN BLACK AND WHITE MOUSSE (Pareve)

My friend Cheryl Goldberg of Toronto is a wonderful cook and baker. To be invited to her home for dinner is a special treat. This year for Passover, she will be serving a frozen mousse that tastes almost like ice cream. Cheryl adapted it from a recipe that she served at a recent dinner party. It received rave reviews from her guests.

Crumble Mixture:
1 pkg. Passover chocolate cake mix (12 to 14 oz. pkg.)
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup pareve margarine

Combine mixture together in a 9x13-inch baking pan and mix together until crumbly. Spread evenly in pan. Bake in a preheated oven at 350 for 25 minutes. When cool, coarsely crumble the mixture (use your hands or a food processor). Spread 1/3 of the mixture in a greased 10-inch springform pan. Reserve remaining mixture.

Vanilla Layer:
8-oz. container nondairy topping (e.g., Rich Whip)
1/2 cup nondairy creamer (e.g., Kinneret)
1 package Passover vanilla pudding mix (the kind you cook)

Chocolate Layer:
8 oz. container nondairy topping (e.g., Rich Whip)
1/2 cup nondairy creamer (e.g., Kinneret)
1 package Passover chocolate pudding mix (the kind you cook) chocolate shavings and fresh strawberries, to garnish

Vanilla Layer: Beat nondairy topping until thick. Add vanilla pudding mix and nondairy creamer; blend well. Pour into springform pan. Top with 1/3 of the reserved crumble mixture.

Layer 2: Beat nondairy topping until thick. Add chocolate pudding mix and nondairy creamer; blend well. Pour into springform pan. Top with remaining crumble mixture. Sprinkle with chocolate shavings. Wrap well and freeze several hours or overnight. (Can be prepared in advance.) Serve frozen. Garnish with fresh strawberries when serving. Yield: 12 to 16 servings.

SUSAN'S BAKED CHOCOLATE PIE (OR BAR COOKIES) (Pareve)

Susan Greene, an avid baker, lives in Pepper Pike, Ohio. She writes, "One of my favourite recipes that my family has made every Passover that I can remember is from a Beth Am Temple Passover Institute from many years ago (we're talking from the late '60s-early '70s). This wonderful recipe is from Shoshana Herman, a renowned gourmet cook. (Her husband was the late Rabbi Jack J. Herman of Beth Am.)

"This is a very elegant, chic, rich, gourmet chocolate Passover dessert. The walnuts have to be ground as fine as meal for the crust. This will take 3 passes through the old-fashioned grinder. If you make this during the year, you can add 1/2 tsp. baking powder to the filling. Mrs. Herman makes this recipe as a pie, but my mother turned it into a bar cookie. Size is how we cut the richness. They look so pretty, like a little petit four."

Crust
1/4 cup sweet margarine
1/4 cup sugar
1 cup finely ground walnuts
1 tbsp. potato flour

Filling
1/2 cup sweet margarine
1 cup sugar
3 eggs
2 oz. unsweetened chocolate, melted
1/4 cup matzah cake flour, sifted pinch of salt

To make crust, mix all ingredients and press into the bottom and up the sides of an ungreased 10-inch pie plate.

To make bar cookies, press mixture into the bottom of an ungreased 7x11-inch baking dish.)

To make filling, beat margarine and sugar well. Add eggs one by one. Blend in melted chocolate along with dry ingredients. Pour mixture into unbaked crust. Bake at 325 for 40 minutes. Filling will not be completely dry inside when done.

Yield: 10 to 12 servings as a pie, or about 5 dozen squares. Serve pie with non-dairy whipped cream. (For bar cookies, cut in 1-inch squares and serve upside down, so that the nut crust is on top.)

Be creative with your matzah

By LISA SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Matzah again! About the third or fourth day of Passover, that would be my chant – as well as that of my five brothers and sisters. And my patient mother would endure the complaint from her young, bread-starved children for the reminder of the eight full days of the festival.

Now that I am an adult, temporarily removing chametz from my diet allows me to reflect on my habits, not only with food, but in my daily life. But as a child, Passover meant not only no bread, but no hamburgers, no pizza, no pancakes, not even regular bubble gum! All the delicious matzah ball soup in the world couldn't make up for the losses.

To help, my mother made hot matzah brei for breakfast. This classic Passover dish can be sweet or savory, as long as it includes softened matzah fried with eggs. To comfort her dear, struggling children, my mother made ours sweet, adding a little milk, sugar and cinnamon. She stood at the stove in her Passover apron, ladling and turning one serving, then another and another, as the kitchen filled with the scent of melted butter. The table looked whiter than usual and the food in the refrigerator looked different and new, because the packaged foods, the dishes, the tablecloths, even the salt and pepper shakers had been changed for the holiday.

After stacking matzah brei on our plates, my mother took out the tin shaker with the cup handle, labelled with masking tape: Passover powdered sugar. I loved watching the white dust melting into my hot matzah brei while my baby brothers licked the sugared rims of their plates with their fingers. Then came a moment my mother probably cherished – silence, as six happy children ate.

It was still matzah. And although it was light and delicious, the matzah brei had that dense, uneven look of most flourless food. But in the land of my childhood, unlimited use of the sugar shaker made up for a lot.

KAETHE SOLOMON'S MATZAH BREI

This is the version my mother made for our family during Passover. But it is also the perfect solution for leftover matzah after Passover ends. Because just as the pre-festival rituals include the removal of bread items from the house by doing, among other things, a thorough spring cleaning, I am ready to clean out half-finished matzah boxes after the week is over.

2 matzahs
1 large egg
1/8 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. sugar
1/4 cup milk (or less)
butter for frying

In a small bowl, soak matzah in warm water until softened. Drain and squeeze out liquid completely.

In a medium bowl, whisk egg, cinnamon and sugar together. Add softened matzah and mix until matzah is well broken up. Add milk slowly until you have a batter-like consistency, but it is not soupy. You may not need the full amount. Set aside for about 5-10 minutes.

Heat frying pan and melt butter. Ladle matzah mixture into pan and fry until lightly brown on both sides. Serve hot with powdered sugar, sour cream and berries, or after Passover, with maple syrup. Makes approximately 4 medium sized rounds.

Variations: If you have matzah farfel or matzah meal left over, they can also be used in place of, or in addition to, soaked matzah in the batter. You can also try grated apple or pear in the batter. For savory matzah brei, add an extra egg, onions and salt to egg mixture instead of cinnamon, sugar, and milk.

BETTY GOODFRIEND'S SALMON SOUFFLÉ

This quick and easy recipe would fit deliciously at your leftover matzah brunch or, as Betty Goodfriend, a known Atlanta Jewish cook, suggested, as the main course for a Passover luncheon. Just add a mixed salad or your choice of cold or warm vegetables.

2 cups milk
1 stick margarine
1 cup matzah farfel
6 eggs
salt and pepper to taste
1 lb. can of salmon (drained)
½ tsp. paprika (for colour)
1 tbsp. lemon juice

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 2-quart soufflé dish.

In a medium saucepan, scald milk (heating just until bubbles appear at edges of pot), then melt margarine in the milk, stirring with a wooden spoon. Stir in matzah farfel and let cool.

In a large bowl, whisk eggs until foamy. Add paprika, lemon juice and salmon. Add salt and pepper to taste. Fold cooled farfel mixture into salmon and pour into greased dish. Bake 50 to 60 minutes until nicely risen and golden brown.

Serving suggestion: Grate medium or sharp cheddar cheese over top of soufflé while still warm.

Variation: If you have more time, Goodfriend said this dish could also be prepared with 6 oz. of fresh salmon, poached, drained, and broken apart.

Side Note: When I asked Goodfriend what she does with her matzah leftovers, she said, "Eat them!" Her family enjoys regular matzah with her husband, Cantor Isaac Goodfriend's guacamole, or egg matzah spread with homemade chopped liver, or any matzah covered with soft butter, all year around.

There is no easy way to confront anti-Semitism

By LEORA BERESKIN
Special to The CJN

I get really scared when I see all the anti-Semitism on campus. But what scares me even more is that I – and other Jewish students – often feel so helpless that we ignore the problem.

Guest Voice

My school, the University of Waterloo, is incredibly multicultural, with Chinese, Indian, Russian and Muslim students. But I'm not going to skirt around the facts as I see them: most of the anti-Semitic acts on campus are performed by Muslims.

When I first came to Waterloo, I met some wonderful Pakistani students and we became friends. I started to think, in my naive way, that if only the world's political leaders could see each other as individuals and friends, then there would be understanding and peace. That idea was shattered when I heard some of my acquaintances make strong anti-Israel comments.

In addition, I have learned that there is a map of the world in the math building that doesn't have Israel on it. There was a Holocaust lecture that ended with inappropriate and derogatory questions. And there are frequent letters to the editor in the school newspaper calling Israel a fascist state and Islam a peaceful religion.

So there is definitely a problem with anti-Semitism on campus. Now we need to know how to deal with it. One of my friends got into a physical fight after someone started insulting Israel and Jews. I don't think that's the appropriate response. First, I don't think violence is a good solution to conflict. Second, I can barely open up a tightly closed jar, let alone get into a fight. And finally, most anti-Semitic messages do not involve speaking directly to a Jew. They are on posters, in newspapers and on TV, which makes them far more dangerous because the accusations cannot be refuted directly.

My method of dealing with anti-Semitism, I'm embarrassed to admit, is usually to just ignore it. I'm not a very confrontational person and I try to avoid difficult situations. I rarely wear my Star of David necklace anymore. On several occasions, when I've met Muslims and they ask me what my background is, I say I'm Canadian. If they push me further, I may vaguely say I'm from an eastern European family. I do this because when I have told people I was Jewish, they have treated me differently. If they were friendly before, they would become less so. Some tried to engage in political discussions.

Recently I have been told: "Since you're Jewish, you must be really happy about the war against Iraq."

After a few such incidents, I've become hyper-sensitive, and even tried to avoid talking with some Muslim people, for fear they will reject me for who I am. My fear of racism is making me racist against them. Now that's scary!

To get another perspective, I talked to Bernie Glick, the department chair in biology at Waterloo, about all the anti-Semitism on campus.

He said, "Although the university has a responsibility to allow the free exchange of ideas, free speech is not an absolute right in Canada and preaching hate against an identifiable group is a crime."

Thus, it seems we are on a slippery slope, trying to decide exactly where discussing world politics ends and where hate begins. I think this makes it even more difficult to respond to the problem of anti-Semitism.

Glick also said that "intolerance among students is a societal issue and needs to be dealt with as such."

He is absolutely correct.

Anti-Semitism is not just restricted to campuses, it is a widespread problem. It's on television, in work cafeterias and in all parts of the world. In London's Hyde Park Speakers' Corner, people can get up and publicly start ranting about whatever is bothering them. When I was there, about 70 per cent of the speakers were talking about Israel, most of them against it. I watched an Orthodox Jewish couple on a stroll through the park give the speakers a disinterested glance, and then continue with their walk. I'm not judging the couple. I didn't say anything either. And even if I had, I don't think I could have made a difference.

In the same way, I ask myself why I should bother responding when I see an incredibly anti-Israel letter in the student newspaper. My response isn't going to change the minds of the people who wrote the letter.

But maybe it would influence the other students who read it. Most are neither Muslim nor Jewish, but many form their political views while they are in university. They are the politicians, teachers and voters of tomorrow. I think that if they constantly see anti-Israel sentiments, they will start to believe what they read. But if they see a balanced perspective as well, then who knows? Maybe we can end anti-Semitism.

As Glick said, anti-Semitism on campus is a societal issue, and I admire everyone not involved with universities who supports the Jewish students. I was recently talking to a family friend who said she was constantly signing petitions against campus anti-Semitism. I thought it was super cool that even if students such as myself are often too afraid to do anything, there are adults who are standing up for us.

But that isn't enough. We also need to fight from the inside. I don't mean to sound preachy, or hypocritical, but anti-Semitism on campus will become more of a problem if we let it. We just need the courage to fight.

Leora Bereskin is a biology major at the University of Waterloo.

Concordia asks Quebec to de-certify student union

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University has asked the Quebec government to de-certify the Concordia Student Union (CSU), which would strip it of the powers it now has to act unfettered by the administration, rector Frederick Lowy said recently.

He said Concordia has approached the ministries of education and justice to strip the CSU of its certification because it has not acted in the interests of the undergraduates it represents.

The outcome of the provincial election may have a bearing on the response, Lowy said. The Parti Québécois government is "not interested in making any enemies right now," he told a meeting of the Brigadier Frederick Kisch Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Quebec, he said, is the only province that permits student governments to be certified like labour unions. This status allows the CSU a great deal of autonomy, he said. It obliges the university to collect dues from students and turn them over to the CSU to use as it wishes. Currently, the CSU has $1.3 million at its disposal.

"If they want to spend it on propaganda, there is nothing we can do about it," he said.

Lowy said the administration is deeply concerned about the "anarchists" who have controlled the CSU for the past three years and made Concordia a base for its political activism.

The current situation began four years ago, when unbeknownst to the administration, four of these "anarchists" registered at Concordia as part-time students, taking one or two courses, he said.

The four were Canadians who came from Ontario, and three were graduates of York University and the University of Guelph. They were also members of the Canadian Federation of Students, a "militant" national student organization, he said, and advocated a radical anti-capitalist ideology.

Lowy said they took advantage of student apathy and won seats on the CSU executive three years ago, and since then, people holding the same ideology have dominated the CSU.

In their first year in office, they alienated students and, in order to avoid defeat in the next elections, formed an "alliance" with Muslim students, he said.

"They entered a pact: You vote for us, we will support your causes… For the Muslims, that was principally the Arab-Israeli conflict," he said.

Lowy said it is not known precisely how many Muslim students are at Concordia, but the university estimates they account for about 3,000 of its 29,800 students.

The vast majority, he said, are not international students. This year, Concordia has 298 students from Arab countries. "The largest number [of the others] are first-generation Canadians or landed immigrants from North Africa, Jordan, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq. The Palestinians are a minority."

The numbers at Concordia reflects the rapid growth of Montreal's Muslim community, Lowy said. According to his figures, there are 250,000 Muslims in Montreal, including 100,000 who have come in the past five or six years.

While their propaganda has been "very intense," he believes, only a small number of Muslim students identify with terrorist groups like Hamas. But that could change, he thinks, depending on the Muslim political opinion worldwide and the outcome of the Iraq war.

Lowy said not all students engaged in pro-Palestinian activism are Muslim. A few are "anti-Zionist" Jews, he said, noting that Jews are among those facing criminal charges and charges under the university's code of conduct for the violence last Sept. 9 that forced the cancellation of a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Lowy said the police, who numbered more than 100 that day, were "outsmarted" by the pro-Palestinian demonstrators, who broke through the security perimeter.

He said the university and police continue to try to identify persons in the riot from the "extensive" video footage available by matching them with the photos of nearly 30,000 Concordia students.

Coast to Coast

Spurious linkages on the CBC

Israel is not involved in the Iraq war. Israel is not even part of the 45-nation "coalition of the willing." Yet with increasing frequency, it is being dragged into the conflict through anti-Israel polemics that usually take the form of wrongly comparing the cases of Iraq and Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For instance, on March 19, as the U.S. launched the opening salvos in its war on Iraq – reportedly against Saddam Hussein himself – Eric Margolis sat alongside Peter Mansbridge as CBC News' principal foreign affairs analyst.

Margolis said: "I think it's important to note that [Saddam] is such a high target right now because the Bush administration has been very influenced by the current Israeli government of [Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon, which itself has embarked on a long campaign of assassinating Palestinian leaders, and they found this technique very effective in trying to decapitate an entire leadership. I think this has influenced the Bush administration and its idea to try and kill the Iraqi leadership before launching the war. It's not what gentlemen do, but it's certainly a very effective technique."

Several minutes later, Janice Stein of the University of Toronto's Munk Centre gave a fitting rebuttal to Margolis: "Even among those who oppose the war, the question's been asked again and again, why doesn't the United States try to take out the one man [Saddam] rather than punish the whole country?" Her sober analysis of the motive behind targeting Saddam was a welcome contrast to Margolis' conspiratorial statement.

Margolis' penchant for blaming Israel was echoed on March 21. In "Democracy Dominoes," a feature for The National, reporter Carol Off examined the prospects for democratic reform in the Arab world following the Iraq war, placing the onus for reform directly on Israel. "The U.S. plans for democracy in the region are impossible if the status quo continues in Israel," she said.

Off did not mention the need for reform in the Palestinian Authority, a corrupt autocracy under Yasser Arafat which is only now showing possible signs of change, thanks in large part to U.S. and Israeli pressure.

Turning to Dennis Ross, former U.S. Middle East envoy, Off said that Ross also believes that "without changing the status quo in Israel, nothing is fixable." But Ross, who immediately followed with a statement about the need to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, said no such thing.

Since leaving U.S. public service, Ross has been a persistent critic of Arafat and his regime, but none of this came across in his remarks on the CBC.

Also on March 21, CBC Radio News reporter Laura Lynch filed a story from Ramallah. She described anti-war protesters carrying signs that read "No war against Iraq and Palestine."

This sort of linkage, coming from the Palestinians themselves, is not unusual or unexpected. What was unexpected – and totally unacceptable – was Lynch's own take on the issue: "In this part of the occupied territories, in fact throughout the occupied territories, Saddam Hussein remains a very popular figure. He has a lot of support among the Palestinians, at least partly because he gives money to families of suicide bombers and others who suffer, who are victimized in Israeli aggression."

For a CBC reporter to characterize Israel as the aggressor, causing the suffering that Saddam Hussein assuages, is scandalous. It is a direct affront to viewers who are told every day, in a major advertising campaign, that CBC news is "the source Canadians trust."

Temple-church deal on hold

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — A deal is not a deal until it's signed and sealed – and even the most amicable of business relationships sometimes hit bumps in the road. Such is the case in the ongoing negotiations for Temple B'nai Tikvah to purchase the Living Spirit United Church.

An informal agreement reached by synagogue and church leaders stipulated that beginning this summer, the two congregations would share the church facility for three years, and then the temple would assume full ownership of the building.

The temple's membership approved the plan at a meeting March 2, and it was expected the members of Living Spirit would do the same March 16.

Instead, the Living Spirit congregation passed a different motion to explore all issues related to the church's future home over the next six months.

While this development might be seen as a setback in the negotiation process, both temple and church leaders are optimistic that if they work together, the deal will still go ahead on schedule.

"This is a hiccup, not a car wreck," said Rev. Gordon Churchill of Living Spirit United Church. "There is a group within our congregation who were disconcerted by this hiccup and don't want a train wreck."

Rev. Churchill predicted another congregational meeting will be held soon, spurred by a petition from congregants who want to revisit some questions raised in the March 16 meeting.

Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman of Temple B'nai Tikvah said the synagogue leadership "was very concerned about delaying the process for a six-month period," but said that after a recent meeting with church officials, he is confident negotiations will go ahead.

While there is no written agreement at this point, Rabbi Voss-Altman said committees representing the synagogue and the church have agreed on some very important issues, including a purchase price, joint operations and the use of religious symbols.

Hearing from a Son's Perspective

Dear Hearing Solutions,

Thank you for helping my father with his hearing. He used to be known for always adding his two cents to the conversation, but over the years he became more of a sitter-and-watcher. Part of me thought it was just him mellowing. So when he announced he was going to visit Hearing Solutions, I thought it was just another sign of him slowing down. Now with his new hearing aid, I've been put in my place. So has everyone else who cares to hear his opinion. His witty remarks have made a reappearance at family gatherings. Maybe it's because you need to hear the conversation to make snappy comebacks.

Thanks for helping my father hear what he's been missing.

Sincerely,
Brad Felner

'These years have truly been golden, thanks to other seniors who have inspired and encouraged us ... on how to grow older with dignity and maintain a sense of humour.'

Anne and Isadore Lacow at 'work' at the Betel Centre

For real Canadian warmth, it's the Bernard Betel Centre

Isadore Lacow's first impressions of Canada were icy. "We'd hear on the radio about cold Canadian air dumping twenty inches of snow," he remembered. But since moving from Rochester, N.Y., and joining the Bernard Betel Centre 20 years ago, Canada has become a much warmer place for Izzie and his wife, Anne.

That first year in Toronto was difficult. "We came because my wife wanted to see our grandchildren grow up," he says.

Izzie, who fought in Germany during World War II, wanted to keep up his life-long interest in history and current affairs. But even with radio, television and magazines, he was lonely. Anne, he says, "is very outgoing; she can talk for two hours. I'm not very outgoing."

In 1982, Izzie discovered the Betel Centre's Current Events Club, where he met people who shared his passions. The Centre, housed in the B'nai Brith building on Hove Street, was already growing – and moving north, closer to the Lacows' Thornhill home.

When the new building finally opened, Anne had just turned 55 and was now eligible to join. Since then, through courses, the book club, discussion groups and outings, the Lacows have built lasting relationships with good friends and caring staff. Izzie raves about the Centre's "Tuesday morning habit," a weekly series which brings in acclaimed lecturers on many topics.

For Anne, joining the Centre offered a chance to help out others. "The Centre needed volunteer cashiers, and my wife had experience working at Loblaws," Izzie said. He tagged along to help and has been there ever since, offering nutritious kosher meals and serving up welcoming smiles.

With Anne still working regularly in their daughter's wholesale business, and the two actively pursuing different interests and hobbies, they don't see each other much during the day. Izzie, now 83, says their volunteer shifts together mean "I get a chance to talk to her," something couples can overlook when they've been together many decades. Grinning, he says Anne sometimes complains, "You told me that joke 40 years ago!"

After a rich, full life, most people would think twice about trading home and friends for uncertainty in a cold, new city. But for the Lacows, these years in Toronto have truly been golden, thanks to their connection with other seniors "who have inspired and encouraged us," teaching them "how to grow older with dignity and maintain a sense of humour."

Izzie still listens to Rochester radio every night, but now, whether it's sunny, rainy or snowing outside, he knows where to find real Canadian warmth.

Says Izzie: "The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living has truly changed our lives."

Iraq may be hiding weapons in Syria

By GIDEON ALON and ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iraq may be using Syria to hide its long-range surface-to-surface missiles or forbidden chemical and biological agents that can be used to manufacture weapons of mass destruction, the head of the Military Intelligence research unit told the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee on Monday.

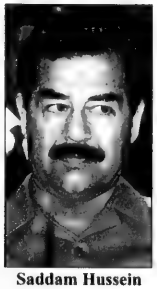
Last December, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had said there was a possibility that Saddam Hussein had sent biological and chemical weapons to Syria, in an effort to hide them from United Nations weapons inspectors.

Brigadier General Yossi Kuperwasser told the committee the likelihood of an attack on Israel was still low, given the current situation, but warned that this could change in a very short space of time – for example, if coalition troops found weapons of mass destruction in Iraq or carried out a significant attack on a leading Iraqi official.

Some of the equipment transferred from Iraq to Syria at the end of 2002 was apparently earmarked for Hezbollah in Lebanon, to be used in opening a northern front against Israel in the event of an American offensive in Iraq.

The shipments contained Iraqi rockets with a range of 100 to 150 kilometres, and possibly also various items that Iraq wanted to hide in Lebanon.

Hezbollah has received rockets from Syria before. But the previous shipments contained Fatah and Tsumud rockets, whose range is no greater than 70 kilometres.



Saddam Hussein

Bashar Assad

The discovery of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq would provide the United States with a justification for its military action and toppling Saddam's regime. But at the same time it is hiding unconventional weapons, reports last year indicated that Iraq has been also trying to increase the number of Scud missiles at its disposal.

It is known, for instance, that the missile cargo captured in late 2002 on a ship bound for Yemen from North Korea was destined for Iraq. The Americans released the ship after Yemen promised to keep the missiles itself, apparently to ensure Yemen's co-operation in the struggle against Al Qaeda.

In addition, the Syrians at one point tried to find Scud missiles for Iraq. Given the Scuds' range, they were obviously meant to be used against Israel in case of war, rather than against other states in the region such as Saudi Arabia.

Syrian military aid to Iraq and the possibility that it is hiding Iraqi equipment raises questions regarding Syrian President Bashar Assad's willingness to jeopardize his relations with the United States. On one hand, Damascus is making an effort to help Washington with information about Al Qaeda, but on the other, Baghdad is exerting economic pressure on it. In addition to helping Iraq, Assad also takes a risk by sheltering and aiding terrorist organizations such as Islamic Jihad and Hamas, hiding behind the claim that they only operate information offices in his country.

Suicide bomber injures 58 people in Netanya attack

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Fifteen people were still in hospital Monday after the suicide attack Sunday in Netanya in which an Islamic Jihad bomber blew himself up near a restaurant in a crowded pedestrian mall in the coastal city.

IDF soldier Gil Cooperman, 21, who was hit in the blast, was in serious but stable condition. Six other people were in moderate condition, and the rest sustained light injuries.

Islamic Jihad, which described the attack as a "gift" to the Iraqi people, said some of its members had reached Baghdad to prepare to attack U.S. forces.

While the bombing coincided with Land Day – an annual day of marches and protests by Israel's Arab citizens against land confiscations – the Islamic Jihad's leaflet, released Sunday, congratulated "the suicide pioneers who have arrived in Baghdad to fight in the ranks of Arab fighters and to perform their holy duty.

"We emphasize the connection between the unity of goals for Palestine and Baghdad, to stand up to the American-Zionist war meant to harm the entire Arab nation and Islam."

Ramadan Shelah, secretary general of Islamic Jihad, also drew a link to the Iraq war, but he seemed to hint that Islamic Jihad suicide bombers had not yet arrived in the Iraqi capital.

The Netanya attack, he said, "is the response to the call for performing holy duties. The jihad is a commandment and now a new gate of jihad has been opened for the entire Islamic nation and, within that framework, the resistance forces in Palestine will work. If the sons of Islamic Jihad and its supporters succeed, they will reach the battlefield in Baghdad to participate in this war," he said, calling for more suicide bombers to go to Iraq.

Some 58 people were wounded in the attack near the Cafe London at 12:55 p.m. Israeli time.

Palestinian sources identified the suicide bomber as 19-year-old Rami Muhammad al-Jameel Ranam, of Dir el-Rasoun near the West Bank city of Tulkarm.

"There was a huge explosion," said a worker at a nearby fish restaurant. "I saw two soldiers thrown to the ground and the terrorist ripped to pieces at the entrance."

The impact of the attack may have been lessened by two factors: the size of the bomb and the bomber's apparent inability to get into the restaurant. Police estimated the bomb weighed about three kilograms – smaller than many used in other suicide bombings – and was carried in a bag by the bomber.

The attack was the first suicide bombing since March 5, when 17 Israelis were killed in a bus blast in the northern port city of Haifa.

Police said they had been on alert for a new wave of Palestinian attacks because of the 12-day-old U.S.-led offensive against Iraq.

"Palestinian terror has once again struck at innocent Israelis," said David Baker, an official in the Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office. "The Palestinian trail of terror continues unabated."

Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian cabinet minister, said the Palestinian leadership "condemns targeting civilians, whether Palestinian or Israeli." He urged the international community to step up efforts to revive Middle East peace talks.

Netanya has been a frequent target of terror attacks, in part because of its proximity to the West Bank. The last terror attack in Netanya occurred in the city market last May. Three people were killed and 76 wounded.

In the deadliest bombing of the past 30 months, a Hamas bomber struck the Park Hotel in Netanya during a Passover seder last year, killing 29 people.

Iraq war could mean trouble for Jews in Arab lands

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — As the U.S. military pounds Iraq, Jewish communities in Muslim countries may become increasingly vulnerable.

Jews are not only tiny minorities in the Muslim world, but to some of their surrounding public, they represent the perceived twin threats of Israel and America.

As coverage from Al-Jazeera and other Arab stations rouses the Muslim world with tireless coverage of the war – which many Muslims think came at Israel's behest – Jewish communities could become a whipping-boy for feverish ideologues.

"There are indications that angry and instigated crowds could turn violent and direct their anger and aggression toward individual Jews and Jewish communal installations," said Steven Schwager, executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

In anticipation of the war, the JDC has been working with Jewish communities in Muslim countries, along with their governments and non-governmental organizations.

The JDC, the North American federation system's overseas partner for relief and welfare, is telling Jews in Muslim countries to keep a low profile and is helping them assess risks, such as attending Jewish schools or synagogues.

The World Jewish Congress has also heightened its contacts with Jews in Muslim countries with a hotline, Web site and weekly conference calls.

"We're acting as a listening post," said Israel Singer, the WJC's chairman. He said there is currently no threat to Jews in Muslim countries, "but we should watch and we should be alert."

Only a handful of Muslim countries have enough Jews to constitute a substantial community. According to the JDC, Iran has 23,000 Jews; Turkey, 23,000; Morocco 5,000; Tunisia, 1,500; Yemen, 280; and Iraq, 60. Hundreds of thousands of Jews in Muslim countries fled their homes, and often prominent positions, when Israel was created and during its early wars for existence.

The rise of two "isms" at the time – anti-Semitism and Zionism – prompted their move to Israel and elsewhere.

Today, Jews are free to leave these countries – although Jews in Yemen and Iran are not allowed to go to Israel.

The Moroccan and Tunisian governments have taken steps to secure Jewish communities with added police protection in Jewish neighbourhoods and institutions. Yet with Muslim populations restive, Jews are on high alert.

"Historically, whatever happened in the world has affected the Jews from Arab countries, but it also depends very heavily on the current Arab leader," said Vivienne Roumani-Denn, executive director of the American Sephardi Federation.

Here is the situation around the region:

• In Tunisia, Jews were already uneasy after Al Qaeda exploded a gas truck last April outside a synagogue in Djerba, one of the main Jewish population centres. The explosion killed 18, mostly German tourists. At its own expense, the Tunisian government rebuilt the synagogue and added security guards. It also beefed up security at another synagogue in Tunis.

The March 16 stabbing of a Tunisian Jewish jeweler – largely dismissed as a criminal, not anti-Semitic act – has further rattled the community, said Jerry Sorkin, a Philadelphia businessman who has operated tours to Tunisia since the mid-1980s and has close ties with its Jewish community. But he said Tunisian Jews consider their home more secure than likely points of immigration such as Israel or France.

• In Morocco, King Mohammed VI has sought to reassure the Jewish community since the outbreak of the war, with public announcements warning citizens against harming each other. Still, the Jewish community is said to be nervous. Jewish schools closed early one recent Friday, as some say the holy Muslim day can lead to a higher risk of attacks.

• In Yemen, a few Jews are scattered in small villages throughout the country. With no Jewish institutions, the community is considered less of a target.

• In Turkey, anti-American sentiment is running high, and Jews have been warned of possible attacks. The well-organized community, which has varied Jewish institutions, has taken measures to secure itself, such as closing schools and dispersing Jews into small clusters for synagogue services.

• Iranian Jewish leaders sent messages to friends and relatives in Europe last week, indicating they did not feel threatened, according to sources close to the community. Despite the trials and imprisonment in recent years of more than a dozen Iranian Jews on what were widely believed to be false charges of spying for Israel, Iran has a thriving Jewish community. Tehran, where most Jews live, has a Jewish old age home, a Jewish hospital, Jewish schools and a Jewish community centre.

• The Jews of Iraq are considered the most vulnerable community in the Muslim world, due to their tiny number and the war around them.

About 40 Jews live in Baghdad, 15 of whom are elderly and live in its synagogue, and the JDC recently learned of 20 Jews living in other cities. When Baghdad is safe for humanitarian groups, the JDC will assist Iraqi Jews in whatever ways they need, Schwager said.

ASSISTANT EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

The Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver provides a full range of recreational, cultural, educational and social programs. With a $5 million operating budget, over a 100 staff, and some 6,500 members and non-members, we are a leader in the provision of programs and services for people of all ages and abilities.

Our rapidly expanding Community Centre is seeking a qualified professional to join our Leadership Team. The Assistant Executive Director will provide leadership and direction to ensure our continued vibrancy and expansion within the Jewish community. Energy and creativity coupled with superior management skills are a given for you. You have excellent planning, organization and communication skills. You also have a proven track record in staff development and work with volunteers and committees.

Reporting to the Executive Director, you will provide strategic planning and development for services and programs, do outreach with other agencies, develop our marketing and customer service, supervise senior staff, as well as assume responsibility for staff and volunteer development, and budget planning. You will feel at home in a fast-paced, demanding environment, able to manage several projects simultaneously, and assume much of the day-to-day operation management.

You will need at least 10 years senior professional experience in community and/or human services, graduate degree in a related field. Significant experience in and understanding of Jewish culture is a major criterion. A very attractive compensation package is provided.

Germany says it's committed to U.S., Israel

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Germany's commitment to Israel and the United States remains strong despite divisions over Iraq, but anti-Americanism on the street is a "worrisome" trend that German leaders should address, American Jewish leaders said after meetings with top German officials.

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, and other top AJC leaders, met last week with German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer.

Harris was with a delegation marking the fifth anniversary of AJC's Berlin office.

The two-day visit included a historic meeting with the board of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, an important step "in bringing our two communities even closer," said Deidre Berger, the office's director.

"Germany is very important for the United States, for Israel and for the Jewish people," AJC president Harold Tanner said. "We feel we can better serve our relations by being here, and we are proud this is our fifth anniversary."

Other events included a roundtable discussion with leaders of the Turkish immigrant community and a seminar on transatlantic relations with the Atlantic Bridge organization.

The meetings took place against the backdrop of increasing public anger here about the U.S.-led war on Iraq. There has been some concern about a potential spillover of anger against German Jews, as the country's Jewish leaders have come out in support of U.S. policy.

Anti-American and anti-Israel sentiment in Europe has been expressed in private boycotts, said delegation member Stanley Bergman.

Some of Bergman's business clients in the United States and Israel reported that major European customers had cancelled contracts because of the political tensions.

"The strong wave of anti-Americanism in Germany was evident to us even in the few days of our trip," Harris said, adding that he found anti-war posters comparing U.S. President George W. Bush to Adolf Hitler "particularly offensive."

"There is a breezy dismissal" by many Germans of America's commitment to Germany, "as if the past 50 years didn't count or as if they can be rewritten as a negative occupation or a subordination of Germany," Harris said. "These trends are worrisome if they continue.

"It is important that political leaders in Germany, whatever their views on Iraq may be, not let this get out of hand. If they speak out, they can influence the public. And if they don't speak out, their silence sends a message."

Carleton Jewish students denied right to protest

Carleton's policy, according to dean of students Leonard Librande, is "to allow the two sides time, but not at the same time or place," he told The CJN Monday.

In this case, he said, signs were intruding on the walkway. "In itself, I probably would have no problems with the signs," he said, adding that the area is more conducive to tables, not the type of display that was held last week by SPHR.

"It provokes us to reconsider whether that's the correct place," he said. "We certainly don't intend to favour one side or the other… We're always looking at our policies."

The display included a "cemetery" under a banner reading "Made in Israel," and a "checkpoint" area with SPHR students in battle fatigues posing as Israeli soldiers, Silverstone said. Jewish students who showed up with signs were greeted by the dean of students, the head of security for Carleton and Bryce, and told they could not display their signs, she added.

First-year student Rena Garshowitz, a member of both the JSA and the Israel Advocacy Committee (IAC), a separate campus group, was one of four Jewish students to show up with a protest sign shortly after the display was set up at 10 a.m.

Her sign bore a picture of the Hebrew University's Frank Sinatra Cafeteria after it was bombed last summer, and on the other side it asked, "Now do you get the checkpoint?"

Garshowitz said a security guard told her and another student they would be evicted from the building if they held up or wore their sandwich-board signs.

One Jewish student called out, "Check them well. Protect our civilians," to the students dressed as Israeli soldiers, she said.

Garshowitz said that in the past, she has kept her distance from SPHR displays, but having been to Israel on a Birthright trip in December and after seeing signs about this event all over campus, she decided to become involved.

"I think [Carlton Under Occupation] exemplifies exactly what is wrong with the political atmosphere at this university," she said. "Campuses are breeding grounds for political stuff. I know that the University of Ottawa has a rule that you can't have any kind of political or religious displays in public areas… I think if people want to express their views in a private area, that's a lot more acceptable."

Both the JSA and the SPHR have tabled many times, Silverstone said. In February, an IAC table in Baker's Lounge was "bombarded" by about 40 pro-Palestinian students "screaming and yelling," she said. Jewish students didn't call security because "that's the way it is at Carleton."

CUSA, whose offices are nearby, did not call security or intervene either, she said. Palestinian students called security, however, because Jewish students had hired a videographer, she said, and they objected to the taping. Security at that time asked the videographer to stop taping.

"So it was rather shocking to us," said Silverstone, "that when four students showed up with some signs to silently protest, they were told that they couldn't. They were told that they'd be removed. Then they decided to protest verbally [and initially] weren't even allowed to talk. At best, I would say Carleton's policies look very confusing," she said.

"All year long we were very provoked and nothing was ever done about it… This seems to be an all of a sudden, ad hoc shift in policy on the ground."

Silverstone has contacted senators and members of Parliament and was planning to send a letter to university administration on Monday to express her confusion.

"I'm upset that for three hours, the Jewish students had no voice, and were not allowed to protest in any way. It's unprecedented."

Ironically, only two days before the SPHR event, the JSA held a dinner with students from the U of O's Muslim Student Association to promote informal, non-political dialogue. Muslim students from Carleton declined the invitation.

Leor Grebler, incoming president of Carleton JSA (the JSA has a co-president from each campus), said he thinks if the JSA can organize more projects like the dialogue dinner, perhaps there will be even less interest in political events such as last Thursday's.

Bush and Saddam both link war in Iraq with Arab-Israeli dispute

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

For diametrically opposed reasons, U.S. President George W. Bush and Saddam Hussein have linked the current war in Iraq with the Arab-Israeli conflict. The American and Iraqi leaders have broadly made the connection in order to rally support in the Arab and Muslim worlds.

Mideast Analysis

Bush and his strongest ally, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, have partially justified the invasion of Iraq by holding out the hope that it will ultimately produce a tremendous political windfall – democracy in Iraq and a two-state solution to end Israel's protracted struggle with the Palestinians.

Saddam, by sharp contrast, constantly refers to Israel and the Palestinians in an attempt to portray the allied thrust into Iraq as a Western colonial conspiracy to rob Iraq of its sovereignty and independence and to subjugate the Arabs.

By harping on Israel and by expressing his undying commitment to its destruction ("Long live Palestine, free and Arab, from the river to the sea"), Saddam may be laying out a justification for attacking Israel at a later stage in the fighting.

In the runup to the war, Bush and Blair declared that Saddam's removal from power could bring democracy and stability to the Middle East and usher in the establishment of a viable, democratic Palestinian state alongside Israel.

To hammer home the point, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell demanded that such an entity "must be a real state, not a phony state that's diced into 1,000 different pieces."

Powell was probably alluding to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's conception of a Palestinian state in less than 50 per cent of the West Bank, cobbled together not by a contiguous land mass but by a web of bridges and tunnels.

Bush and Blair hope that a historic Israeli-Palestinian rapprochement can be achieved by means of the "road map," sponsored by the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia.

The road map, which generally envisages an end to all violence and a full-fledged Palestinian state by 2005, was informally presented to Israel and the Palestinian Authority last December.

Yasser Arafat, the PA president, accepted it in principle, calling for its immediate implementation in light of the fact the PA planned to fulfill one of its basic requirements: the wholesale reform of the PA. Last month, Arafat appointed Mahmoud Abbas as the Palestinians' first prime minister.

Sharon has embraced the road map on the basis of Bush's June 2002 speech, during which he called for Arafat's replacement and a new PA uncompromised by terrorism. Since then, Sharon has requested about 100 amendments, none too keen about the road map's insistence on a settlement freeze in the territories and a Palestinian state within two years.

With the Iraqi war reaching a critical phase, the seven-page document – whose formal presentation has been delayed by Israel's general elections and now by the situation in Iraq – is being aggressively promoted by Bush and Blair. Last week, at a summit with Blair, Bush announced it will be released soon.

Prior to his meeting in Washington with Bush, Blair reiterated the importance of resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict, describing it as a major irritant in the West's relationship with Muslims.

Britain's foreign minister, Jack Straw, went further, saying it was hypocritical to demand Iraq's compliance with United Nations resolutions while effectively letting Israel off the hook. (UN resolutions pertaining to this issue cannot be enforced unless Israel and its Arab neighbours enter into bilateral talks and sign peace accords.)

Iraq, in the meantime, is cynically promoting the war as a Zionist-American plot, even though Israel is basically a bystander and, more importantly, not even a member of Bush's "coalition of the willing."

Saddam, who tried unsuccessfully in the first Gulf War to link Kuwait with the Palestinian problem, talks darkly about the "American-Zionist alliance." In the same spirit, his trade minister claims that the current conflagration is "motivated by the Zionists," while his foreign minister accuses Israel of actually participating in the war.

Although the allies have captured the H-2 and H-3 Iraqi air fields in western Iraq, a possible launching pad for missile strikes against Israel, the Israeli armed forces remain in a high state of alert.

French Jews fear more attacks as war continues

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — France may have chosen not to take part in the U.S.-led war against Iraq, but French Jews already are experiencing some of the war's effects.

With polls showing more than 90 per cent of the public opposed to the war, major cities across France have witnessed large anti-war protests that have often been strongly anti-American and anti-Israeli.

The atmosphere exploded into violence last month, when pro-Palestinian demonstrators attacked two Jewish youths outside the offices of the Hashomer Hatzair youth movement in Paris. The youths were taken to a nearby hospital and treated for light injuries.

Politicians issued belated, if forceful, condemnations of the incident. But French Jewish leaders are worried about further attacks, as well as the possibility that attempts by Jewish vigilantes to defend the community may lead to street battles.

According to the Paris-based Bureau for Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism, the march was characterized by a number of anti-Semitic incidents, including insults hurled at Jewish passers-by and Holocaust imagery depicting Israel.

Estimated at around 100,000 people, the protest was far from minor. Apart from the regular far-left and pro-Palestinian groups, representatives from mainstream French political parties were also present, including former prime minister Laurent Fabius, Green Party presidential candidate Noel Mamere and Socialist leader Francois Hollande.

Despite the fact the Hashomer Hatzair attack was filmed by a camera crew, it took more than two days for protest organizers to offer a clear condemnation. Official responses were also slow to come, and began to filter through only after Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe visited Hashomer Hatzair's offices.

A Green Party spokesperson said she didn't learn of the March 22 attack until two days later – not surprising, given sparse media coverage of the incident.

In fact, many newspapers carried an Agence France Presse dispatch claiming there had been "clashes" near the Hashomer Hatzair premises. That raised the possibility that Jewish activists from Betar or the Jewish Defense League had clashed with members of the pro-Palestinian group Joint Appeal for Peace and Justice in the Middle East, known by its French acronym CAPJPO.

CAPJPO's president, Olivia Zemor, said Betar supporters had attacked members of her group and that CAPJPO would be asking for police protection. "Of course we're not anti-Semitic. I have a Jewish mother and father," she said.

Asked how many people from CAPJPO had been injured in the alleged fracas, Zemor said she did not know the "exact figure." She then admitted no one from her group had been hurt.

Hashomer Hatzair spokesperson Yoni Smadjar rejected Zemor's version of events. His account was backed up by the camera crew, which made its footage of the attack available to police.

5 The Fifth Plague

This story recounts the fifth of the 10 plagues that God inflicted on the nation of Egypt before freeing the Jewish people from slavery. It has been adapted from Exodus 9:1-9:6 and the Midrash.

"Your Majesty," intoned the crier, " (Moses and Aaron) are here to see you."

Pharaoh angrily threw down the papyrus scroll he had been reading, which landed on his cat Abyssinia, who screeched loudly. Pharaoh didn't like it when those two brothers, Moshe and Aharon, came. They always warned of some catastrophe, and it always occurred just as they predicted. But of course that was all a lucky coincidence. Still, Pharaoh wasn't interested in dealing with them. He toyed with the idea of unleashing his lions at the two approaching brothers, but he knew it wouldn't accomplish anything. The last time he had tried, the lions had docilely licked Moses and Aaron, and showed no sign of their usual fierceness.

Moses and Aaron approached Pharaoh's throne, and Moses began to speak. Because Moshe spoke with a severe stutter, it was rather difficult to make out what he was saying, so Aaron repeated the message.

"So says God: send out the Jewish people and let them serve Me. For if you refuse, stubbornly keeping them as slaves, I shall send a dreadful plague which will kill all the animals of Egypt. You will have no horses to pull your chariots, camels to ride on, oxen to plow your fields. Only animals brought indoors will survive. And when every Egyptian-owned animal left outside dies, and every animal owned by Jews remains alive, you will see that I am God. It will happen tomorrow!"

Moses continued speaking. "And don't think," Aaron repeated for him, "that you can come running over to me in the middle and beg for the deaths to stop. This plague is going to take about... half a second! After that, it's going to be too late. Are you SURE you don't want to set the Jews free and avoid all this?"

"YES I'M SURE!" bellowed Pharaoh. "Get out of here!"

The two brothers turned and left.

The next day, Pharaoh was sitting in his royal chambers, conferring with his advisors, when a messenger dashed in. "Pharaoh!" he cried. "All the animals are dead!" As he spoke, more people burst in.

"There's a huge traffic jam outside; the camels are dead in the streets!"

"We can't plow our fields, the oxen are dead!"

"The cattle workers are sick — they caught the disease from the animals!"

"The captain of the Royal Guard is dead! His horse collapsed and fell on him!"

"Relax," said Pharaoh. "It's not a big deal. Hey, we're all right. And we can always buy new animals."

Just then, Pharaoh's young daughter came running in crying. "Daddy!" she sobbed. "Abyssinia was outside playing in the garden... and she died!"

"What!?" demanded Pharaoh, jumping up. "No, it can't be!"

But there was no point in going to Moses and Aaron to beg for mercy. As they had said, it was too late.

That night, Pharaoh addressed the Egyptian people. "God did not do this," he declared. "This was probably a bad astrological conjunction, an unlucky star. Or maybe our food supply was contaminated. Also, my sources tell me that one cow belonging to an Egyptian family did not die. So obviously God had nothing to do with this. So don't you all worry."

But Egypt had plenty to worry about. The cow that hadn't died was co-owned by a Jew. And soon, Egypt would experience upheavals that would make the plagues until that point pale in comparison....

Lexx's 'pope' returns home for Tamara

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

In the competitive acting world, prima donnas don't last.

Ellen Dubin is a shining example of an actor who leaves her pride at the stage door. "Put me in a vat of mud, I'll do it for the role," says the 5-foot-10-inches Toronto native.

Dubin, who will only reveal her age as "somewhere in the mid-30s," has immersed herself in unconventional characters: a sexy cannibal, a female firefighter, a marijuana-obsessed daughter. The Jewish actor, who is best known for her sci-fi stints, even undertook a controversial (yet impressive) role as a golf-obsessed pope in the science-fiction TV show Lexx. She also had a part in Highlander: The Raven and Earth: Final Conflict.

Ellen Dubin, a favourite with Lexx fans.

Now she returns to her hometown for a 10-day run of the unique play Tamara, on at Graydon Hall Manor until April 13. As the seductive maid Emilia, Dubin revisits a role she played in the play's Los Angeles production.

But, she says, "the cast [in Toronto] changes the way I tackle Emilia."

A play such as Tamara is sure to be varied each show; the audience chooses which of the 10 characters they wish to follow in the beautiful Graydon Hall Manor as they move from room to room, committing dangerous liaisons.

The theatrical novelty is set in 1927, where an Italian poet celebrated for his infidelity is under virtual house arrest on the orders of Mussolini. The characters, who range from artists to police chiefs, go their separate ways during the performance, and the spectators decide which storyline is most attractive.

"This time, we're allowed to interact with the fourth wall," Dubin says, referring to what the audience is known as in the theatre world. Dubin mentions instances of improv during the L.A. run, such as the time when a frisky audience member decided to join an erotic bedtime scene. Without missing a beat, she kicked and shoved the man out of the bed.

Since the audience can't follow every character's life in the production, Dubin says some people come back numerous times to discover another mystery or scandal.

Dubin herself has come back to the theatre after dozens of credits in film and television. She says performing is in her blood; her mother was the former director of the Leah Posluns theatre school (now defunct).

After a passion for ballet was cut short by a knee injury when she was 19, Dubin's artistic restlessness led her to her inaugural stage appearance as Tzeitel in Fiddler on the Roof at the Limelight Dinner Theatre. Other theatre roles include the redheaded Judy in A Chorus Line and the male-impersonator Beatrice in A Servant of Two Masters.

"In theatre, I can work with a director for a long time, and there's no big rush," Dubin says. "TV has no deep, juicy roles. In Tamara, the characters are like Hamlets in their complexity." Theatre, she says, "separates the women from the girls."

And yet Dubin – who splits her time between Los Angeles and her Annex home in Toronto – revels in the emotionally simple characters that pepper the sci-fi genre. As the cannibal Giggerota the Wicked on Lexx, which she played from 1997 to 2002, she let loose a mix of sexuality and comedy that shot her into cult stardom.

When her character died, the show's fans requested her instant reincarnation. Dubin first returned as a queen, then later as a real estate agent and then finally as the first ever female pope in sci-fi history.

That kind of range spurred Miramax and ABC Disney to cast Dubin as Aunt Beast in the upcoming miniseries A Wrinkle in Time, a $32 million adaptation of Madeleine L'Engle's classic fantasy novel. The dedicated actor donned a 200-pound fat suit, complete with heavy prosthetics, for the role.

As a Brooklyn firefighter in a 2003 summer movie-of-the-week Wild Fire, Dubin had to carry a 65-pound backpack as she weaved between burning trees. And as the alien queen in Lexx, whose head was the only visible part of her body, she lay in a freezing bathtub.

"There's so little work out there, you have to be flexible, you have to be able to do everything," she says.

In fact, a vat of mud could be this actor's ticket to another intriguing role.

Tamara is co-produced with Harbourfront Centre as part of the duMaurier World Stage Festival. For tickets, call 416-973-4000.

Truth is, Toronto actor is in Jewish Veritas episode

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Until recently, Colin Glazer could claim only one Jewish-themed role in his career as an actor – he appeared as Isaac, the patriarch, in a 1992 short film produced by his brother, who is now a rabbi.

Colin Glazer

In the five years since he graduated from York University with a bachelor of fine arts degree, the 27-year-old Torontonian has played more than two dozen roles in film, television, and on stage. He has a principal role in an upcoming episode of the new archeological adventure series, Veritas: The Quest, seen on ABC-TV on Monday nights.

Originally scheduled to air Apr. 7, but likely to be delayed because of the war in Iraq, The Name of God is an episode featuring Glazer as the assistant to a chassidic rabbi played by veteran actor Eli Wallach.

In the show, which was filmed in Toronto last November, the archeologists find a Hebrew relic, which they bring to Wallach's character. "It really explores a lot of interesting Jewish and chassidic themes," said Glazer.

He turned to his brother, Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, for assistance when the original script called for him to say a few lines in Yiddish. (In a later version, they were translated back to English.)

Working with Wallach, who is 87, was "amazing," said Glazer. "He puts you at such ease and really wants to find something more than what's written. It was a joy to work with him. I had such a blast, and learned so much. When I'm his age, I hope to be doing what he's doing at the level he's at now."

Glazer was bitten by the acting bug as a student at Leaside High School, where he played Detective Trotter in a production of The Mousetrap. He also attended North Toronto Collegiate, and continued his Jewish education (which he began at a day school) by attending supplementary schools in junior high and high school.

The semester after Mousetrap, Glazer and a friend wrote a play, which made it to the semi-finals of the Sears Drama Festival. Currently he is working on a couple of screenplays, he said. One of his ideas involves a food show, incorporating another of his interests. At one time, Glazer said, he considered studying to be a chef. Instead, he took a series of jobs in restaurants, working, as many actors do, to support his budding career for several years.

The youngest of four children with two sisters in health-related professions (naturopathy and nutrition), Glazer has "no clue" where his interest in acting comes from. His mother, Esther – whose mandelbroit was a hit on the Veritas set – is a former French teacher. His father, Bruce, a prosthodontist, also doesn't act, according to Glazer – but he made an exception for his older son's film, Fire on the Water, in which he played Abraham.

His passion lies in live theatre, Glazer said, but he also enjoys film. "I love it. I really do. There's something beautiful about having the ability to continually explore something [over repeated takes]."

Having studied Shakespeare at York where he appreciated it for the first time, Glazer has played Romeo at York's Elmina Atkinson Theatre and Hamlet at the University of Toronto's Hart House. "I enjoy Shakespeare a lot. I feel it's an actor's dream."

Unfortunately, he noted, it's hard to keep today's audiences interested in the Bard's plays. "Our attention spans are terrible."

As a child, Glazer developed an appreciation of culture on outings to plays and concerts. "It was important to our growth. Our parents made sure we knew what the arts were all about. It became an important part of my life."

Artist Lena Shugar is seen with her mixed media painting, Living with the Past.

Artist explores the times

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Artist, designer and teacher Lena Shugar recently opened a solo exhibition titled Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow – an exploration of times, which will be on display at the Leonardo Gallery, 417 Spadina Rd., 2nd floor until April 12.

An award-winning, international artist, Shugar has brought together on canvas mystical, mixed media paintings selected from her past decade of imagery.

Shugar was born in Stanislav, Poland, just before the outbreak of World War II. In her art, she captures the intensity of her early memories of continuously fleeing, moving and travelling from home to home through Poland, Russia, Germany and Norway.

"Those early years created my passion for colour, fantasy and imagery," she says.

She arrived in Canada in 1951.

Three themes are expressed in the works in the current exhibition:

Flabitat is an acrylic on canvas series depicting the intensity of her early memories of the war years. "The definitions of house and home, borders, boundaries and fences and the emotional colours of those times are dissonantly portrayed," she says.

In Living With the Past, Shugar has developed a mixed media series that depicts today's culture relating to our historical past.

The third series, In Abstract, combines colour, light, shapes, energy and rhythms of the future.

"I have included one darker piece inspired by the events of 9/11 and reflecting the uncertainty of tomorrow which I titled, Untitled," she says.

A mother of three and grandmother of six, Shugar has exhibited in Sweden, and Israel and throughout Canada. She won the Award of Excellence from the Lindsay Art Gallery in 2001 in her first juried show. Her works can be found in many corporate and private collections as well as on donation cards and magazine covers.

Shugar says her art expresses her emotions. "I enjoy expressing on canvas my thoughts and feelings at that moment, and my life experiences."

For more information on Shugar's exhibition at the Leonardo Gallery, call 416-488-4057.

Religious perspective of Israel

VisionTV this month will examine contemporary Israel from a religious perspective, beginning this Sunday, April 6, at 7 p.m. eastern time.

Faith and Hope in the Holy Land is a four-part special, part of the network's series, Day of Discovery.

"In the land of the Bible, ancient conflicts are played out with the tools of modern-day warfare," states the network. "Contemporary Israel is a land of profound belief and desperate violence."

Hosts Mart De Haan and Jimmy DeYoung will explore the holy city of Jerusalem in an effort to gain a better understanding of Israel.

The series kicks off with a look at the Arab-Israeli conflict. De Haan and DeYoung offer personal reflections on the conflict as they visit the walled plaza of Jerusalem's Temple Mount, a site holy to both Jews and Muslims.

The April 13 instalment, titled More Than Forgiveness, will look at the teachings of Jesus. The hosts speak with people on both sides of the conflict about the path to peace and tolerance.

On April 20, in The Prayer of Gethsemane, Israeli guide Jane Ben Ari takes the viewer on a tour of this famed spot, and Bible teacher Meno Kalisher reflects on the meaning of the words Jesus spoke here.

On April 27, the episode A Weekend in the Holy City will look at religious coexistence in Jerusalem on each of the three faiths' respective Sabbaths.

WARSAW GHETTO DOCUMENTARY RECEIVES WORLD PREMIERE IN TORONTO ON APRIL 6

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is presenting the world premiere of Canadian director David Kaufman's From Despair to Defiance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in its full 70-minute length this week at the Sheppard Grande Cinema, with Kaufman in attendance.

"This screening is part of our year-round efforts to bring our festival to the people in north Toronto and to let them know what we're doing," said Shlomo Schwartzberg, the festival's director of programming.

The festival hosts numerous extra-curricular events throughout the year outside of the festival, which this year runs May 3 to 11 at the Bloor Street Cinema. Last week, for example, the festival presented a screening of the Oscar-winning film, Nowhere in Africa.

Through the memories of six of the remaining veterans, From Despair to Defiance tells the story of the ghetto rebellion and how 700 young Jews earned a place in history. Tickets ($10) are available in advance or at the theatre box office on screening day. Grande Cinema, Sheppard Centre, 4861 Yonge St. Sunday April 6, 7 p.m. 416-324-9121, www.tjff.com.

Business Profile

Rendering firm counts top architects as clients

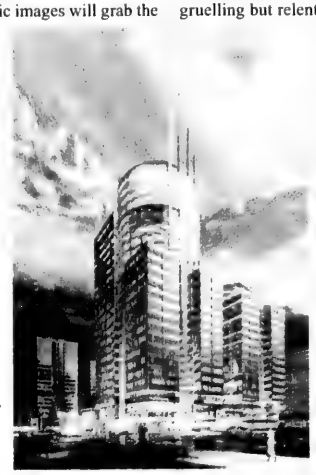
By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Beside Joseph Lang Browns' computer is a black-and-white illustration of a house. It is straightforward and rather bland, typical of the images shown to many prospective homebuyers.

Browns, head of the Toronto branch of architectural imaging company Porto Folio, juxtaposes the picture with a version of the house he has created on his computer screen. There is a stark contrast between the two.

The digital image is three-dimensional and has vibrant colours. Every detail of the house can be seen, such as the shadows and crests on the garage. There are people, trees, grass, rays of sunlight and a midday sky. To make it complete, Browns adds finishing touches by hand, which he says "makes everything more life-like." He says in the real estate business, architectural renderings – the graphic presentation of a real estate project – can be the key to sealing a sale.

"Memorable artistic images will grab the client and will give a more powerful first impression," says the 36-year-old, who has worked for the firm since 1986. "Through that, the number of interested potential customers will increase, and from that, the final sales results will improve."



Since founder Peter Roper made the firm's first images in Montreal in 1983, Porto Folio's renderings have led to many important sales. The company has worked on the renovation of Grand Central Station and Rockefeller Center in New York City, images for the National Capital Commission in Ottawa and overseas projects in India and Japan.

Porto Folio, which subcontracts all its work on a project-by-project basis, counts Canada's top architectural firms as its clients, including Griffiths Rankin Cook, Arcop and Moriyama and Teshima, for whom the firm recently created images for Canada's new war museum.

Roper, who has developed a solid reputation in Montreal, says, "Going international is not a specific objective [although] we'll take work anywhere." The company is currently working on a golf course project in New Delhi, India.

Browns, who has an architecture degree from McGill University and a diploma in stage and costume design, says Porto Folio is a "big fish in a small pond in Montreal," but says the reverse is the case in Toronto.

Since coming to Toronto in late 2000, Browns literally started from the bottom and that meant doing a lot of grunt work.

"The first step was to look in the Yellow Pages under the category of architects... and call every one of them and ask if they hire renderings or not," he says. "Out of 387 [architectural firms], I came up with a list of 100."

Browns, who is hearing impaired, spent a gruelling but relentless two weeks on these calls. He used TTY, a Bell phone relay system, whereby a third party operator translates what is said into text for people with hearing or speech impairments to read.

"More than one person told me I should hire someone with a pleasant voice and some telemarketing ability to call up the 387 architecture firms," Browns recalls. "But I decided to just go on my own instead of hiring anyone."

His independence and refusal to take the easy route paid off. "Many of the secretaries of the firms were very friendly, very receptive, despite the awkwardness," he says.

Browns says he has made headway with several companies on his list. Generally, he meets with clients in person to hear first-hand what they are looking for.

"They often show me samples of something that's been done before," he says. "Sometimes they start with a 2-D image and I have to construct the whole thing."

For an office building, Browns will spend a maximum of two weeks on the rendering, tweaking and perfecting the design on his computer using Adobe Photoshop. He then polishes the design by hand. Throughout the process, clients can see the progress and request modifications.

Browns says the renderings are works of art. "The premise of our service is that nothing can replace artistic human talent," he says. "We offer the unique artistic touch without losing the architectural accuracies that are needed for proper conveyance of building information."

Browns says the price for these drawings range substantially. For an office building, the client can expect to pay between $1,000 and $4,000, with an 11x17 rendering on the less expensive side and 24x36 pricier.

After completing his post-secondary studies, Browns spent five years as a set draftsman/designer in the movie business.

He worked on such high profile productions as The Bone Collector starring Denzel Washington and Pluto Nash with Eddie Murphy.

But while fond of his colleagues, Browns, who is Orthodox, felt that the movie business conflicted somewhat with his views.

"It was not a specific thing or issue, but just the undercurrent value system that permeates the movie business," he says. "I felt it and stopped being comfortable in that environment."

Browns, who did not grow up in an Orthodox family, decided to become more observant after he felt something was "missing" in his life.

"It was a spirituality, an understanding of the meaning of life as a person and as a Jew," Browns says. "I needed a compass, a map of how to live my life the best way possible in the most fulfilling way possible. After a number of years, I confirmed that the answer lay in the Torah and the Orthodox way of life."

Porto Folio founder Roper is not Jewish, nor is he a religious person, but after Browns worked for him as a summer student in 1986, the two became good friends as well as business associates.

"[Peter] is of the rare breed of men who, when they see that someone cares about a friendship, he will return the loyalty at full capacity and without any time limit," Browns says.

He credits Roper with teaching him perspective construction and rendering with prismacolour pencils. Browns shows on his computer what the National Capital Commission project looked like before Porto Folio's rendering – barren and colourless. After a few clicks of the mouse, he displays the final design, an immaculate, bright and captivating building.

"We take the building project of an architecture firm and we present it in an attractive and sellable way – view, angle, colour, location, setting and lighting," Browns says. "The passion lies in using our creative talents to formulate that beauty."

The company's Web site is www.portofolio.com.

Israeli scientist converts fish oil into chocolate spread

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Researchers are regularly reporting new discoveries about the wide-ranging health benefits of omega-3, a polyunsaturated fatty acid most abundantly found in fish oil.

The latest book by scientist Barry Sears, who proposed The Zone diet for optimal health seven years ago, is The Omega Rx Zone: The Miracle of the New High-Dose Fish Oil.

Sears extols high-dose, pharmaceutical-grade fish oil. It is, he says, "as close to a medical miracle as we will see in the 21st century" because of its preventive and therapeutic effect on a host of diseases and disorders.

Omega-3 apparently has such a diffuse effect because of its control of the production of eicosanoids, a sort of "super" hormone.

Sears' enthusiasm is shared by Israeli scientist Dr. Daniel Yam of the Weizmann Institute of Science, whose work on omega-3 has been published in leading medical journals. Yam is cited as a reference in The Omega Rx Zone.

In an e-mail interview, Yam said many of the prevalent diseases in industrialized countries can be traced to a lack of omega-3 in the diet, coupled with the increase in the consumption of omega-6 fatty acids, found in common vegetable oils. Israelis, he points out, consume among the highest amounts of omega-6 in the world and also have among the highest incidence of heart disease, cancer and chronic disorders.

If omega-3 is to become available for consumption in the quantity its advocates believe is needed, fish oil must be processed in such a way that it is highly concentrated yet purified of the toxins found in the waters the fish inhabit, and the fishy taste must be removed.

Capsules are available, but not at a strength that makes taking one a day, like a vitamin pill, enough.

Yam has developed and patented worldwide a process of solidifying fish oil into Yamega, a spread that can be eaten on bread. Its concentration is such that one teaspoon, about enough to cover a slice, is the equivalent of six to 12 capsules.

Yamega also contains lecithin, which is important for brain function; extracts of the herbs turmeric and rosemary, known anti-oxidants that also lower the production of eicosanoids; and vitamins C and E.

The spread is designed for slow release and absorption in the small intestine, which alleviates the digestive discomfort associated with taking omega-3 capsules. Yam says beneficial effects can be achieved after three weeks of daily consumption, and are enhanced if omega-6 consumption is reduced.

Yamega Ltd., founded by Yam in 1999, has its plant at Kibbutz Nachsholim, near Haifa. The spread is licensed by the Israeli health ministry and recently became available commercially in Israel. Yamega is now available in Canada through Ivam, a Montreal-based company headed by Dr. Mili Raviv, a dentist and natural health consultant whose goal is to introduce to the North American market innovative Israeli products, especially those related to health care.

Raviv, who recently returned from a visit to the Weizmann Institute, has been appointed Yamega's scientific director and sole representative on this continent. Her goal is to find a distributor for Yamega. In the meantime, it can be ordered directly through her Web site (www.ivamgroup.com).

Raviv and partner Yael Shahin, a fellow Israeli native whose husband is a doctor, say their goal is to help Israel's struggling economy. Many of the products they promote are made on kibbutzim and moshavim or by small companies.

Raviv says she and her husband and their four children are now using Yamega.

It's not cheap: a 115-gram jar costs $70 (Cdn), but Yam points out this is competitive with the price of omega-3 capsules.

Yam has completed several clinical trials using high doses of the spread to treat cardiovascular disease, cancer and epilepsy. His published results show reductions in cholesterol, triglycerides, blood insulin and hypertension among heart-disease patients. Tumour growth slowed among animals, and now Yam is now trying it on humans with lung and prostate cancers.

Yam is also testing the spread on people with psychiatric illnesses such as depression, schizophrenia and eating disorders, as well as autism, asthma, psoriasis and Crohn's disease.

Strictly speaking, Yamega is not kosher, Yam says. However, the Norwegian refinery that supplies the fish oil assures that it comes only from salmon, tuna and mackerel.

Several rabbis, he said, have authorized the use of Yamega by people with medical conditions and it is being sold to religious Jews with cancer and heart disease, and to pregnant and lactating women in order to prevent gestational diabetes and post-partum depression.

Yam is not optimistic that he will ever be able to completely get rid of the fishy odour and after-taste. But he does promise that Yamega in the near future will produce capsules similar in concentration to the spread, so you can have your fish oil and not eat it.

Computer industry pioneer aids Winnipeg community

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Hersh Korsunsky learned his business acumen from his late father Ted, while his mother Adelle, taught him the importance of tzedakah.

"From the time I was 10 or 11 years old, my mother had me making regular donations to the Dollars for David campaign.

"She taught me that it was important to give as well as get."

Korsunsky, who founded Kortex Computer in 1982, built it into one of the largest computer companies in Canada.

After what he describes as a great run, however, he is looking forward to new opportunities in life.

But before he leaves the field entirely, he has fulfilled his long time dream of donating almost $500,000 of top-of-the- line computer equipment and accessories to Winnipeg's Jewish community.

"I have had a long, interesting and successful career in the computer industry," he says.

"Kortex enjoyed tremendous support from Winnipeggers. This was my chance to give something back to the community."

Donates close to $500,000 in computer equipment

In Kortex's final year as an independent business, the company had a staff of 170, offices in Winnipeg, Toronto and Thunder Bay. and just under $70 million in sales.

Korsunsky decided to get out of the business, though, while still at the top of his game.

"I had a strong sense that there were dramatic changes ahead in the industry.

"My five children – the youngest are six-month-old twins – were too young to be in a position to take over the business any time soon. I felt it was time to look for an exit strategy."

About 18 months ago, Korsunsky sold Kortex to Insight Enterprises, a publicly held, $3 billion American corporation based in Tempe, Ariz.

Under the terms of the sale, he stayed on for a two-year period as the company's co-ordinator of sales for western Canada, in charge of searching out other Canadian acquisitions.

When the contract is up in the fall, he is looking forward to taking time off to spend with his growing family before considering future options.

Working with the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, he donated equipment to nine organizations.

Most of it went to Grey Academy, the largest Jewish day school in Winnipeg, but camps Massad and B'nai Brith, the Aleph Bet day care, the Jewish campus, the Federation, the Rady Centre, the Shalom Residences and Temple Shalom were also recipients.

Included with the equipment was about $100,000 worth of supplies such as toner and ink cartridges for various printers.

"The donations don't just benefit the Jewish community," Korsunsky said.

"Many members of the general community are members of the Rady Centre, and send their children to the Aleph Bet Day Care.

"A part of my motivation for this gift is to set an example and hopefully encourage others to give, too," he said.

Israeli heavyweight a potential contender

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MIAMI — As hundreds of frenzied fans shouted and waved Israeli flags, Israeli heavyweight boxer Roman Greenberg brought back memories of famed Jewish boxing legends Benny Leonard and Maxie Rosenbloom as he jabbed his way to a second round technical knockout of Calvin Miller recently at the Seville Beach Hotel.

With his one-sided victory, the 20-year-old remains undefeated, with an 8-0 record and four knockouts over his two-year career.

Wearing his name and a Star Of David in gold letters on his boxing shorts, Greenberg demolished Miller with attacks to his body right from the beginning of the match.

The referee stopped the bout 53 seconds into the second round of the six-round fight.

"Roman may become the first Jewish heavyweight to compete for the championship in many years," said Greenberg's manager Robert Waterman. "There are representatives of [current world heavyweight champion] Lennox Lewis who are interested in Greenberg as a potential contender in a few years."

"Tonight was exciting because I did not know what to expect," said Greenberg following his victory. "It is another step forward. I am still young but I want to make the move in two years to be a contender for the heavyweight championship."

Born in Russia, Greenberg and his parents moved to Israel in 1993 to escape anti-Semitism. Greenberg's father was a boxer in Russia and sent young Roman to his first boxing club in Israel when he was 11.

"I was always excited about boxing. My father taught me to jab and I never thought of boxing as anything but a sport which I love," said Greenberg.

Greenberg's background is a contrast to the environment that bred the great Jewish boxing champions of the early 20th century.

"Jews lived in ghettoes in the 1920s and '30s. The Jewish champions boxed to elevate their status above the poverty level, as well as taking pride in their ethnic background," said Waterman.

Greenberg shows his pride in Israel not only through boxing, but also by serving in the army for two years (1999-2001). He feels that defending his homeland is a lot harder than any opponent he has faced in the ring.

"I see it as my duty to protect Israel, which faces so many security problems each day. Like every other Israeli, I know people who have died from the terrorist bombings. What I face in boxing is not as tough as what we [Israelis] have to go through to protect ourselves," Greenberg said.

To advance his career, Greenberg moved to London, England, and trains under Waterman, who manages and promotes 40 fighters in Europe. Thus far, Greenberg has impressed the British boxing press.

"Roman is definitely getting the recognition that he earned. There are many boxers now in Israel, but Roman is heads above anyone else," said Waterman.

Greenberg, who is fluent in English, German, Hebrew and Russian, is gaining support in Israel. "Boxing in Israel is getting stronger after being ignored for many years. I hope I can contribute to making it more popular. Channel 5, the top sports station in Israel, is beginning to pay attention to my fights," said Greenberg.

As an amateur, Greenberg won 47 of 52 bouts, including a silver medal in the 2000 World Championships. He turned professional the following year, winning six of his eight bouts in England.

With his rapid rise in boxing, Greenberg could become a positive role model for Israelis if he wins the heavyweight championship in a few years.

"The important thing is to take one step at a time, as I did tonight. I don't want to look too far ahead, but it's nice to dream about being a championship contender," he said.

FICTION

• The Dialogues of Time and Entropy, by Aryeh Lev Stollman, Riverhead Books, HC, $37.50.

This brilliant collection of short stories, published in various magazines in the past decade, is the latest book by the profound author of The Far Euphrates and The Illuminated Soul.

NON-FICTION

• Adjusting Sights, by Haim Sabato, Toby Press, HC, $29.95.

A young man tries to make sense of the world around him in this award-winning autobiographical narrative by a rosh yeshiva near Jerusalem. This magnificently writtten book is set in 1973 during the Yom Kippur War.

• Encounter With Aharon Appelfeld, edited by Michael Brown and Sara R. Horowitz, Mosaic Press, SC, $20.00.

This gem of a volume includes an interview with Appelfeld – one of the most outstanding writers of Holocaust and Israeli literature – a number of his short stories, and critical papers presented at an international symposium at York University on the author's work.

• Matzoh Ball Soup, by Oliver Kramer and Joshua Kramer, iUniverse, SC, $21.00.

A delightful, heartwarming anthology of stories, poems and rabbinical sermons. As expressed by author Barbara Kessel, "…what binds these contributions is their profound humanity – their generous impulse to share personal experiences in a way that invokes community by identifying the universal in the particular."

• Chronicle of a War Foretold: How Mideast Peace Became America's Fight, by Norman Spector, Douglas & McIntyre, SC, $24.95.

The author, a respected commentator and former ambassador to Israel, argues that the forces responsible for the devastating conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians also caused the Sept. 11 attacks. This volume includes a selection of his best columns over the past seven years. A must-read.

• Hatred's Kingdom, by Dore Gold, Regnery Publishing, HC, $44.95.

An important book by the former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations that explains the strong Saudi connection to global terrorism and warns that unless the United States and the free world recognize this fact and act upon it, more atrocities like 9/11 are imminent.

• Out of the Whirlwind, by Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Ktav Publishing, HC, $39.95.

Subtitled "Essays on Mourning, Suffering and the Human Condition," these remarkable essays by the late Rabbi Soloveitchik include discussions on various relevant topics such as the Jewish response to suffering, the meaning of life and the obligation to eradicate evil. This is the third volume of selected writings by "the Rav," a 20th-century giant among talmudists and Jewish philosophers.

PASSOVER BOOKS FOR CHILDREN

• Rachel's Gift, written and illustrated by Richard Ungar, Tundra Books, HC, $19.99. Ages 4-8.

A wonderful story about appreciating the small rewards of life, with magnificent, colourful illustrations by a talented artist.

• No Matzoh For Me! by Nancy Krulik, Grosset & Dunlap, SC, $4.99. Ages 4-8.

Sammy's class is putting on a Passover play, and he gets stuck with the seemingly boring role of the matzah! The story of the holiday is incorporated into this adorable story in which Sammy learns the importance of matzah in the escape from Egypt.

• The Passover Seder: Touch, Turn, Open and Learn! by Emily Sper, Tundra Books, HC, $19.99. Ages 3-7.

This lovely, hands-on book explains the reasons for many of the traditions followed during the seder.

• Rebecca's Passover, by Adele Geras, Frances Lincoln, HC, $26.95. Ages 6-10.

This book follows Rebecca and her family as they prepare for Passover and shows how the festival of freedom is celebrated.

MUSHROOM MATZOH LASAGNA

3 tblsp. olive oil	salt
2 large onions, chopped	pepper
2 cloves garlic, minced	5 matzohs
1 1/2 lbs. mushrooms, chopped	1 cup cheddar cheese, grated
1 cup chopped tomatoes	1/2 cup Parmesan cheese, grated
1/2 tsp. oregano	1 cup tomato sauce

Preheat oven to 350°F and grease 8" square baking pan. Heat oil in large skillet. Cook onions, garlic and mushrooms until soft, about 6 mins. Stir in tomatoes and oregano, simmer 10 mins. Taste for salt and pepper and set aside. Soften matzohs by holding under warm running water for a few seconds. Spread 2 tblsps. tomato sauce on bottom of pan. Layer matzohs alternately with mushroom-onion mixture and cheddar cheese ending with a layer of matzoh on top. Pour remaining tomato sauce over all, sprinkle with Parmesan cheese and bake 30 mins. or until bubbly. Let cool slightly and cut into squares to serve. Serves 6.

HERB CAPLAN. THE APPLIANCE PROS RECOMMEND

DearKarilani

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

In my world issues class, it's hard to avoid talking about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but my teacher approaches the subject from a very biased, anti-Israel perspective. At first, I would always put up my hand and politely say I disagreed, but now every time I do, the teacher and the rest of the class roll their eyes, laugh, and mutter, "Oh right, this again."

The teacher's perspective and his unwillingness to see other points of view really bothers me, but I don't know what to do. I don't really want to take it further, such as to the vice-principal, because I don't feel it's a big enough problem. Any suggestions?

- Perplexed

Dear Perplexed,

It sounds like your teacher is being very immature. I suggest you approach him after class, when nobody else is around, and say, "Look, I know you don't like when I speak in class, but I really think I have worthwhile points." This should work if he is a nice guy and will not be insulted (and start giving you lower marks).

If, however, the teacher is not a nice guy, you may need to take it further. You probably won't need to go to a vice-principal right away. Does your school have a department head for world issues or social studies? If so, tell that person your teacher is presenting a strongly biased perspective on a certain issue, and when you try to offer a different opinion, he makes you feel silly.

If there is no head of the department, or if your teacher is the head, you may need to take things further, whatever that means at your school. It would probably be best if you asked that your name not be used, because the teacher would likely not appreciate your complaining about him. Just ask that he be spoken to and say that's all you want.

You're right that it doesn't make sense to make too big a deal out of this, because you never know how things can escalate. However, I think this is a very big issue that your school should address. If possible, do try to speak privately to your teacher first. He will probably appreciate this direct approach. Then, if nothing changes, you will be more justified in taking the issue further.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Anti-Semitism serious problem: poll

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A majority of Canadians think anti-Semitic sentiment is a serious problem in Canada today, according to a recent poll commissioned by the Association for Canadian Studies (ACS).

At the same time, only a relatively small percentage of Canadians feel Jews project a negative image.

Conducted March 15-19 by Environics Research Group, the poll surveyed 1,570 Canadians aged 18 and over. It is considered accurate plus or minus 3.5 per cent, 19 times out of 20.

The poll found that 54 per cent of Canadians believe anti-Semitic sentiment represents a "somewhat" or "very serious" problem in Canadian society.

Only 12 per cent think Jews project a "somewhat" or "very negative image." Thirty per cent believe Jews project a "very positive" image.

ACS director Jack Jedwab said the apparent discrepancy lies in the fact that Canadians don't consider themselves to be anti-Semitic – accounting for the low negative image of Jews in the poll – yet feel anti-Semitism is a serious problem.

"Individuals don't see themselves as prejudiced, but they do see it as a societal problem," he said. "I was surprised by the results in terms of the positive and negative image issues."

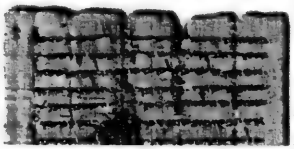
Dead Sea Scrolls coming to Canada

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Three sections of the Dead Sea Scrolls are the centrepiece of a major exhibit of biblical antiquities coming to Montreal this summer.

The Pointe-à-Callière Museum and the Israel Museum are collaborating in the world premiere of From King David to Dead Sea Scrolls.



A fragment of the scrolls

The exhibition, which includes approximately 100 archeological pieces, will run from June 17 to Nov. 2, and then from December to March at the Museum of Civilization in Hull. It begins with the reign of King David, about 1,000 BCE, and ends with the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans in 70 CE.

"These major scrolls, each about a metre in length and discovered at Qumran, are being shown for the first time in North America," said Israel Museum director James Snyder, who was in Montreal last week.

The three sections of the scrolls, which are the earliest biblical texts in existence, are: from the Book of Isaiah; the "community" scroll, which sets out the code of behaviour for the Essenes; and an account of the battle between the forces of darkness and light.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Jewish SARS Death

TORONTO — An elderly North York man is believed to be the first Jewish death from severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) in Canada. He died March 29 in isolation at Toronto General Hospital after being transferred there from Mount Sinai Hospital. He is likely to have contracted SARS at Scarborough Grace Hospital, the Canadian epicentre of the disease, hospital sources said. He was transferred to Steeles Memorial Chapel in a special shroud as a precaution and buried March 30 at a North York cemetery after a private funeral with quarantined family members. The disease prevented ritual preparation of the body, the funeral home said.

ISRAEL

Starbucks Closes

TEL AVIV — Starbucks said last week it is shutting its cafés in Israel. The six cafés, all in the Tel Aviv area, were 80 per cent owned by the Delek Group, which reportedly lost 10 million shekels on the venture in 2002. No reasons were given for the closures, but analysts attributed the failure of Starbucks to competition from established cafés, security issues and Israel's recession.

Rabin Acquittal

JERUSALEM — An Israeli undercover agent and informer was acquitted last week of charges he failed to prevent the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. A court ruled there was no evidence Avishai Raviv knew Yigal Amir was plotting to kill Rabin. Raviv, a right-wing activist, was working for the Shin Bet security service when Amir killed Rabin in 1995. Prosecutors said he heard Amir boast of his plans, but did not tell his Shin Bet handlers. Amir is serving a life sentence and three others are in jail for helping him or for knowing about the plot.

No Revocations

JERUSALEM — Israel won't revoke the citizenship of Israeli Arabs convicted of involvement in terrorist activity, Interior Minister Avraham Poraz said last week. Poraz said he would halt the policy initiated by his predecessor, Eli Yishai, because there were other ways to address the problem. His comments came up after three Israeli Arabs from Jaljulya were charged last week for allegedly operating a bomb-making factory for Islamic Jihad, the first terrorist explosives lab found inside Israel.

WORLD

Anti-Semitic Textbooks

NEW YORK — Textbooks used in Islamic schools in New York teach that Jews betrayed the prophet Mohammed and believe in racial superiority, according to an investigation by the New York Daily News. The books, which also denigrate Christianity, are published by companies that distribute textbooks to Islamic schools in the United States. The director of one of the companies told the Daily News that some passages need to be changed. But the second publisher, Yahiya Emerick, stood by the books. "Islam, like any belief system, believes its program is better than others," he said.

Guide to Road Map

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. President George W. Bush's "road map" for Mideast peace "requires an end to the use of violence and terror as a political tool," Secretary of State Colin Powell told the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's annual policy conference last week. He also repeated Bush's call for an end to settlement activity. Meanwhile, according to Jewish officials who heard her speech, Bush's national security adviser Condoleezza Rice said the plan is non-negotiable, but Israel will be able to comment on it.

AIPAC Site Hacked

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The American Israel Public Affairs Committee's Web site was hacked last week during the lobby group's annual policy conference. While there were no protesters at the meeting, the site's main page was replaced with a statement that said "try lobbying for some peace." It also greeted "all Muslims and all people across the world who are opposed to this ZIONIST-AMERICAN oil war."

French Hate Up

PARIS — Racist and anti-Semitic attacks in France last year were the worst in almost a decade, a leading human rights group said in its annual report last month. The National Consultative Commission for Human Rights said 313 violent racist acts were recorded in 2002, up from 71 in 2001. Anti-Semitic attacks made up more than 60 per cent of the total. As well, 731 out of 992 recorded acts of racist intimidation or threats were anti-Semitic.

Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade Added to Terror List

OTTAWA — Federal Solicitor General Wayne Easter last week added the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade to Ottawa's list of banned terrorist organizations.

The group, an arm of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah organization, has claimed responsibility for scores of suicide bombings and other attacks inside Israel and in the West Bank and Gaza.

The addition of Al Aqsa and six others brings the number of banned terror groups in Canada to 26. They join Palestinian organizations Hamas and Islamic Jihad and Lebanon-based Hezbollah on the list. Under the Criminal Code, it is a crime to give material assistance to any of these groups.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada both praised the move, but questioned why the Tanzim militia, also an arm of Fatah, was not also included and why it takes Ottawa so long to implement the bans.

"It's unfortunate the government doesn't move faster," said CJC President Keith Landy, adding he urged Ottawa to make the move last December when it put Hezbollah on the list.

Pro-Israel MP Day advocates 'what is right'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Stockwell Day prefers not to be known as pro-Israel. The former Canadian Alliance party leader and leader of the opposition – now senior foreign affairs critic since Apr. 2002 – would rather express the same idea using terms like pro-democracy, pro-truth and pro-"what is right," he said last Tuesday.

"The situation related to Israel happens to fit in with that," he said, "not that the Israeli government and everything Israel has ever done is perfect."

Speaking at a lunch sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region at the Lipa Green Building, Day, who visited Israel in January, called Israel an "island of democracy in a sea of dictatorship." Among the evidence he cited were concurrent prayer services of Jewish, Muslim and Christian worshippers, and protests against the Israeli government "in a way for which [the protesters] would be arrested in many of the neighbouring countries."

His trip, which he noted was sponsored in large part by the Canada-Israel Committee, included a visit to Ramallah and meetings with Palestinian leaders and businesspeople.

"We live in a day where we have to be speaking up for what is true and right," said Day, who also spoke at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and York University the same day.

Day believes there is about to be a change in the way diplomacy is conducted internationally, to avoid the habit of "never really confronting the real issues that are dangerous and awkward to talk about."

It will be a good change, but a difficult one, he said. Citing the recent rise in anti-Semitism in Canada and elsewhere, and the possibility of massive destruction by terrorist networks, he said the stakes are "simply too high to allow for the soft pedalling of issues that should be confronted."

Principle has to trump politics when it comes to policy, he said.

The Alliance party's policy on a number of issues is at odds with that of the federal government, he added. Among them are the banning of terrorist groups like Hezbollah and the use of tax dollars that are "misdirected towards things like textbooks that actively promote hatred against an identifiable group, in this case the Jewish people.

"We must speak out against that," he said.

On a broader scale, Day outlined the Canadian Alliance position that Canada should have been, and should be now, alligned with the coalition of "our historic allies" to disarm Iraqi president Saddam Hussein.

Canada's new allies are now nations like Syria, Libya, communist China, France and Germany, said Day, sporting a Canada/U.S. flag pin in his lapel. Countries like Australia, Great Britain, and emerging democracies "don't understand why we're not there with them," he said.

Day was not advocating "a new era of invading anyone who disagrees with us," he stressed, but rather "advancing what is good, confronting what is evil, and doing it unashamedly and with strength."

Ambassadorial thoughts

From the editor's desk

Israel's Ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, spoke with The CJN last week to impart his Pesach holiday good wishes to the paper and its readers. The conversation was held against the backdrop of a sense of burgeoning, community-wide tension. Television and radio were reporting: heavy fighting in Iraq in advance of coalition forces' entry into Baghdad, the latest SARS-related death in Toronto and an ice-sleet-snow storm warning for the lower Great Lakes region of Ontario.

As is his trademark, the ambassador spoke softly yet assertively, combining imperturbable, analytical cool with animated, Israeli passion.

Our conversation ranged much farther afield than the upcoming spring holiday. The following are but a few excerpts from the conversation.

"The threat is not over for Israel," the ambassador said in reference to the latest news from Iraq. "We cannot relax just yet. On the contrary. As the coalition forces advance in all parts of the country, Saddam might decide to use his unconventional weapons.

"In spite of the lingering threat, though, I can assure you that there is no panic in Israel. There is concern. There is worry, yes. But there is no panic.

"People go about their lives in as normal a way as possible. Nothing illustrates this better than our schoolchildren.

"They go to school carrying a lunchbox in one hand, their gas mask kits in the other hand and their books on their back."

The image was indeed a powerful one, and I thought about the poignancy of Israeli life, constantly striving to find the balance point between vulnerability and defence, between shelter and open spaces.

Divon seemed to hear my thoughts.

"It is really a tribute to the great spirit of Israel and to the strength of its people.

"Most people in Canada forget that Israel is the most threatened country in the world. Many Canadians look at our conflict with the Palestinians as the chief threat to Israelis. But that is just one of the threats, just one of the aspects of a much wider conflict aimed at us."

The ambassador elaborated. "Take, for example, simply the news from this or from last week.

"There are a number of ongoing threats. There is the possible threat from Iraq. There are the thousands of missiles pointed at us from Lebanon by Hezbollah. There is Syria, whose president, only last week reiterated his unwillingness to make peace with us. (See editorial page 8.) There is also Iran, whose leaders are making a great effort to acquire a nuclear capability. And of course, there is the threat from the Palestinian terrorists such as [the recent] suicide bombing in Netanya."

Haim Divon

To underscore the misery of the unceasing nature of the threat Israelis face, the ambassador told me of a letter he had read a short while ago in one of Israel's dailies; it was from an elderly Holocaust survivor. For the third time in his life, the old man wrote, he now found himself facing the threat of the use of deadly gas against him and his loved ones. He was referring, of course, to the Nazis during World War II and to Saddam Hussein in 1991 and in 2003.

"It is important that the Canadian public realizes the dangers that Israel faces on an ongoing basis, that no other country on earth faces such similar dangers. When you look at the level of the threats, it is true, we must take self-protective measures, but our spirits are still so high. And that is remarkable.

"It is also remarkable that despite the unending threats, we not only stay, but strengthen our democracy. Even under situations of emergency, we just held flawless elections in which the voter turnout was higher than in the last Canadian or American elections.

"Where is there another country in the world," the ambassador asked rhetorically, though pointedly, "that can sustain such constant pressure and still retain its vibrant, thriving democracy?"

Divon's intention, of course, was not to minimize the other democracies of the world. Rather, it was to illustrate the robust resilience of the tiny Israeli democracy. We spoke at length about the mood in Israel, the conflict with the Palestinians and the state of Israel's economy.

The ambassador was cautiously optimistic about the possible positive impact of the appointment of Abu Mazen as prime minister of the Palestinian Authority on the resumption of any peace process with the PA. He also expressed the hope that individuals would resume their travel to Israel to "see Israel beyond the images," for it can be a moving and inspiring sight, especially for those who visit Israel for the first time.

"These are indeed difficult times from any number of points of view," Divon said. "And yet, Israel is creating and achieving in science, in culture, in sports, in the sheer simple beauty of everyday life.

"And that is the testament, perhaps, to the unique characteristic we remember at this time of year. We will not bow down or surrender to the tyrants who threaten us. We learned that lesson thousands of years ago as we emerged m'avdut l'cherut, from slavery to freedom.

"Please," the ambassador urged, "convey to your readers, from me, from the government and from the people of Israel, a chag samayach."

York panel on Mideast and free speech called biased

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish point of view was marginalized in a recent roundtable discussion on free speech and the Middle East held at York University, says Zac Kaye, the director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

The event, which was scheduled from 2:30 to 4 p.m. on a Friday afternoon, began just as the Muslim prayer services were ending at York's nearby Scott Religious Centre, and many students came into the lecture hall immediately after their prayers ended.

However, scheduling the six-person panel late on a Friday afternoon made it difficult for Jewish students and faculty to attend, Kaye said, adding that "it wasn't the kind of forum that allowed Jewish students to express their opinions comfortably."

He said a great deal of time was spent discussing the anger felt by Muslim students over the appearance of right-wing academic Daniel Pipes at York University in January. Frustration was also expressed over the presence of police on campus during anti-war demonstrations March 5. However, the fact police were needed to protect Jewish students was not discussed, Kaye said.

York's director of media relations, Cim Nunn, who attended the discussion, said he felt the panel presented "a broad range of pro-Arab and pro-Israeli points of view."

Nunn also said the university scheduled the event at the only time a large lecture hall was available.

The panel consisted of York president Lorna Marsden, York University Faculty Association president Susan Dimock, political science professor Ian Greene, political science professor Saeed Rahnema, social science student Rabia Siddiqui and Jewish studies student Noah Slepkov.

Jewish point of view marginalized, says Hillel director

Slepkov, who represented the Jewish perspective on the panel, told The CJN that he tried to explain how the university's passive attitude toward hate speech and propaganda directed against Israel has allowed for an escalation of rhetoric that has left many Jewish students feeling helpless.

Slepkov said he called on the administration to retake control of the university and "stop the flow of hate speech and hate propaganda when it surfaces."

Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said he could not attend the event. However, he said he was concerned by some of the issues not addressed by the panel.

A form of intellectual intimidation takes place in classrooms when professors rant against Israel or grandstand their positions on world events, Lockshin said.

"The misuse of podiums by professors to advance political agendas in courses that have nothing to do with the Middle East" can be upsetting for students caught unprepared for these kinds of discussions.

Jewish kids wind up "squirming in their seats," Lockshin said.

While he said he isn't advocating for classroom police, he would like to see the "power relationship issue" explored so that professors understand they may be misusing their positions if they impose their views in a lecture that does not advertise itself as a political science class.

The Centre for Jewish Studies was not invited to attend nor was it consulted about the roundtable discussion, sources said.

"It's unfortunate that an event such as this focused on the lone Jewish voice of an undergraduate student against a bunch of professors," Lockshin said.

Moderator Patrick Monahan, associate dean and professor of constitutional law at York's Osgoode Hall Law School, asked The CJN not to attend the panel on free speech.

Nunn later apologized to The CJN, saying the university did not intend to restrict the media from attending a panel on free speech.

The event was meant to be open only to the York community because of limited seating, Nunn said. However, he noted that no identification was needed for entry and it turned out that many people from outside the York community did attend.

Rabbi, imam and priest find 'unity in diversity'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When a reverend, rabbi and imam gather to discuss religion, you might expect some fireworks.

But the tone of a recent meeting between three such clergy was one of commonality and understanding, not divisiveness.

"We have a unity in diversity," said York University professor Michael Brown, who moderated the multi-faith discussion last week at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where Rabbi Martin Berman, Rev. Damian MacPherson and Imam Abdul Hai Patel discussed the role of men and women in their respective faiths, and talked about sacred texts and their views on intermarriage.

The Muslim and Christian clerics explained that Jewish texts are key to each of their religions.

"We accept [the Torah and the Christian Bible] as books of God," said Imam Patel of the Canadian Council of Imams.

"We believe in all the real books of God."

Rev. Macpherson of the Toronto Roman Catholic Archdiocese, said his church places such importance on Jewish texts that daily readings in church are taken from Hebrew Scriptures.

"Revelations of the Hebrew Scriptures are essential elements of the faith and of our lives," Rev. Macpherson said.

Rabbi Berman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue echoed the sentiment of sacred texts being key to Judaism.

"You can't think of Jewish life and tradition without the Torah," Rabbi Berman said.

The religious leaders spoke about the similarities and differences between the faiths regarding the roles of men and women in religion.

For instance, as in Orthodox Judaism, Islamic men and women pray separately in mosques and men are always the prayer leaders.

By contrast, in Catholicism, although the Pope has decreed that priests must be men, men and women pray together in church.

Imam Patel stressed that many Muslim countries have misinterpreted the Koran and have imposed restrictions on women that are incongruous with the Koran.

"Nowhere in Islam are women prohibited from driving," Imam Patel said, in reference to Saudi Arabia where that prohibition exists.

He noted that some Muslim scholars have misinterpreted one verse in the Koran as saying that a "man is a degree higher than women."

Imam Patel said that while polygamy is acceptable in some Muslim countries, it is "not required," and Muslims in Canada recognize that "polygamy is against the law."

Rabbi Berman said significant nuances exist between Reconstruction, Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Judaism regarding gender roles.

"It's an area of great turmoil and great discussion," he said.

Rev. MacPherson said the feminist movement has had reverberations in the Catholic community.

"In more recent times, women have been invited to be as participative as they can in the life of the church," he said.

One of the things that clearly differentiates the three faiths is the way they regard intermarriage.

Marrying a person outside of the religion is prohibited in Judaism unless the non-Jewish person converts, a ban not mirrored in Islam or Christianity.

"Christians can marry out of faith if they receive permission from a local bishop," Rev. MacPherson said. But he noted that couples who do intermarry are expected "to raise the children in the Catholic faith."

Islam tolerates intermarriage, but with a significant caveat. "Muslim men can marry Christian or Jewish women and they don't have to change their religion," Imam Patel said. But if a Muslim women wants to marry a non-Muslim, the man must convert to Islam.

Like father, like son, alas

When he ascended to ultimate power in Syria, after the death of his father nearly three years ago, western leaders had high hopes for Bashar Assad. After all, he was an ophthalmologist, trained in the West and educated in the empirically objective truths of science and medicine.

But the hopes were quickly dashed.

The son, alas, was very much in the mould of the father. That was painfully apparent in May 2001 at an official state reception in Damascus the young president hosted in honour of the Pope. The ophthalmologist discomfited and embarrassed his guest by launching into a sordid diatribe against the Jews that could have been written by Torquemada.

Since then, young Bashar has distinguished himself only by being indistinguishable from his deceased father. The transition in power from the father tyrant to the son tyrant was seamless. Nothing in Syria has changed. It is the poorest country in the Middle East. There is no freedom. The secret police closely monitor the peoples' lives. And Damascus is still headquarters for a raft of terrorist agents and their anti-Israel, anti-West ideology.

On March 27, the young president gave an interview to the Lebanese daily As Safir. It was a lengthy, self-serving, often incoherent discourse concerning the war in Iraq. But amidst the rambling and prevarication, he did say a few things that were crystal clear.

When asked by his interviewer whether Syria felt threatened by the war, Bashar lifted a curtain to allow a view into the darker corners of his soul. "As long as Israel exists, the threat is there," he answered in somewhat of a non-sequitur. But he quickly corrected himself and steered the answer more to the questioner's point. "As long as there is aggression against an Arab country and as long as there is war on our border, the danger exists."

Then the young president elaborated. "Not one of us trusts Israel, not the Syrians not any Arabs. It is natural for us to expect Israeli attacks all the time, even if no Israeli threats are made. We must know that Israel depends on treachery. Through its mere existence Israel always poses a threat."

But he could not restrain himself. He could not hide his true feelings about the Jewish state. "Israel's structure is different. It is a state with one colour, a religious colour. Its democracy is a democracy within this one colour. It is not a democracy within the border of a state. So Israel cannot be a legitimate state if peace is achieved because its shape [read: its Jewishness] is the exception in the region, and perhaps in the whole world."

Despite his years of education, he is, indeed, alas, like his father. And there is much less than meets the eye.

Continue on God's path

As a Zionist, I would like to make some comments and observations on anti-Semitism. Many people in the Jewish community, including myself, continue to go about our business, quietly assisting Jewish families in our community, and we are steadfast in our commitment. We know about the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust, so we have decided to become caretakers of the living, bringing comfort and understanding of the Jewish faith and deep respect for the dying.

We live in violent times. However, if it's any consolation, we will continue on our path of what we really believe God wishes us to do.

Liberals undeserving of support

I read the Perspectives pieces in the March 27 issue of The CJN with considerable astonishment ("On the government of Canada: Canadian Jews should rethink alliances," "Liberals' policies increasingly irrelevant"). I have been reading your newspaper since its inception, primarily because of my involvement with our community. Like most Canadian Jews, I was a Liberal by inheritance and was therefore comfortable with your pervasive and obvious bias. I ceased being a Liberal in 1974 because I was concerned their economic policies would turn a country with a balanced budget and no accumulated deficit into what it has become.

In the ensuing years, I accepted the obvious skewing of all news in favour of the Liberal party as one of the burdens of being Jewish. Of late, this has been harder to do, so I can hardly express my pleasure at reading these two articles, which point out facts that I would have thought would be obvious to any rational human being.

Our community needs encouragement to do some independent rational analysis of what is happening to our country, and to Israel and Jews because of this government.

War was not necessary

Editorials and columns in recent editions of The CJN on the current war in Iraq have generally been in favour of it. They are usually well-written and reasonable in their approach. I also believe they are misguided.

I am a strong supporter of Israel and despise Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, but I believe this war is both unnecessary and a serious mistake. It has not been proven that Saddam has harmed anyone other than Iraqis since the Gulf War in 1991. He was at least somewhat co-operative with the UN inspectors in their attempts to disarm him. If he has aided terrorists, it has likely been far less than many Saudis, for example. He was also being contained. If inspectors had to stay in Iraq for decades, that would have been good enough and cheaper in both money and lives than a war to unseat him.

Worse than that, one of the great weaknesses of many Arabs is to blame others for their own problems. You can already see many Arab opponents of Saddam volunteering to fight for Iraq because they see the U.S.- led invasion as an attack by outsiders on an Arab state or by "infidels" on Islam. One Israeli who was interviewed recently said he fears that after the war, the United States may repay Arabs in "Israeli currency," putting pressure on Israel to make dangerous, as opposed to reasonable, concessions to produce a Palestinian state. I worry, too.

Saddam should have been left for the Iraqis to deal with. They could have concentrated on getting him out of office, not Jews out of Israel. And the Palestinians should be concerned with getting a proper state on the West Bank and Gaza, not getting their refugees back into Israel. Then one day there might be a true and just peace in the region.

Instead, we are likely to be left with an Iraq that is destroyed and angry, and with many Arabs blaming it all on the United States and Israel. Saddam is not worth the price.

Slavery in Sudan

As Passover draws near and we celebrate our exodus from slavery, most of us might complacently think the pernicious legacy of slavery is obsolete. Well, think again. In northern Africa, particularly in Sudan and Mauritania, the legacy not only continues but flourishes unabated.

Sudan has been engaged in a civil war for most of its troubled existence since 1955. The most recent war, going back 16 years, has cost more than two million lives. The country's population of 34 million is composed of 60 per cent black Africans, namely Christians, animists and some practising Islam in the south; 39 per cent Arabs in the north; and one per cent European. Since the country's inception, the Arab minority in the north has gained control of the government in Khartoum.

After a brief respite from war in the '80s, Colonel Omar Al Bashir staged a coup in 1989. His government ruthlessly eradicated dissidents, imposed strict Islamic law and disenfranchised the black majority in the south. Since the discovery of oil in the '70s, the black Sudanese have been denied a share of wealth and power.

One of the tragic manifestations of the conflict is government-controlled paramilitary group raids in the south. Men are executed and women and children are abducted and sold into slavery in the north, where they work long hours and are beaten and tortured and forced to sleep with animals. The women are repeatedly raped. If they try to escape, they get more beatings or have their Achilles tendon severed. After recapture, some are bound and exposed to the punishing Sudanese sun for days. Others have had their limbs amputated. Human rights abuses are well-documented by Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

The answer to ending the scourge of slavery lies in ending this sordid conflict. Peace talks have recently transpired in Mochako, Kenya, between the warring factions. However, ceasefires have been broken and the northern government has demonstrated a reluctance to bargain in good faith. While much of the world's attention is on the war in Iraq, the suffering continues.

Canada must take a more proactive role on this issue. At international forums, pressure to negotiate must be brought to the warring sides. Any agreement must include an equitable sharing of wealth and power. Arms embargos and sanctions are essential. International human rights monitors must ensure that slaves are emancipated and human rights upheld.

This year, as we read the Haggadah, let us take a moment of silence for those who suffer the humiliating terror of slavery in Sudan. And let us raise our voices in protest that such perverse human indignities can no longer be tolerated.

Finding the roots of legal aid - in Torah

By SIDNEY B. LINDEN

When I consider my career in law, I'm often struck by how at home I feel in it as a Jew. I constantly feel that I'm working in the tradition of our people, actually doing what the Torah tells us to do – "Justice, justice shall you pursue" (Deuteronomy 16:20) – and engaging in tikkun olam, repairing the world.

These feelings led me to look into the Jewish roots of some fundamental principles of Canadian justice and especially of the legal aid program I've been associated with throughout my career.

There is no doubt, that one can "pursue justice" and/or "repair the world" without doing legal aid work. And certainly one can help the poor without doing legal work. Pursuing justice is fundamental to being a Jew. In Genesis 18:17-19, just before the famous dispute between God and Abraham over the fate of Sodom, God reflects, "Shall I hide what I am about to do? For I have singled him [Abraham] out, that he may instruct his children and his posterity to keep the ways of the Lord by doing what is just and right."

That is our task in the world. As the children of Abraham, we are instructed to do what is just and right. Not surprisingly, the sources of that instruction, our Torah and Jewish texts, have also inspired vital features of legal systems around the world, including Canada.

And yet many lawyers I meet don't do legal aid work. Some say this with a degree of pride, as if there was something wrong with doing legal aid work or as if it is beneath the dignity of a successful lawyer. Some of my colleagues on the bench even expressed surprise when I agreed to serve as the chair of the board of directors of Legal Aid Ontario (LAO).

In my view as a judge, as a lawyer and particularly as a Jew, it is not only natural for us to support legal aid, but also to be proud to find the roots of legal aid in Torah.

There are three concepts from the Torah that underpin Canadian justice and legal aid. They are:

- Justice must be equal for rich and poor.
- It is our duty to help and be gracious to the poor.
- It is the duty of the powerful – kings and rulers – to plead for the poor.

Regarding the first concept, we are commanded in the Torah to establish courts of law. In the same breath, God says the courts must be impartial: "You shall not pervert judgment; you shall not favour persons" (Deuteronomy 16:19).

Access to justice for everyone, regardless of income, is a fundamental principle of democracy and the rule of law. Equal access and protection under the law require that individuals have legal representation when before the courts in serious matters.

The right to a fair trial has been part of all criminal justice systems that descend from the Anglo-American tradition, including Canada's, since their beginnings. Judges are responsible for upholding this principle. They have been prepared to order the appointment of counsel or to stay proceedings until counsel is provided to an accused person in serious cases. Charter of Rights provisions strengthen the right to counsel.

For more than 30 years, Canadian governments and law societies have acknowledged the need to provide legal aid services to people with little or no income. Long before that, individual lawyers donated their services without charge – pro bono services – to help the poor gain access to the courts on more equal terms.

Last year, the chief justice of Canada, the Right Honourable Beverley McLaughlin, said, "We need to think of [legal aid] in the same way we think of health care or education. The well-being of our justice system – and the public's confidence in it – depends on it. If legal aid fails, justice fails."

The second concept, that we must help and be gracious to the poor, can be found in many of the Torah's commandments. In Leviticus, just after the Torah tells us to be impartial in judgment, we see the words at the heart of Jewish ethics: "Love your neighbour as yourself" (Leviticus 19:18).

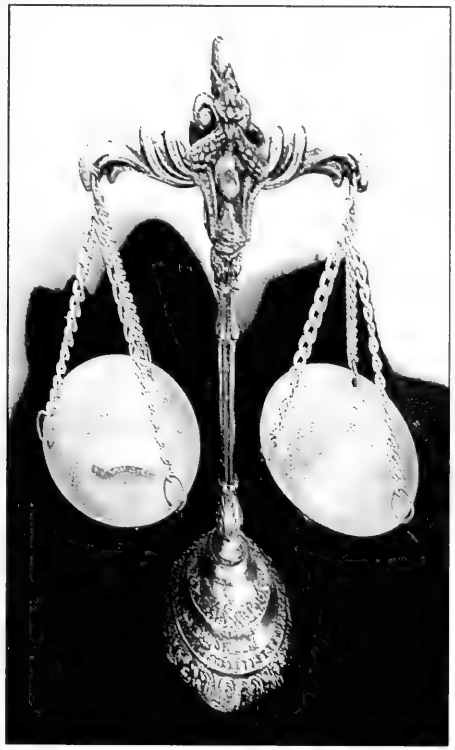
What is the source of this kindness to the poor and powerless? The Torah teaches that it comes from the Jew's own suffering. We should learn and remember from our experience as slaves in Egypt that the rich and the poor share a common humanity. In Deuteronomy, the Torah urges us to model ourselves on God: "He executes judgment for the fatherless and widow, and loves the stranger, in giving him food and clothing. Love you therefore the stranger, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Deuteronomy 10:18-19).

The covenant between God and the Jewish people expresses the loving attitude we are expected to adopt toward our fellow human beings. Each morning, we put on tfillin and remember the covenant with these lines from Hosea: "And I will betroth you to me forever. And I will betroth you to me in righteousness and in justice. And in loving kindness and in compassion" (Hosea 2:21).

With somewhat less exalted language – with all due respect to the drafters – Ontario's legal aid legislation commits us to serve low-income people to a high standard. The Legal Aid Services Act states that its purpose "is to promote access to justice throughout Ontario for low-income individuals by means of… providing consistently high quality legal aid services in a cost-effective and efficient manner."

In 1998, Ontario's chief justice, Roy McMurtry, spoke with deep compassion for the poor at a conference of community legal clinics, which are a vital part of legal aid. He said: "It is a sad reality today that we have not only too much poverty in this province, but as well too little understanding of the desperate straits poverty creates for so many people. The hardening of attitudes about poverty in recent years is something that all of us with access to public opinion must struggle to counter… We must remember that people don't choose to be poor and they don't want to be poor."

Regarding the third concept, that it is the duty of the powerful to plead for the poor, the book of Proverbs has been traditionally interpreted as being the advice of King Solomon to his son, who is preparing to assume the kingship. Verse 31:8-9 urges the future ruler to plead for the poor: "Open your mouth for [whoever cannot plead their own case], in the cause of all who need someone to speak for them. Open your mouth, judge righteously and plead the cause of the poor and needy."



Rabbi Abraham ben Meir Ibn Ezra, a 12th-century scholar in Muslim Spain, said this verse applies to the defence of someone who faces the death penalty. In many countries, legal aid is still limited to death penalty cases. However, in Canada, legal aid is available for most serious criminal and family cases to those who qualify financially.

The prophets fearlessly called the kings of Israel to account and held them to a high standard of justice for the poor. Jeremiah faced King Jehoiachim and held him up to the record of his righteous father Josiah: "Did your father not eat and drink and do justice and righteousness? Then it was well with him. He judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well. Is this not to know Me, says the Lord?" (Jeremiah 22:15-16).

In 1967, when Ontario passed the first Legal Aid Act, it ended a period of voluntary legal aid and accepted the public obligation to provide access to justice for low-income people by funding legal aid services. The Law Society operated the legal aid plan until 1999, and since then, legal aid has been the responsibility of LAO, an independent agency of the government, accountable to the Attorney General of Ontario and, through him, to the legislative assembly.

In re-establishing legal aid with this new, publicly accountable and publicly funded structure, the government has clearly acknowledged that legal aid is not an "add-on" to the justice system but an indispensable part of it. As Jewish tradition teaches, and as governments across Canada have accepted, there is an obligation in a civilized, democratic society to ensure that someone pleads for the poor.

I'm very proud to be associated with legal aid. This is not to suggest that all lawyers should do legal aid work, or that lawyers should only do legal aid work. For those who have chosen to do it, the demand certainly exists, and that's why we have a responsibility to ensure the tariff is fair and adequate. Legal aid work will never be lucrative, but it has to be affordable for lawyers who choose to do it. They cannot serve the legal needs of the poor solely on a pro bono basis. The needs are simply too great.

Most lawyers work in subject areas that are not relevant to the poor and therefore not covered by legal aid, such as corporate law or real estate law. But in my view, even those lawyers or their firms could do some legal aid work from time to time. More importantly, if they do, they should be proud of it. It is not only honourable, it is also consistent with the teachings and the tradition of the Torah.

The Talmud teaches that on the third day of Creation, God caused dry land to become visible and fit for habitation so that human beings could follow the Torah's laws and deal justly with other people. The rabbis explained that the maintenance of justice is a prerequisite for the continued existence of the world.

Psalm 82 reminds us that all creation rests on justice: "God stands in the Divine assembly, in the midst of judges shall He judge. How long will you judge unjustly and favour the wicked? Judge the needy and the orphan, vindicate the poor and impoverished. Rescue the needy and destitute, save them from the hand of the wicked." Part of this psalm is inscribed over the entrance to the Old Bailey, the Central Criminal Court building, in downtown London.

We as Jews often see ourselves as God's partners in justice, bringing Torah into the world. In Canadian justice, and especially through legal aid, we can see Torah values in action.

Justice Sidney Linden is chair of the board of directors of Legal Aid Ontario while on leave from the Ontario Court. The assistance of Jeffrey Stutz, director of corporate projects at Legal Aid Ontario, for this article is appreciated.

Yet another historic mistake

During the first Gulf War, they stood on rooftops, cheering every time a scud missile hit Tel Aviv. That was 1991, and the Palestinians were emboldened by their fantasy of Saddam Hussein as their champion, someone whom they believed would help them in their ongoing mission to destroy Israel.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But their judgement was flawed. Rather than learning from previous experience, they had once more sought friends in the wrong neighbourhood, and gained little from their misplaced allegiances. And as though to make matters even worse, they then went on to sabotage a comprehensive and comprehensible peace process, resorting instead to duplicity and violence to advance their cause – and again they failed.

By now, it should have struck them as obvious that their tactics have not been effective. Not so. For what we are now seeing is an almost surreal replay of their blunders of 1991, with some subtle, or perhaps not so subtle, differences.

Firstly, there is the grassroots support for Saddam across the West Bank and Gaza Strip. During the earlier phases of the current war, it was reported that Palestinians in Ramallah were openly and vociferously expressing their delight at the downing of U.S. helicopters and the capture of British and American soldiers by the Iraqis. Young women were seen marching through the city, denouncing US "aggression" against Iraq and, by way of subtext, urging the Iraqi leader to "annihilate all Jews."

Recent demonstrations in several Palestinian centres, marking Land Day, carried a similar message. In Nablus, newborn babies are being named after Saddam, while in Bethlehem's Dehaishe refugee camp, one of the thoroughfares has been renamed "Baghdad Street". The moral support for Saddam is hard to miss.

But secondly, and more ominously, we are also seeing another kind of support – the consolidation of a more vicious camaraderie that is set to play itself out, not in the urban centres of the West Bank, but on the actual battlefields of Iraq. Islamic Jihad and Fatah have both dispatched bands of suicide bombers to Baghdad, where they have vowed to join Saddam's fedayeen irregular forces in launching deadly attacks on coalition soldiers.

So, in effect, what we have is a component of the Palestinian "street" in lockstep with extremist elements across the Arab world, and the Palestinian terrorist infrastructure, in synchrony with other terrorist groups, all supporting the Iraqi dictator.

None of this should be especially surprising. What is regrettable, however, is that when the regime in Iraq is ultimately defeated, as it surely will be, the Palestinians might once again find themselves weakened and isolated.

Rather than backing Saddam, they could have embarked on a different and more hopeful course. But having chosen not to, they are destined to bear the consequences of yet another historic mistake.

Truth stranger than fiction: good news from Israel

Quick. Name the most important good news story in Israel so far in 2003. I mean really good news. Not some cheerful human interest item. Not some isolated, local drama with a happy ending. We're talking here a major story with far-reaching positive consequences for the entire nation; an unexpected story free of security worries, political wrangling and diplomatic fallout; a story that transcends Israel's deep ideological, religious and economic divisions. In short, a non-partisan story of vital significance to the country and welcomed by every Israeli. Sound impossible?

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Here's a hint: It's something that's been taking shape in recent months and has gotten even better as of late. It's something the government had nothing to do with and that nobody, not even the experts, predicted.

Stumped? Perfectly understandable. Who associates good news with Israel lately? For quite a while now, the news from here has been bad, depressing, tragic or a variation thereof. Israelis themselves would be hard-pressed if asked to cite major events or developments that qualify as really good news.

You might say we specialize in problems. You name it, we got it: continuing Palestinian terrorist atrocities, record unemployment and dire poverty, a dysfunctional political system, an economy in tatters and getting worse, rampant labor unrest, a decimated tourist industry, worsening regional tensions, and to top it off, increasing congestion and pollution.

As if Israelis didn't have enough to worry about, the army is on high alert for fear the current war in Iraq may lead Saddam Hussein to attack Israel, possibly with chemical weapons.

Amid such adversity, the most positive development in recent months has been largely overlooked. And yet it's a rare story that literally all Israelis – Jewish and Arab, secular and religious, veteran Israelis and new immigrants, rich and poor, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, left-wingers and right-wingers, urban dwellers and rural residents – unanimously welcome.

Still at a loss to guess what it is? Drum roll, please.

The best news in Israel this year is that its main source of drinking water has been mostly replenished thanks to a record rainfall over the past three months. In a country with only one major body of fresh water – Lake Kinneret (Sea of Galilee) – and where it usually rains only between October and April, this is magnificent news.

By late fall, after years of severe drought, the Kinneret had reached a dangerously low level, creating the most severe water crisis in Israel's history. The receding lake had become a shadow of itself, and in the process became a disturbing symbol of the country's sad state of affairs.

As recently as December, hydrologists were lamenting the dearth of rain. Meteorologists said there was little on the horizon in the new year that would ease the water crisis substantially. But in a near miraculous turnaround this winter, the skies opened repeatedly, with torrential rains causing the Kinneret to rise more than four metres. And the good news is not over yet.

With more rain this month and the continuing strong flow into the lake from the Jordan River and streams leading down from the Golan Heights, the lake will rise even higher. Clearly, 2003 is on course to break the record for the biggest rise in the Kinneret in one season.

"With all the melting snow from Mount Hermon and perhaps more rain in the coming weeks, we're optimistic the Kinneret will go up one more metre, which would be fantastic," Uri Schor of the water commissioner's office said in late March. "There's no doubt that this has been a season of bountiful rainfall that has rescued the Kinneret and we hope helped improve the severely depleted state of the coastal and mountain aquifers."

Ironically, this comes just when the United Nations is warning that the world is about to face a major water crisis. According to a new study, published at the recent World Water Forum in Japan, the earth's water problem is already daunting and will get even worse in the coming years. The reasons: population growth, climatic change, pollution and mismanagement of one of nature's most vital resources.

Although this winter's heavy rains are a blessing, their benefit may not last long. The Kinneret may be looking full again, but it's only a matter of time before the country faces another water problem. So much for the good news from Israel.

A year of taking back our freedom

The saying that "freedom is most valued after it has been lost and recovered" may be a cliché, but from the perspective of 5,000 years of Jewish history, it remains current. From the Exodus from Egyptian slavery through to the creation of the State of Israel, we have repeatedly lost and then fought tenaciously to regain our freedom, and the struggle continues.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In each Passover season, Jews traditionally review the accomplishments in recovering and preserving our independence, as well as the continuing dangers. Last year, pre-Pesach shopping for Israelis was more like a military operation than preparation for a holiday.

With suicide bombings conducted almost daily, each foray to the shuk or mall was carefully planned. We would check out the level of security in the area, dash into the store to make our purchases, and speed home to relative safety. In other words, we had essentially lost our independence.

Instead of the usual nature hikes and other activities, children were kept close to home. The sounds of bombings echoed eerily, followed by the screaming of ambulances. Most Israelis recognized the names and faces of victims, and in the neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, we heard the gunfire from the attacks against homes and schools in Gilo.

While we were sitting down for the seder, 29 Israelis were slaughtered at the Park Hotel in Netanya. This and other attacks during the Passover week led to the beginning of the long-delayed Israeli counterattack to regain our freedom. In Operation Defensive Shield and its successors, the Israel Defence Forces moved to destroy the Palestinian terror networks that turned schools, hospitals and ordinary houses into explosives laboratories and terrorist training facilities.

The unwillingness to risk civilian casualties led to some tragic mistakes, in which groups of soldiers were killed by Palestinian explosives, but over the following weeks and months, the goals were achieved.

Since then, Palestinian efforts to launch suicide bombings against Israelis have not stopped entirely, but their ability to reach cities and buses has eroded significantly, and the attacks are now averaging less than one a month.

And after gaining an initial foothold through the other "axis of evil" – Israel-bashing journalists, "human rights activists," diplomats, and academics – the lies of massacres were exposed. In the propaganda war to end the hatred directed against Israel, some progress is being made.

Now, one year later, Israelis go shopping and ride the bus with much less fear and greater security from terrorist attacks. These ordinary actions have become small daily celebrations of freedom and survival against a bitter and cruel enemy. Some Palestinians also recognize that the campaign of hatred and terrorism has failed, and it has cost them dearly.

Last year at this time, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat was courted by diplomats and political leaders from around the world. Since then, he has been under "house arrest" in what is left of his compound in Ramallah. His visitors consist of minor officials from "old Europe," and he has been forced to appoint a prime minister who declared the terror campaign to have been a mistake.

Abu Mazen may or may not mark a break with the past – it is too early to tell – but regime change has started. Perhaps Palestinians will begin to value freedom and tolerance over the fanatic hatred of Israel that has led to 55 years of death and disaster.

Life for Israelis is still far from normal. We still look over our shoulders as we stand in line to be frisked at shopping centres, and some suicide bombers continue to get through. And now, Israelis are carrying gas masks and have sealed rooms in their houses, in case Iraqi President Saddam Hussein tries to use chemical and biological terror weapons against the hated "Zionist entity" before being removed from the stage.

But despite these dangers, the actions of tens of thousands of Israeli soldiers have restored our independence and control over our own lives. The centrality of freedom and of the celebration of Passover and the Exodus is as important for us as it was when Moses took the Jews out of Egypt.

The Kirshner File

The war in Iraq splits the Arab world

The current war in Iraq, though universally opposed by Arabs, has paradoxically had the effect of rupturing the Arab world into warring camps.

No Arab state, theoretically, backs the American/British invasion of Iraq. It has been excoriated as a neo-colonialist crusade to seize control of Iraq's oil fields, subjugate Arabs, demean Islam and strengthen Israel. Few Arabs believe that Washington launched the war to bring democracy to Iraq, which has been in the grip of dictatorship since 1968.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In practice, however, several Arab states, some of which signed defence treaties with the United States after the 1991 Gulf War, are providing vital logistical support, without which an invasion would have been impossible.

Outraged by their stance, Arab governments, spearheaded by Syria, have vociferously denounced the assistance rendered to the United States by these moderate Arab countries. As a result of this sharp dichotomy, the Arab world is torn by recriminations.

The facts speak for themselves.

Kuwait was the launching pad for the March 19 allied ground invasion. Qatar hosts U.S. command headquarters. Saudi Arabia permits the use of various facilities, notably the Prince Sultan air base. The United Arab Emirates allows the use of its air fields. Bahrain serves as the regional headquarters of the U.S. navy. Jordan permitted American special forces to attack western Iraq, the site of Iraqi air bases from which Scud missiles were fired at Israel in 1991. Egypt has allowed the passage of U.S. warships and supply vessels through the Suez Canal and let American aircraft use its air space. Oman opened its port to the American military.

The disconnect in the Arab world between rhetoric and reality – a phenomenon that may yet destabilize regimes if the war turns into a protracted struggle and causes unacceptably high Iraqi civilian casualties – is glaring. Arab public opinion, Arab satellite television stations such as Qatar-based Al-Jazeera and radical Arab regimes have taken notice.

This much is also clear. Arab states, having called for a prolongation of the United Nations weapons inspection system, were absolutely powerless to stop the march toward war. As the diplomatic impasse at the United Nations intensified and as the United States rushed soldiers and materiel to the Middle East to prepare for conflict, a sense of gloom and doom descended over Arab capitals.

Reflecting this mood, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak acknowledged that a war was inevitable and warned the United States that its policy of regime change would set a dangerous precedent.

As war clouds darkened the skies, Arab leaders hastily convened a series of urgent meetings in an atmosphere bordering on sheer panic. They adamantly rejected the notion of war. They commiserated with the long-suffering Iraqi people. They pointedly asked why Iraq's non-compliance with United Nations resolutions was intolerable while Israel's non-compliance with resolutions on Arab-Israeli issues was acceptable.

Their indignation was duly noted, but Arab demonstrators flocking to anti-war protests were hardly impressed. Since the outbreak of hostilities, the so-called Arab street has exploded, fueling speculation that authoritarian Arab regimes may be endangered by popular resentment of their impotence and collaboration with the United States.

In an effort to deflect the seething anger, Arab foreign ministers in Cairo called for an immediate U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, while the Arab League's ambassador to the United Nations demanded that "the invasion stop, that the invading forces will be withdrawn and that Iraq's sovereignty and territorial integrity and independence will be preserved."

Washington ignored the pleas, while President George W. Bush reiterated his determination to decapitate Saddam Hussein's regime and free Iraqis of his tyranny. That did not prevent the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, from issuing a similar appeal to Washington.

Without a doubt, as Mubarak suggested last week, the war is reinforcing the anti-Americanism that already pervades the Middle East.

Regarding Iraq as a latter-day Afghanistan, thousands of Arab volunteers, including disaffected Iraqis, have poured into Iraq to fight on its side. Their anti-Americanism, which dovetails with a hatred of Israel and an unadulterated anti-Semitism, will only be contained if the United States achieves its broad objectives in a reasonable time and with a minimum of civilian casualties and property damage.

Aside from Iraq itself, Syria has taken the lead in decrying the war. Syria's inexperienced president Bashar Assad has described it as an imperialist attempt to redraw the map of the Middle East in the interests of the United States and Israel. Rightly or wrongly, he believes that Syria will be the next target of an American campaign to root out the forces of Arab radicalism.

Living up to its reputation as "the beating heart of Arabism," Syria has certainly been provocative. Damascus was the first stop on Iraqi Foreign Minister Naji Sabri's whirlwind trip around the region late last month. During his visit, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa reaffirmed Syria's solidarity with Iraq and termed the allied invasion as "vicious aggression." Subsequently, Sharaa voiced the hope that Iraq will defeat the United States on the battlefield.

Bashar Assad

Much to Washington's ire, Syria has sold night-vision goggles to Iraq, granted free passage across its borders to anti-American volunteers and turned a blind eye to a call by its chief mufti for suicide attacks against allied troops.

Israel's defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, has described these developments as "very grave." Last week, an Israeli general, Yosi Kuperwasser, warned that Iraq may be hiding weapons of mass destruction in Syria. It will be recalled that an identical and unsubstantiated accusation was made by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in December.

Syria's bilateral relationship with Iraq was testy in the 1980s and 1990s, but in the past two years, there has been a dramatic improvement in their ties. Under new trade agreement, $2 billion (US) worth of Syrian exports flowed into Iraq in 2002. Cheap Iraqi oil, to the tune of about 200,000 barrels a day and in violation of the United Nations embargo against Iraq, was also of benefit to the anemic Syrian economy.

Next to the Syrians, the Palestinians have been most vocal in their support of Iraq.

Judging by a survey released by the Palestinian Center for Public Opinion on March 28, 60 per cent of Palestinians back Iraq, regarding Saddam as a defender of Arab rights.

The Palestinians' attitude is anything but surprising, given Iraq's fierce embrace of the Palestinian cause and of the intifadah and Saddam's commitment to Israel's destruction.

Having compared the United States' occupation of Iraq to Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the Palestinians have organized a succession of pro-Iraq rallies, during which protesters have raised Iraqi flags and encouraged Iraq "to burn Tel Aviv."

Not surprisingly, Hamas and Islamic Jihad have urged Iraq to deploy suicide bombers against the allies. Two weeks ago, an Iraqi soldier took this advice to heart, killing four American soldiers at a checkpoint in central Iraq. Both Islamic Jihad and Fatah – a faction controlled by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – have reportedly dispatched teams of suicide bombers to Iraq.

After claiming responsibility for a suicide bombing outside a Netanya cafe on March 30, Islamic Jihad portrayed the attack as a "gift to the heroic Iraqi people."

Arafat, who engendered animosity by supporting Saddam in the 1991 war, has been more circumspect this time around – lambasting the invasion but avoiding any overt expression of support for Iraq's leadership.

Generally, Palestinians seem to think that the war will increase sympathy for Arafat, intensify Palestinian antipathy toward the United States and Israel, and embolden Sharon to try to crush Palestinian hopes for statehood.

On the other hand, the war may yet prompt the Bush administration to push harder for a viable political settlement encompassing Palestinian statehood and Israeli security.

Last week, two top U.S. officials made it abundantly clear that Washington seeks such an agreement. Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security advisor, said that the terms of the "road map," a plan to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict, are non-negotiable, contrary to Israel's wishes or expectations. Then Secretary of State Colin Powell said that Jewish settlements in the territories are "inconsistent with President Bush's two-state vision."

Like his father before him, Bush intends to work for stability by promoting a resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute. By doing so, he hopes he can curry favour with the Arabs.

But in the meantime, the Arab world is boiling over with rage at the United States' audacity in invading Iraq.

Holocaust survivor allowed to stay in country

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

For Jerry Hefner, a terse announcement in the House of Commons last week is "a great Passover gift. It couldn't be nicer."

Hefner was referring to Immigration Minister Denis Coderre's brief statement last Wednesday that a frail, 75-year-old Holocaust survivor suffering from the onset of Alzheimer's disease will be allowed to stay in Canada and live out her days with her two sisters in Toronto (see transcript, below).

The development capped two days of intense media attention devoted to the case of Helen Ann Dougherty, Hefner's aunt, who had been informed in January that her application to stay on compassionate and humanitarian grounds was rejected, and that she had to leave Canada by Feb. 10 or face deportation.

A front-page story in the Globe and Mail on Dougherty's plight evidently put enough pressure on Ottawa to reverse its stand.

"We're relieved," Hefner told The CJN, "but also a little saddened that this could happen in Canada."

Dougherty, a childless widow, came to Toronto in June 2000 on a visitor's visa from New York, where had lived since coming to the United States in 1948.

Her sisters, Anna Hefner, 78, and Lola Mlava, 83, decided Dougherty should stay with them given her declining health and dependency.

The family submitted statements attesting to Dougherty's medical condition and income. They also pointed out that she had no other family and promised she would not be a burden on taxpayers.

But Ottawa said no, ruling Dougherty was not a de facto family member and that her return to New York "would not constitute undeserved or disproportionate hardship."

A last-ditch appeal to Coderre's office was also turned down last month.

Her lawyer, Michael Schelew, called the decision "mean-spirited and anti-humanitarian."

Dougherty, (née Horowitz) was born in 1928 in the small Polish town of Bzesko, just outside Cracow. When the Nazis invaded in 1939, they took away her parents and brother, who were never seen again.

The three sisters were hidden for a while in Cracow, and Dougherty made her way to Germany, where she survived with false documents.

Not even her sister knows the whole story. "It's painful," said Anna Hefner. "I don't know how we did it. But now, we're together and we're very happy."

The following is a transcript, taken from Hansard, of the exchange in the House of Commons on the Helen Dougherty case:

In the House of Commons April 2, 2003

Hon. Art Eggleton (York Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I read today about a Holocaust survivor, a 75-year-old woman suffering from Alzheimer's, who presently resides in my constituency. She is under threat, unfortunately, for deportation. The officials of the department are talking about sending her back to the United States. Her husband has died and she has no friends or family to look after her but she does have two sisters here.

Could the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration do something to help in this case?

Hon. Denis Coderre (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have reviewed the file today and have decided to instruct my officials to allow Ms. Dougherty to remain in Canada on compassionate grounds.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary—Nose Hill, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, contrast the immigration minister's treatment of a Holocaust denier versus a Holocaust survivor. The minister admits [Ernst] Zundel, allows him to make a refugee claim and ignores a known security threat, but the minister tries to give the boot to Helen Ann Dougherty, who has Alzheimer's.

The minister has extended every consideration to Zundel but has refused compassionate permission to Mrs. Dougherty. Why did it take a public outcry for the minister to do the right thing?

Hon. Denis Coderre: Mr. Speaker, I think it is unacceptable to use Mrs. Dougherty to try to score political points. I have announced very clearly that, on compassionate grounds, I have asked officials in my department to take the necessary steps to ensure that she can remain in Canada. Instead of trying to score points, the member should be congratulating this government for once again showing compassion.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, the minister has also made quite a switch on Zundel. First it was, I will not allow our system to be abused, just watch me, and now he sits by, content to let the process wind on and on. He will not use his power to end Zundel's refugee charade, but he was quite prepared to squash elderly Mrs. Dougherty. He only sprang into action when faced with public humiliation. Why did the minister try to kick out the Holocaust survivor but shelter the Holocaust denier?

Hon. Denis Coderre: Mr. Speaker, by her question I understand one thing, and that is that on their side they disagree with taking steps based on compassionate grounds, so they are against the fact that we emitted a permit for Mrs. Dougherty. Shame on them.

The UN, Iraq and shared values

By RABBI BENJAMIN HECHT

Guest Voice

Recently in the National Post, Prof. Anne Bayefsky wrote an informative and necessary article on Israel's second-class status at the United Nations. But it was what was between the lines that may be most significant.

In the runup to the current war, there were many calling for UN approval for any attack on Iraq. On the surface, the call seemed justifiable. If the UN is to have any value and power, it must be the body that determines the correctness of military action against a "rogue nation." At the core of this is the belief that such a determination must be made by a majority of nations, thereby ensuring that military action is undertaken for the right reasons and not for singular national interests.

Yet there is a large assumption inherent in this belief: that all nations share a similar commitment to just values.

The example of a jury illustrates the point. Our Common Law system demands that a jury decision in criminal proceedings be unanimous. The argument is that this will ensure justice is achieved to the extent humanly possible. If one member, truly committed to justice, stands apart from the majority, our system takes note and applies caution, thinking that this individual may have a point.

The call for UN approval for an attack on Iraq could be made for the same reasons. We assume that if the community of nations – if not unanimously, at least through the consensus of the majority – agrees on an action, there is reason to believe it is justifiable. Similarly, if there is no agreement, there is reason to doubt such a decision.

But the call for the unanimous decision of a jury only works if we assume shared values by its members. If one stands apart because he or she is being bribed by the criminal or does not care about the consequences of crime, the lack of consensus can actually defeat justice. Similarly, UN approval is only of value if there is a shared sense of values among the community of nations.

Jewish law's commitment to follow the view of the majority advocates a similar stand. The Talmud says we are to follow the majority for good, but not for evil. What does this mean? How is a member of the minority to make this determination? The answer lies in whether the cardinal values of the overall group are indeed shared by all. If so, the majority voice must carry. If they are only found within the minority, this minority cannot follow the majority "to do evil."

This powerful undercurrent in Bayefsky's article raises key questions, not solely regarding the UN's treatment of Israel, but also about the value of the UN in general. When Libya is voted to chair the UN Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) or Iran becomes a member of the UN Commission on the Status of Women, we must question the values of the community of nations.

As with a jury, the view of the majority can only be of importance when there is a shared value base. But when the majority of nations demonstrates a lack of shared values – and even displays those that may be repulsive – the call for UN approval would be faint. It is following the majority "to do evil."

The sad reality is that while the UN may pay lip service to the language of fundamental rights and values, most nations don't share these values. Why should one be concerned about the determinations of the UNCHR when it is not truly interested in human rights, as evidenced by the fact a dictatorship has been elected to chair it.

Similarly, how can we take seriously calls for UN approval to end the Iraqi dictatorship when so many UN members are themselves dictatorships? Do we need dictators to agree that it's OK to attack one of their own? And if their agreement – or that of others who don't share our cardinal values – is not gained, should we not attack a brutal and threatening dictator?

As an advocate of democracy, human dignity and choice, my inclination is also to call for world consensus on military action. As one who advocates seeking out variant opinions and the necessity of knowing diverse views and positions before rendering a decision, my inclination is always to listen for dissent and to be cautious. One must always be concerned about personal bias and about making a mistake. Yet, there still must be a consensus on fundamentals.

What moral benefit was there in waiting for UN approval for a moral action in the name of freedom and rights if the UN has shown it really doesn't care about these values? What is the need for a shared world view on ousting Saddam Hussein if most nations have indicated they really don't care about removing tyrants and asserting freedom and rights?

We cannot follow the majority "to do evil."

A lesson in spiritual liberation

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Many people tend to see the seder as a family event that allows Jews to tap into our historical past and give us a sense of ourselves as a people. But this shortchanges us of the kind of message the seder can imprint on the contemporary Jew: a brilliant and sophisticated lesson, in one evening, about what it means to attain spiritual liberation.

Let me cite two brief examples as a template for this kind of Jewish education.

The four cups of wine are one of the fundamental commandments of the evening. Jewish law tells us that when we drink the wine, we must lean on our left side, a mitzvah known as haseibah, or "reclining." I've known individuals to comment that they find reclining uncomfortable, and that they'd rather sit straight up. They're not all that interested in mimicking the way ancient royalty did things.

What does reclining symbolize? One of the greatest teachings of the seder is that we in the West have become almost incapable of enjoying our success. We live in fear of it being taken away. We are unable to recline, so to speak. There's a wonderful example of this in the story of the punishment meted out by God to Adam in the Garden of Eden, which culminates with the famous verse, "By the sweat of your brow will you eat bread." Usually this is interpreted as the idea that you will have to work very hard to make a living.

But Rashi offers a truly insightful addendum: "By the sweat of your brow – after you have taken all this great trouble."

In other words, after you have worked so hard, the sweat will still be upon you. The real curse is the anxiety over maintaining our money, the feeling that we still do not have enough. When we recline, we are being asked to accept our life, the goodness, at whatever level, that we enjoy.

The flip side of that idea is the ability to empathize with the plight of the other. Not long after that first cup of wine we say "Ha lachma anya" – this is the poor man's bread. The passage invites all who are hungry to come and eat. For a long time, I was bothered by this passage. Why are we asking people into our homes when we're already sitting at the seder table? What good will it do them now? But the invitation is symbolic. Of course we should share our bounty with others, but this requires a consciousness that other people "exist."

E.M. Forster notes ironically in his novel Howard's End that "the very poor are unthinkable." Forster does not mean this literally; rather, that is the way we treat them. Before someone can be at our table, they have to enter our minds. The seder urges us to reformulate how we see the world.

The Exodus is simply raw material. Franz Rosenzweig says that the Jewish memory of our history is a memory "which is not really past at all, but eternally present." No one is exempt from this conversion of history into current reality, and our ability to think seriously about the fragility of our own freedom helps to ensure that we continue to strive for a world of justice.

More insights into radical Islam

The Crisis of Islam: Holy War and Unholy Terror*, by Bernard Lewis, Modern Library, 2003, $29.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Islamic world is in rapid and turbulent transition. Many Muslims are convinced that only by returning to their ancestral faith and divinely ordained way of life can they find salvation in this world and the next. Many have turned to fundamentalism. Modern secularist ideology is losing its appeal. Nationalism, capitalism, socialism, democracy – these imported political and social systems have led to frustration, humiliation and failure.

Disaffected Muslims draw inspiration from their glorious history, which reminds them that their forebears almost overwhelmed all of Christian Europe. In a century of fighting, the Bedouin tribesmen, inspired by the word of the Prophet Mohammed, had carved out an empire stretching from India to the Atlantic Ocean – the largest empire the world had yet seen. And every place they conquered, large-scale conversion to the new faith followed. It was only in 732, at the famous battle of Tours, that the Franks defeated a Muslim army that had advanced into the centre of France.

Islam goes back more than 14 centuries, to the advent of Mohammed in Arabia in the seventh century C. E. and the creation under him of an Islamic community and state. In the period European historians see as a dark interlude between the decline of ancient Greece and Rome and the rise of modern Europe, Islam was the world's leading civilization, marked by its great and powerful kingdoms, its rich and varied industry and commerce and its original and creative sciences and letters.

But during the past three centuries, the Islamic world has lost its dominance and leadership and has fallen behind both the modern West and the rapidly modernizing Far East. This widening gap poses increasingly acute problems, both practical and emotional, for which the rulers, thinkers and rebels of Islam have yet to find effective answers.

Bernard Lewis is one of the West's foremost scholars of Islamic history and culture, and in the eight essays in this slender volume, he examines the historical roots of the resentments that dominate much of the Islamic world and find expression in acts of terror.

Today, most of the Muslim world suffers under poverty and tyranny. Both are attributed, especially by those with an interest in diverting attention from themselves, to American economic dominance and exploitation and to America's support for the Muslim tyrants who serve its purposes.

Globalization has become a major theme in the Arab media, one almost always raised in relation to American economic penetration. The increasingly wretched economic situation in most of the Muslim world, compared with the West and the rapidly rising economies of East Asia, fuels these frustrations.

For radical Islam, the American way of life is full of crime and sin. Feminism leads to debauchery and women as "consumer products." Democracy mean Americans freely chose their rulers and must therefore be held accountable for the rulers' misdeeds – meaning there are no "innocent civilians."

Lewis' timely and provocative book covers a variety of subjects: the creation of Israel, the Cold War, the Iranian Revolution, the Soviet defeat in Afghanistan, the Gulf War, and the Sept. 11 attacks.

Lewis comes to this conclusion. "If the leaders of Al Qaeda can persuade the world of Islam to accept their views and their leadership, then a long and bitter struggle lies ahead, for America and Europe… Sooner or later, Al Qaeda and related groups will clash with the other neighbours of Islam – Russia, China, India – who may prove less squeamish than the Americans in using their power against Muslims and their sanctities. If the fundamentalists are correct in their calculations and succeed in their war, then a dark future awaits the world, especially the part… that embraces Islam."

Lewis is not an alarmist. His reasoned and knowledgeable insights allow for reflection and understanding about matters of great importance to the world.

Pesach, matzah and the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The panic has set in. With only one week until Passover, kitchen cupboards are getting a meticulous cleaning, store shelves are being stocked with unbelievable new Passover products and shoppers are tossing everything in sight into their carts.

But today, I want to focus on that classic, simple food that is the heart of the holiday: matzah.

In Exodus, we are commanded to "Eat matzahs for seven days. By the first day, you must have your homes cleared of all leaven." [http://makeashorterlink.com/?S19726AF3] Much has been written about the symbolic meaning of matzah and its place in the formation of the Jewish people. "The characteristic of leavened dough (chametz) is that it rises and swells, symbolizing pride and boastfulness. A matzah, on the other hand, is thin and flat, suggesting meekness and humility. Passover teaches us that chametz – arrogance – is the very antithesis of the ideal of Torah." [http://makeashorterlink.com/?R2BE12EF3]

Matzah has also become a modern symbol of survival. Yuriy Kheyfetz is 74 and lives in Moscow. He recalls that 60 years ago, a Jew would come to his house to bake matzah for his family. "We never had a seder at home… but for some reason, my parents were not giving up the tradition of baking and eating matzot once a year." This fascinating article traces the role matzah played in the Soviet Union at a time when the state could forbid Jews to perform major Jewish rites, but could not tell them what they should eat. [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk970411/ikey.htm]

Most of us shop for boxes of machine-made matzah from companies like Manischewitz [http://www.manischewitz.com/], Israel's Matzot Rishon [http://www.matzot-rishon.co.il] and Yehuda Matzos. [http://www.yehudamatzos.com] But hand-made shmurah matzah is gaining popularity. David Kibbe has captured the devotion to detail needed to make these matzot. He follows Satmar Chassidim of Kiryas Joel, N.Y., who work for three months next to 1,200-degree ovens to bake kosher hand-made matzot. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Y1CB41EF3]

Apparently, shmurah matzah is gaining popularity outside the ultra Orthodox community [http://www.jewishaz.com/jewishnews/980410/matzo.shtml]. Randi Jaffe says members of her Reform temple don't care that it's ritually perfect. "It's the fact that it's round and bumpy and doesn't look like the square, perfect ones. It's a much more palpable connection to the ancient tradition. You can really imagine it going on someone's shoulder and baking in the desert sun as the biblical Exodus story tells us the original matzah did while our ancestors fled their slavery in Egypt, heading for a new world."

Many children and adults now get a chance to bake their own matzot at model matzah bakeries operated by Chabad-Lubavitch. Follow along as the kids of Congregation Beth Sholom of Corona, Calif., transform flour and water into the ancient food. [http://www.uscj.org/pacsw/corona/Matzah.html] If you don't have access to a matzah bakery, you can watch a meticulous step-by-step demonstration of how matzah is made. [http://www.matzahs.com/photo_gallery.htm] And if you'd like to try it at home, take a look at Marcy Goldman's recipe for homemade matzah. [http://www.koshercooking.com/resource/matzob.html] As Marcy mentions, her recipe is not in accordance with halachah and should not be used for the holiday. But it can be a lot of fun to see how your work compares to the professionals'.

If you would like to decorate your seder table with matzot, you can download some free matzah clip art. [http://graphicdesign.miningco.com/library/passover/blpasclip1.htm]

While many people look forward to eating matzah, not everyone has acquired a taste for our "bread of affliction." Apparently Marilyn Monroe was once served matzah ball soup for three meals in a row. I guess Marilyn never ate a matzah concoction prepared by Wolfgang Puck. Publisher makes Holocaust relevant to young readers

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

When Margie Wolfe was younger, her weekend plans usually included organizing or attending a demonstration. Today, as owner of Second Story Press, she is more likely to spend her time marketing and promoting women's or children's books.

Much of her activism is still focused on the same themes that have always moved her – sexual abuse, violence against women, inequities in the workplace. What's new is the medium of delivery and a children's book series that deals with the Holocaust.

"Second Story Press is the only publisher in the world that produces a Holocaust remembrance series for young readers," Wolfe told The CJN.

Wolfe, who was born in Bergen-Belsen, Germany, after World War II to Holocaust survivors, said she realized a few years ago that targeting younger audiences was probably the most effective way to deal with racism and anti-Semitism.

As a publisher, however, she was aware of the difficulties writers face in creating books that kids will enjoy reading, about subjects that are difficult to describe. Now, with three successful books behind her, Wolfe is convinced that "you can tell almost anything to kids, if you tell the story right."

The Secret of Gabi's Dresser and Clara's War by Kathy Kacer have won Silver Birch and Red Maple awards, and Hana's Suitcase by Karen Levine was nominated for a Governor General's Literary Award and will be made into a feature film or HBO-TV movie.

Wolfe believes the success of the series lies in children's strong moral sense. "Kids make judgments about what they see, and when it's wrong, they respond," she said.

She said the Holocaust series fit perfectly into Second Story's mandate to fill a void in the feminist and children's markets, adding that she was especially interested in representing the diversity of Canadian women's voices.

"I really do believe that women bring a different perspective to how they look at the world, how they deal with things and how they problem solve," Wolfe said.

When she saw that very little was being published about Jewish women, Wolfe decided to move into that category. Since she had already been taking other themes from her adult list and making them relevant for the children's market, the move into the Holocaust series for young readers was a natural progression.

"The most wonderful thing about this series is that interest has exploded outside the Jewish community," Wolfe said. Plans are underway to publish one book a year in the series. The Night Spies by Kathy Kacer will be released in May.

In 1988, when Second Story Press began with a feminist short-story collection, a women's publishing house was considered alternative and its books were marginalized, Wolfe said.

Over the past 25 years, the publication of important books has given women's publishing a "tremendous amount of credibility," she added.

Now she believes that she can publish books on issues she cares about – such as the Holocaust and Jewish women's issues – and they will be taken seriously.

Among her many duties, Wolfe sits on the executive council of the Association of Canadian Publishers, the board of directors for the Association for the Export of Canadian Books and on the advisory board of the Ontario Media Development Corporation.

After graduating from the University of Waterloo, Wolfe began volunteering at the Women's Press in 1977 and became active in issues related to women and social justice. With the growth of the women's movement, she said her work has broadened and been redefined in different ways.

"That's necessarily so because experiences and issues change," Wolfe said.

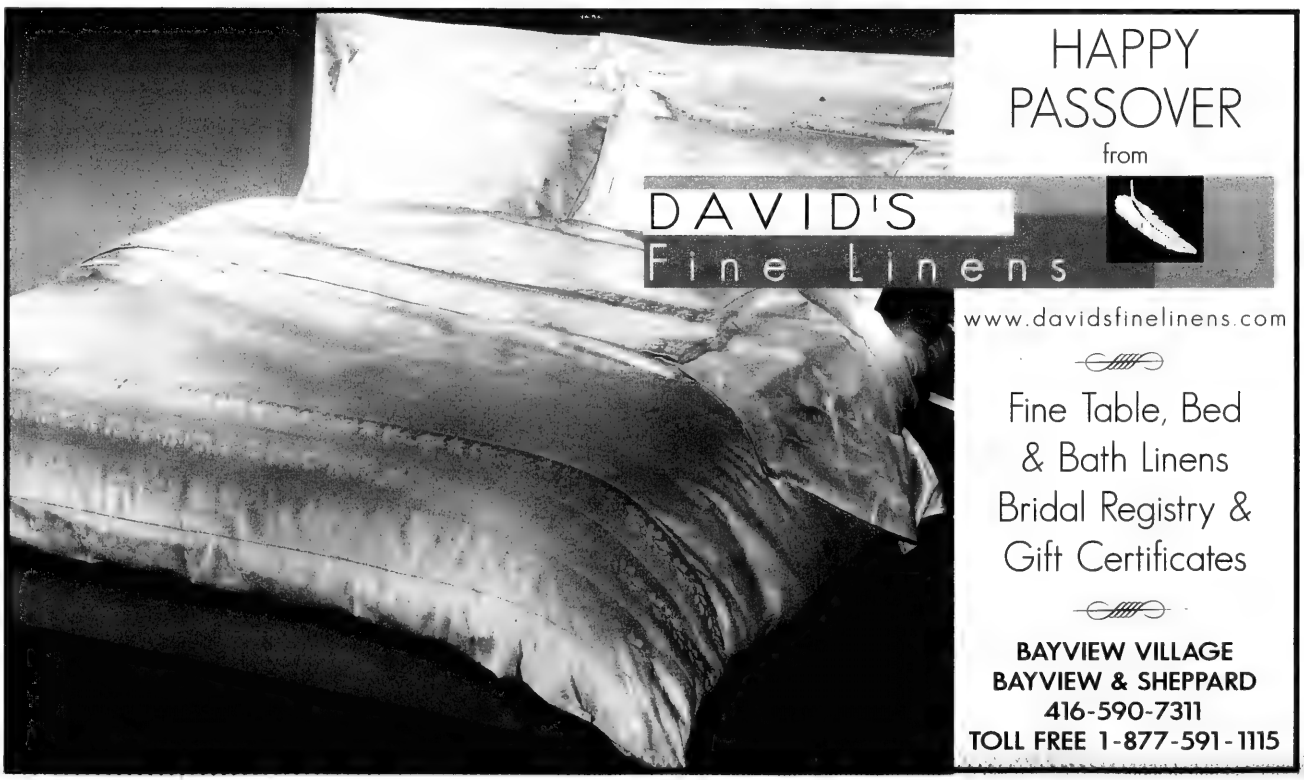
Right now, Wolfe is concerned about the increase in overt anti-Semitism that she sees around her.

"I'm not uncritical of Israel," Wolfe said, recalling that she was openly opposed to Israel's invasion of Lebanon.

But today, she said, anti-Semitism is masquerading as anti-Israel sentiment because "people can get away with that."

As Wolfe is set to leave for France to promote Hana's Suitcase, she admits she's apprehensive about the trip.

It will be interesting to see whether "I get any sense of an increase in French anti-Semitism," she said.



Some timely reminders in dark times

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A touching tribute to human kindness found its way into the all-too-familiar story of a suicide bombing in Israel, in a piece by James Bennet of the New York Times (reprinted in the Globe and Mail, March 31, under the headline "Suicide bombing injures dozens in Israel.")

Bennet reported that Islamic Jihad, which took responsibility for the attack that injured 30 Israelis, called it a "gift" to Iraq, thereby attempting to link the murder of Jews to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, who in turn has been funding the families of suicide bombers.

But Bennet's story contained a different link. It described how two women – Israeli Jews – tried to comfort an Israeli Arab who was hospitalized with shock after the attack. One of the women, Karina Gupolov, was herself wounded in last year's Netanya suicide bombing during a Passover seder. The second, Hannah Hakak, immigrated to Israel from Iraq.

As the two visited with the victim, writes Bennet, "Ms. Hakak's own thoughts wandered... to the Arabs she had known in Baghdad before her family fled in 1951, fearing persecution."

Jewish life in Iraq was the focus of another Globe and Mail article, "My Baghdad" (March 29) by Ingrid Peritz, in which "celebrated Canadian writer Naim Kattan recalls the city of his youth."

Given the turmoil in the Middle East, it is easy to forget that Iraq was once home to a vibrant and accomplished Jewish community. "It formed the city's professional and intellectual elite, and reached into the highest positions of government. The first literary periodical in Iraq was founded by Jews, in 1932-33," writes Peritz.

Kattan recalls that the Jews of Baghdad "constituted 25 or 30 per cent of the population. They were extremely important in Iraqi life, not only as merchants in business, but in the civil service and in all intellectual fields."

Jews, Arabs – Shiite, Sunni, Christian – and Kurds maintained mostly cordial relations and, more than occasionally, close ones: "My other vivid memories are friends – Muslims, Jewish, Kurds... we were trying to create art and culture and literature," Kattan is quoted as saying.

That world started to collapse with the emergence of a pro-Nazi government in 1941, and only got worse as the Jews in Palestine moved closer to statehood.

And so, as Kattan reminds us, 25 centuries of Jewish life, which began "before there were Muslims and before there were Christians," came to an end.

The Jews of Iraq suffered the fate of so many other Jewish communities. They were no longer welcome in what had been their country. They became strangers, compelled to leave behind everything as they fled to Israel, their ancestral homeland from which – 2,500 years earlier – they had been forcibly led into Babylonian captivity.

What an astonishing story! And what a timely reminder of the connectedness of the Jews of the Middle East to Israel, which is so often ruthlessly mischaracterized as an outpost of European colonialism.

Coincidentally, on March 31, the Ottawa Citizen ran two stories about Iraqi Jews: "Iraqi Jews recall a forgotten homeland" by Mike Shahin, and "The Last of the Babylonian Jewish people" by Randy Boswell. The latter gives an eyewitness account of life in Baghdad today for its remaining 37 Jews.

Unfortunately, all three articles point to the eventual disappearance of a Jewish community that once numbered 150,000 strong.

Congregants try to save 116-year-old shul

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Abraham Kaufman, president of Yavne Zion Congregation, is on a mission to save his shul.

Kaufman, 84, has belonged to the 116-year-old Orthodox congregation for about 40 years and said he has watched attendance decline during that time.

"The congregation was started by new immigrants who set it up in the Tip Top Tailor Building on Lakeshore Boulevard. It eventually moved to Spadina Avenue, and then to 788 Marlee Ave. when the building – which houses many Zionist organizations – was built in 1963.

Abraham Kaufman

"We used to have a few hundred people regularly attend Shabbat and Sunday morning, and holiday services. People have died or moved away, however, and their children have joined other synagogues.

"Now, we're lucky if we get a minyan. We have a ba'al koreh who goes out and finds men, if necessary, to daven."

The congregation's vice-president, Vilmos Waller, 77, has belonged for about 28 years. He said that although attendance is low, the congregation does have about 85 members who pay dues of about $50 a year.

"These dues have to cover cemetery costs at Bathurst Lawn Cemetery, as well as other expenses. We've had crumbling headstones that we had to look after, so the dues don't go very far."

Waller still lives near the congregation instead of moving further north to be near his children, "because I need to be near the shul. I don't drive on Shabbat, so if I moved, I would not be able to attend services."

Caterer Abe Levy, who runs Taam Tov Fine Foods out of the building, is actively trying to save the congregation. He has posted notices in a nearby condominium, and plans to deliver letters to nearby residents.

"We're not looking for people to join. We just want them to come and daven. We believe shuls should be open to everyone and anyone, and we want to serve people who are not affiliated with a congregation.

"It is a warm, friendly place. As soon as someone new walks in, they are given an aliyah to the Torah. We want everyone to feel at home," Levy said.

The congregation has been closed since January, he said, because it has not been able to get enough people to come to services, but members are anxious to hold Passover services.

In addition to its regular catering business, Levy's company assists people who otherwise may not be able to afford a function, he said. "If people are referred to us by a rabbi, we can put together a function for them at very little cost. We want everyone to be able to celebrate."

He would love to see people come for Passover, he said. "You can't just close the doors of the 116-year-old congregation. We're all very attached to it; we want to see it remain open."

A Message To Our Families

These are not normal times. As Baycrest deals with the SARS situation, we realize this is very stressful for families as well as for our residents and patients.

We have implemented all of the Ministry of Health directives, which apply to Complex Continuing Care and Rehabilitation settings, in the Home and Hospital. Please understand that Baycrest's main priority during this health alert is to protect our frail, vulnerable population and our staff from SARS. We are also trying our best to limit the impact these protective measures have on client well-being.

We have developed support systems to help you and your loved one through this difficult time.

Here is what we're doing:

Family links and communication: We have redeployed staff to work on phones on every floor of the Home and Hospital. These people will ensure your questions about your loved one are answered in a timely manner. Each floor has also developed a family/resident support team to provide additional family connections.

Passover: We are developing plans for the Passover holidays based on the assumption that the Ministry of Health directives may not be lifted by April 16. We will keep you informed of the specifics.

Friendly visiting: We have implemented a Friendly Visiting Program utilizing staff who can be redeployed to ensure clients have as much interaction as possible.

Programming: Therapeutic Recreation has developed new on-floor programming to optimize quality of life for residents and patients.

Updates are available on our web site www.baycrest.org and Hotline (416) 785-2500, ext. 4444.

We thank you for your patience and understanding.

JCC executive director oversees building's refurbishment

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At the corner of Bloor and Spadina, a venerable old lady is getting a facelift. Scaffolding blocks part of the view, but the evidence is clear that a dingy, weather-beaten exterior is giving way to a sleeker, more modern appearance.

On closer inspection, however, it quickly becomes clear that the changes are more than cosmetic. Indeed, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (JCC) is experiencing something more like reconstructive surgery than mere superficial changes.

Naomi Rose

For years the JCC in the heart of Toronto's Annex neighbourhood employed temporary patches to keep itself presentable while remaining a going concern. But with more than $11 million pledged as part of a $12 million capital campaign, work is well underway to bring the 50-year-old facility up to 21st century standards.

Construction will be completed in stages and the building will remain open throughout (except for the basement, which is being gutted and rebuilt – that will cost an extra $2.5 million) but the last workman is expected to sweep up and be out of the building sometime in either December 2003 or January 2004.

From her offices in temporary quarters 100 metres down the road, Naomi Rose is clearly anticipating the day when she moves into the refurbished JCC.

Rose is the centre's executive director, a position she's held for a little over four months. The move out of the JCC was unavoidable but Rose is eagerly awaiting completion of the work so the centre can fully implement the role envisioned for it as the central headquarters, the hub of the downtown Jewish community.

It will also permit her to get closer to the JCC's members, who she says have shown uncommon loyalty during difficult and trying times over the past 10 years. Despite a financial crisis, renovations and a mould scare in recent weeks, the membership by and large has stuck by the JCC. "A lot of their lives are invested in it and they want it to last for the next generation," she said.

Rose has met many of the centre's members and she's heard stories about the JCC going back to its salad days in the 1950s and '60s. She's even talked to people who remember the old Brunswick Y, the Bloor JCC's pre-1953 predecessor.

"People remember when this place was vibrant with Jewish life," she said. "That's what we're getting at. The road has been full of pot holes, but our members don't just buy into the vision. They remember when the vision was a reality."

The vision Rose referred to is one that puts the JCC at the centre of life for downtown Jews. Tens of thousands of Jews live south of Eglinton, and many use the JCC for workouts, for afternoon Hebrew school for their kids, for friends. Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS) operates an office in the building and the centre has been the site of many other community events, from a second seder, to Purim and Chanukah celebrations to book readings.

The centre's mandate is based on four pillars, Rose explained: education, arts and culture, community development, and health and wellness. When construction is completed, it will be in a position to better deliver on its promise, and serve as the glue binding the community together.

Currently under construction is a 300-seat theatre in what used to be the building's auditorium. With an expanded stage and foldaway seating, the facility is flexible enough for a variety of performing arts.

The Downtown Jewish Day School, which is occupying other quarters while construction continues, will return in September with about 150 kids. Supplementary Hebrew school on Wednesdays and Sundays with more than 200 students is continuing, and adult education with a Judaic flavour will be offered as well, she said.

Although many of the JCC's members are not Jewish – not unusual for an urban JCC, she said – focus groups have told JCC officials that all members appreciate the centre's Jewish flavour and Jewish values.

"We live in a world where it's really important for the general community to understand the values of the community in its midst," Rose said. "The JCC contributes tremendously to developing goodwill from the wider community in Toronto to the Jewish community."

Rose is well aware that her predecessor Bill Emery, was much beloved by the centre's membership. The centre's office wing will be named the Bill Emery Wing, she said.

"He'll never be forgotten at the JCC. He was instrumental in helping the JCC survive the [financial] trauma and he was also instrumental in getting this process of rebirth going...He had the vision and energy to get it started and for me, I get to get it finished, I guess."

A native of Saskatoon who's lived in Toronto for 28 years, Rose comes to the JCC from a lengthy career in the private sector. After earning an MBA from the University of Toronto, Rose worked in packaged goods marketing, for Imperial Oil in marketing, in advertising and customer service management, and from 1996-2000 as the publisher of TV Guide magazine. Most recently, she was employed in the Internet field, getting Global Internet Registry off the ground in its business of domain name registrations.

A resident of midtown Toronto, Rose has volunteered with UJA Federation, chairing its social planning and allocation committee and serving as vice-chair of its finance and administration committee.

The Federation remains an important supporter of the JCC. "They regard us as the the flagbearer of the downtown Jewish communi-

Zundel still in custody pending refugee hearing

NIAGARA FALLS — The Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has ordered Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel to remain in custody pending the determination of his refugee claim. The IRB accepted the government's argument that Zundel would spread his anti-Semitic views if he was released.

"There are reasonable grounds to believe he supports groups that advocate violence," said IRB member Robert Murrant. Murrant cited Zundel's conviction in Germany in 1991 for violating anti-hate laws, and a ruling by the Canadian Human Rights Commission in 2001 that Zundel's Web site vilifies Jews.

Earlier, Justice Department lawyer Donald MacIntosh argued Zundel remains a danger to the public and an inciter of hatred. Citing his failure to appear at a U.S. immigration hearing in 2001, he also contended that Zundel has a history of ignoring the law.

MacIntosh and a second government lawyer, Toby Hoffman, also argued Zundel should remain in jail while the government builds its case that he is inadmissible as a national security threat.

Zundel has been in detention since he arrived in Canada on Feb. 19. Though a Canadian resident for 43 years, Zundel left Canada for the United States in 2001, saying he was severing his connections with this country.

He told reporters as he was escorted back to jail that he wanted to return to the United States, but his expulsion from the United States in mid-February carries with it a 10-year ban on re-entry.

Zundel is currently applying for refugee status, saying he fears political persecution if he is deported to his native Germany. Following his removal from the United States, German authorities charged Zundel with inciting hatred.

Zundel was represented at his hearing by Paul Fromm, the director of the Canadian Association for Free Expression, and a former school teacher who lost his job due to his association with racist groups.

Zundel told the IRB hearing he received poor legal advice from his American lawyer, causing him to miss an important U.S. immigration hearing. He said he had intended to convert his visitor's visa to one giving him permanent status, but he missed the hearing when his lawyer told him it was a routine matter.

Early last week, Dave Stewart, an official of the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS) testified Zundel is a white supremacist leader and a "lightning rod for individuals who believe in the neo-Nazi, white-supremacist philosophy."

Zundel's detention order will be reviewed again on May 2. No date has yet been set for his refugee claimant hearing.

Accused in Baranovski case discussed blaming Weiz

Two of the young men accused of killing Matti Baranovski discussed pinning the crime on Daniel Weiz, a friend of the two testified last week.

Meir Mariani and William "Lee" Cochrane said they wanted to blame Weiz and his friends. "They were thinking of going to the police and saying a different group of boys was at the park," their friend Natalie Kotin told the court. " They wanted to say it was Daniel Weiz and a bunch of his friends."

Weiz, 23, Mariani and Cochrane, both 20, are charged with second degree murder in the November 1999 beating death of Matti Baranovski. The three have all pleaded not guilty.

The Crown contends Baranovski was killed after he stood up to a group of masked toughs who demanded cigarettes and money. The accused men allegedly had gone to G. Ross Lord Park looking to take revenge on another group of Russians for an incident earlier in the week.

Several of Baranovski's friends have testified as to the sequence of events that night, but none had been able to identify the perpetrators.

Kotin said she was friends with Mariani and Cochrane and was familiar with Weiz as well.

Kotin said, "I had told them if they went [to police] and said it was Dan and his friends they'd get caught in the lie and get in even more trouble."

About a week after the crime, Cochrane showed her "he had a toothmark in his boot from kicking Matti Baranovski" and showed her the steel-toe boot with "a little indent at the tip," Kotin said.

After the incident, Kotin said Mariani told her he had pushed Baranovski to the ground because "he wasn't cooperating" when Mariani demanded money and a cigarette.

"Meir had said that if only Matti had listened, none of this would have happened," she added.

Kotin, 20, was not at the park that night but heard her friends talking about the events in the days after the death. She said Mariani told her he felt bad about the incident.

"He [Mariani] felt like it was his fault. He wasn't happy about it," Kotin testified. "If [Baranovski] had just listened and given him the money, nothing would have happened."

A pathologist is expected to testify later in the trial that Baranovski died after suffering blows to the head, neck and face. One blow was fatal, causing his head and neck to extend and twist, bursting an artery in his neck.

The trial continues.

"I have no desire for cigarettes"

Positive Changes client Sarah-Dash Arbuckle of Toronto

"I tried to quit smoking with will power, affirmations, and body and ear acupuncture. I could quit for 2-3 weeks but the cravings were uncomfortable and stressful. I would always succumb to the desire. I was tired of failing but knew of no other way.

Quitting smoking at Positive Changes Hypnosis was easy and effortless. I can now go to a bar and see people smoke, smell the cigarettes and not have a single desire or craving.

I now have more energy and confidence. I'm more expressive. My passion, my energy, and my optimism have increased — so much so that I haven't stopped talking about this experience with my friends and family. I'm working through my emotions without having to smoke. I feel so liberated!

I've recommended Positive Changes Hypnosis to many friends who want to quit. I know that I'm done with smoking and ready to move upward and onward thanks to Positive Changes Hypnosis."

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

MORE DIVERSE KOSHER SELECTION AND GIFT IDEAS FOR PASSOVER FROM THE LCBO

Kosher wines have grown in popularity in Ontario in recent years as they increasingly come to reflect popular consumer tastes, with dry table wines slowly displacing traditional sweet red wines, according to the LCBO.

To assist consumers with preparing the seder meal and entertaining, 38 selected LCBO stores are offering a large selection of kosher products in time for Passover.

Some 90 kosher products are available. Most of them, including a number of red, white and rosé table wines, are kosher for Passover. Flavoured, fortified, dessert and sparkling wines and icewines from Australia, Israel, France, Hungary, Italy, Chile, Austria, Denmark, California and New York State are also available.

There is also a wide array of spirits, including brandy, arrack, vodka and liqueurs. Prices start at $6.45 for wines and $11.10 for spirits.

For those giving kosher products as a special gift this Passover, the LCBO is offering an attractive spring blue gingham gift bag, available for $4.95, beginning April 1 at selected stores.

This year, several international award-winning kosher wines are available, including Baron Herzog 2000 California Chenin Blanc at $12.00, Australia's Teal Lake 2000 Shiraz at $17.00 and Bartenura 2000 Moscato D'Asti from Italy at $15.75.

LCBO is also offering 17 products from Israel, including Barkan Classic Cabernet Sauvignon at $14.65 and the unique Stopka Molasses Spirit at $20.25, the only white spirit (with the flavour of vodka) that is kosher for Passover.

"Consumers are continuing to trade up to better quality and diverse kosher products from all over the world," says Deana Steene, the LCBO product manager responsible for purchasing kosher products.

"This year, the LCBO again offers a variety of superb products that taste wonderful and reflect the interests of a sophisticated buying public."

In the Toronto area, the LCBO's complete kosher-for-Passover selection is on display at its kosher outlet at 441 Clark Avenue West, Thornhill; the Bayview Village store, 2901 Bayview Avenue; and LCBO stores at 381 Wilson Avenue and 221 Wilmington Avenue in Downsview. Based on availability, consumers can also order kosher products from any LCBO store across Ontario, at no extra cost.

For more information on LCBO products and services, including kosher-for-Passover offerings, call the toll-free LCBO Infoline at 1-800-ONT-LCBO (668-5226); in the Toronto area, call 416 365-5900.

EATING GOES ON AFTER THE SEDERS

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

After so many large dinners during the week of Passover, the other meals tend, by design, to be fairly simple.

With keep-it-simple parameters in mind, I discovered a slightly different version of the classic Passover lasagna that has a really luscious filling. I have also experimented with eggplant and even tried a new twist on fried chicken. I use fresh herbs and spices, and I try to keep the matzah to a minimum.

Every year I love finding new recipes, and I'm happy to pass along some of the tried-and-true winners that my family voted as keepers.

PESACH SCHNITZEL WITH A TWIST
(meat)

2 boneless chicken breasts, cut into 4 pieces each
1 tbsp. oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice, or the juice of 1 lemon
salt and pepper to taste
2 tsp. minced garlic
3 tbsp. flat-leafed parsley, finely chopped
1/3 cup matzah cake meal
1 egg
1 to 2 tbsp. water
a little oil for frying, about 1 inch deep
1 lemon cut into quarters

In a bowl, combine the oil, lemon juice, salt, pepper, garlic and parsley. Marinate the chicken pieces in a mixture for about 1 hour. In another bowl, prepare the batter by mixing together the matzo cake meal, egg and enough water to obtain a thick creamy mixture. Dip the chicken pieces in the batter to coat. Heat the oil in a heavy pan and then pan fry the chicken schnitzel until it's golden, turning once (approx. 4 to 5 minutes on each side). Serve with lemon quarters. Serves 2.

EGGPLANT MATZAH MINA
(dairy)

Matzah minas, which are layered casseroles or pies, could be considered a Sephardi lasagna.

2 medium eggplants
2 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion, finely chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
15-oz. can tomato sauce
14-oz. can tomatoes, drained and chopped
2 to 3 tbsp. minced fresh parsley
½ tsp. each: dried oregano, dried basil, and paprika salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
6 matzot
1 lb. mozzarella cheese

Preheat the broiler. Cut eggplant into ½-inch slices and peel. Brush lightly with oil and broil on each side until tender. Heat the oil in a deep saucepan. Add the onion and garlic and saute until golden. Add the tomato sauce, tomatoes, parsley, and seasonings. Bring to a simmer and cook over low heat, covered, for 15 minutes.

Break each matzah into three strips. Fill a shallow casserole dish with lightly salted water. Place the matzah strips in it for 2 to 3 minutes until pliable but not mushy. Remove carefully to a plate, Preheat the oven to 350. Lightly oil a large, shallow baking casserole and layer as follows: a thin layer of sauce, a layer of eggplant, a layer of matzah and a layer of cheese.

Repeat. Bake for 35 to 40 minutes, or until the cheese is touched with brown spots. Makes 8 to 10 servings

SAUTÉED CARROTS AND BROCCOLI WITH PECANS
(pareve)

2 ½ tbsp. margarine
2 pounds carrots, thinly sliced
3 cups broccoli spears
¼ cup apple juice
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 to 3 tbsp. minced chives
½ cup pecans, chopped
dash salt

Heat the margarine in a large skillet. Add the carrots and sauté over moderate heat, stirring frequently, until crisp-tender and beginning to turn golden, about 8 to 10 minutes. Add the broccoli and continue cooking for another 4 to 5 minutes. If the skillet begins to turn dry, add a little of the apple juice while sauteing. When the carrots and broccoli are crisp-tender, add the remaining apple juice and sauté, stirring, until it is absorbed. Stir in the lemon juice, chives and pecans. Cook for an additional minute and then transfer to a serving dish. Serve immediately. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Gilletz dishes up some favourites

She offers some of the recipes she demonstrated:

FAKE 'N BAKE BURGERS

A wonderful way to use up mashed potatoes! Large patties make a super vegetarian main dish, minis make great hors d'œuvres. These are also perfect for Passover. What a rainbow of colour and flavour!

4 medium potatoes (or 3 sweet potatoes)
2 medium onions, chopped
1 green and 1 red pepper, chopped
2 cloves garlic, crushed
2 tsp. olive or vegetable oil
3 carrots peeled and grated (about 1 cup)
salt and pepper, to taste
2 unpeeled zucchini, grated (about 2 cups)
1/4 cup minced dill and/or parsley
2 eggs (or 1 egg and 2 egg whites)
1 cup matzah meal (or bread crumbs)
approx. 1 tbsp. additional oil

Peel potatoes and cut into chunks. Boil in salted water until tender, 15 to 20 minutes. Drain well and mash. You should have about 2 cups.

While potatoes are cooking, prepare remaining veggies. (So quick in the processor!) In a large non-stick skillet (or microwave), cook onions, peppers and garlic in 2 tsp. oil for 5 minutes, until softened. Add carrots and zucchini. Cook 3 or 4 minutes longer. Cool slightly. Add remaining ingredients except additional oil. Mix well.

Preheat oven to 375. Spray a foil-lined baking sheet with non-stick spray. Form mixture into patties. (An ice cream scoop or 1/4-cup measure works well.)

Oil your fingertips, then lightly oil the tops of the patties, flattening them slightly. Bake uncovered at 375 for 10 to 12 minutes. Turn patties over and bake 10 minutes longer.

76 calories per patty, 2 g fat (0.4 saturated), 24 mg cholesterol, 2 g protein, 13 g carbohydrate, 17 mg sodium, 202 mg potassium, <1 mg iron, 2 g fibre, 15 mg calcium.

Variations:

Add a 10-oz. pkg. chopped cooked spinach, squeezed dry, to cooked vegetables. If desired, substitute chopped mushrooms for zucchini and add a dash of thyme. Be creative and try various vegetables. Leftover veggies are great!

Mini Burgers: Prepare Fake 'n Bake Burger mixture and make small patties. Bake 15 to 20 minutes (or brown for 3 to 4 minutes per side in a little oil in a non-stick skillet). You'll get about 60 minis, each one containing 23 calories and 0.6 g fat (0.1 g saturated).

Grain Burgers: Follow recipe for Fake 'n Bake Burgers, but instead of potatoes, substitute 2 cups leftover cooked rice, bulgur, millet, couscous or quinoa. Cooked grain should be moist and sticky. Process on steel knife of processor until fine. Combine with remaining ingredients. Bake as directed, or sauté for 4 to 5 minutes per side in a little oil.

Vegetarian Burgers: Follow recipe for Fake 'n Bake Burgers, but instead of potatoes, use 2 cups cooked or canned lentils, chickpeas or green peas. Rinse and drain well. Process until finely ground. Mix with remaining ingredients. Bake as directed, or sauté 4 to 5 minutes per side in a little oil.

From MealLeaniYumm! Yield: about 18 patties. These reheat and/or freeze well.

REACHED THE MATZAH SATURATION THRESHOLD?

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Imagine it's the sixth or seventh night of Passover and you're heading into the home stretch of the holiday. There are those people who could live on matzah with butter and jam indefinitely.

However, others find that the daily consumption of matzah and all its various configurations from matzah brei and matzah meal pancakes to kugels and leaden cakes brings them to their matzah saturation threshold (MST) before the holiday ends. So what do you serve at the final festive dinners to the people who have reached their MST?

The trick is to keep the meals simple. If you're feeding carnivores, they will never tire of a well-made chicken or beef dish as a main course. (There are many people who could easily eat brisket every night of the year.) While there should be a plate of matzah on the table, perhaps served with a dip or two, family and or dinner guests may welcome some matzah-meal free appetizers and side-dishes at this point in the holiday.

A salad is always a wonderful addition to a meal and you can whip up some fabulous dressings because many condiments like balsamic vinegar, Dijon mustard and a variety of oils are available in the Passover food section.

Some cooked vegetables like steamed or lightly boiled broccoli or cauliflower can also complement any meal nicely. The main course could then be rounded out with soup and/or some vegetarian side-dishes in the matzah-free zone. Here are some recipes. The first two are from the book High Fibre: High Flavour, by Rosemary Moon (New Burlington Books, London 2000)

ORANGE AND BUTTERNUT SOUP

1 large onion, chopped
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1-2 butternut squashes (2 lb.), peeled and diced) grated rind and juice of 2 oranges
6 cups vegetable stock
2 bay leaves
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
nutmeg, freshly grated
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Cook the onion in oil until softened, but not browned. Add the prepared squash and cook slowly for five minutes stirring occasionally. Stir in grated orange rind and then add stock, bay leaves and seasonings. Bring to a boil, and simmer for 40 minutes until the squash is tender and cooked through.

Allow soup to cool slightly. Remove the bay leaves, then puree mixture in a blender or food processor until smooth. Rinse the pot and return the soup to it adding the orange juice. Reheat the soup slowly. Do not let it boil after adding the orange juice or the flavour could become tainted. Season to taste. Add the chopped parsley and sprinkle with nutmeg. Serves 4 to 6.

GUACAMOLE

Moon writes that guacamole should have a slightly rough texture and not be blended into a paste. Guacamole can be served at room temperature as a dip with crudities and it's a fine accompaniment for matzah for those who can't get enough of it.

2 large ripe avocados
2 medium tomatoes seeded and chopped
1 small mild green chili seeded and finely chopped.

grated rind and juice of 1 lime
2 onions trimmed and finely chopped
1-2 medium cloves of garlic, crushed
½ tsp. salt

Scoop out the flesh from the avocados and mash it thoroughly with a fork. Add the remaining ingredients, seasoning gradually with salt to taste. Serve at room temperature.

GARLIC ROSEMARY NEW POTATOES

This recipe Comes from The Lazy Gourmet, by Susan Mendelson and Joey Cruz (Whitecaps Books, Vancouver, 2000)

12 cups of baby red new potatoes, cut in thirds or quarters depending on the size
⅓ cup of olive oil
4 tbsp. of minced garlic
2 tbsp. of rosemary leaves
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Preheat the oven to 375. Blanch the potatoes in boiling salted water for about 5 minutes or approximately 1 minute after the water has returned to a boil. Drain and pat dry with paper towels.

Toss the potatoes with olive oil, garlic, rosemary, salt and pepper. Place on a baking dish in preheated oven for approximately 25 minutes and roast until golden brown. Toss

Passover Food Ideas

Passover Seder Weaves Generations Together

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

Although I've been attending Passover seders from the time I was knee-high to a seder table, I have never really thought about how all this story-telling relates to me.

Every year at our seder, we retell the story of Passover: how 5,000 years ago, Moses miraculously led the Jews to freedom from slavery in Pharaoh's Egypt. Even the food at Passover is central to the story. For what better way to understand the bitterness of slavery than to taste a herb so harsh that it brings tears to your eyes? Or how better to feel their deprivation and misery than to eat matzah, the bread of affliction? Or what about the sweetness of freedom? How better to savour it than by eating the fruit and honey mixture, charoset. It's all part of experiencing what our ancestors endured. It's all part of the story.

But come on, what's the link to my life?

In Judaism, if we have a question, we ask a rabbi. I decided to ask Rabbi Daniel Bouskilla of the Sephardic Temple Tifereth Israel in Los Angeles.

As is typical, he answered my question with a question.

"Did you know that by retelling the story of what happened thousands of years ago, it brings us closer together?"

"No," I said. "How's that?"

As is also typical, he answered my second question with a story.

A friend of his once attended a large family seder led by its patriarch, a Holocaust survivor. Since it was such a sensitive subject, his family had been careful never to ask about his experiences during the war. As he was reading from the Haggadah, he came to a phrase that commands fathers to tell their children about their lives, so that the children will better understand their heritage.

The man turned white, leaned back, and was utterly silent for several minutes.

occasionally to brown on all sides. For a variation, the authors suggest roasting whole garlic cloves with the potatoes. Serves 8.

GLAZED SWEET POTATOES

From Norene Gilletz's Meal-LeaniYum! (Norene Gilletz Kitchen Edition, 1998)

2 onions peeled and diced
4 sweet potatoes peeled and cut in chunks
2 tsp. olive oil or melted margarine
2 tbsp. of honey or syrup
salt and pepper to taste
¼ tsp. dried basil
¼ cup of orange juice

Preheat the oven to 375. Grease a Pyrex casserole with non-stick spray or margarine or oil.

Arrange onion in the bottom of the casserole; add sweet potatoes. Drizzle with olive oil and maple syrup or honey. Sprinkle with seasonings. Drizzle orange juice over the potatoes. Rub sweet potatoes well to coat them with the mixture. Cover and bake at 375 for 45 minutes. Uncover and bake 15 minutes longer, stirring once or twice until the potatoes are tender and golden. Serves 6. Reheats well, but do not freeze.

COOKING LIKE GILLETZ!

MUSTACHUDOS

This gluten-free cookie is a perfect all-year round Turkish Delight.

3 cups almonds (or a mixture of walnuts and pecans)
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Steel Blade: Process almonds using on/off pulses, until coarsely chopped, about 30 seconds. (Walnuts and pecans will take less time.) Don't grind nuts too fine or you will have nut butter! Empty bowl. Process sugar with eggs and cinnamon until well mixed, 20 to 30 seconds. Add nuts and process 10 to 15 seconds longer to combine. Mixture will be like a thick paste.

Drop by teaspoonfuls onto parchment-lined sheet, leaving 1 inch between cookies. Bake for 12 minutes. When done, cookies will be oatmeal-coloured with lightly browned edges. However, they will be slightly soft and not look baked. Do not remove cookies from pan until completely cooled. They will firm up as they cool. If baked until firm, they will be too hard when they cool completely. Yield: 4 to 5 dozen. Freeze well.

From the food processor bible.

GLAZED ROASTED TURKEY

If you love stuffing but want to avoid the extra fat, bake it separately in a covered casserole to prevent it from absorbing the fatty drippings from the turkey.

Turkey:
10 to 12 lb. turkey
3 oranges
salt and pepper, to taste
3 cloves garlic, crushed
2 tsp. dried basil
2 tsp. dried thyme

Glaze:
2 tsp. olive oil
3 tbsp. Dijon mustard
3 tbsp. honey
3 tbsp. apricot jam or glaze
3 tbsp. orange liqueur (e.g. Sabra)

Remove giblets from turkey. Rinse turkey inside and out and pat dry. Squeeze juice from two of the oranges over turkey, both inside and out. Rub with garlic and spirnkle with seasonings. Slice the remaining orange and place slices under the turkey skin to keep turkey moist during cooking. (Turkey can be prepared in advance up to this point and refrigerated covered for up to 2 days.)

Preheat oven to 325. Place turkey breast side down on a rack in a roasting pan. Pour ½ cup of water into the pan. Cover turkey loosely with foil, leaving the ends open. Roast turkey for 3 hours.

While turkey is roasting, prepare glaze. Heat oil, mustard, honey and jam in a small saucepan until hot. Remove from heat and stir in orange liqueur. Uncover turkey, turn it breast side up and brush with glaze. Roast uncovered about 1 hour longer, until golden, basting with glaze occasionally. When done, a meat thermometer should register 180.

Transfer turkey to a cutting board or serving platter and cover with foil. Let stand for 20 minutes for easier carving. Remove skin and discard. Serve turkey with homemade cranberry sauce.

Variation:

The Right Stuff: Prepare stuffing in advance and refrigerate it separately. If you insist on cooking your turkey with stuffing (that's the chubby chick method!) stuff it just before cooking. Stuffing must be cooked until it reaches 165 on a meat thermometer. To serve leftovers, remove stuffing from turkey and wrap separately.

Yield: 10 4-oz. servings, plus leftover. Leftover turkey can be refrigerated or frozen.

PASSOVER LASAGNA

2 medium onions, cut in chunks
1 red bell pepper, cut in chunks
2 cups mushrooms
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 tbsp. oil
12 oz. mozzarella cheese (3 cups grated)
3 cups cottage cheese
4 cups Passover tomato sauce
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste dried basil and oregano to taste
7 matzot (approximately)

Preheat oven to 375.

Slicer: Slice onions, pepper and mushrooms, using medium pressure. Combine in microwavable bowl with garlic and oil. Microwave on high for 5 minutes, until softened.

Grater: Grate mozzarella cheese, using medium pressure. Remove from bowl and reserve.

Steel Blade: Process cottage cheese until smooth and creamy, 1 to 2 minutes, scraping down sides of bowl as needed.

Season tomato sauce with salt, pepper, basil and oregano. Spread ⅓ of the sauce in sprayed 9 x 13-inch glass baking dish. Briefly rinse matzos with hot water; drain. Arrange a layer of matzos over sauce, trimming matzos to fit. Spread ½ of the cottage cheese over matzos. Top with ½ of the vegetables. Sprinkle with ⅓ of the mozzarella cheese. Repeat, layering sauce, matzot, cottage cheese, vegetables, and mozzarella cheese. Top with matzos and tomato sauce. Sprinkle with mozzarella cheese. (Can be made in advance up to this point and refrigerated.)

Bake uncovered, 40 to 45 minutes. Let stand 10 minutes for easier cutting. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

Finally, he exclaimed, "I think I have been a bad Jew."

Everyone was perplexed. How could this kind, generous, religious man, who was greatly beloved by his family, think he was a bad Jew? How was this possible?

He heaved a heavy sigh.

"I have never told you what happened to me. I have never shared my experiences." And so, on this Passover he spent several hours relating his painful story, which his children, grandchildren and everyone in attendance will never forget.

And so I finally realized what the telling of the Passover story means to me.

If we liken the exodus from Egypt into the Promised Land – the trip that takes us from bondage to freedom – to our sometimes sweet, sometimes painful journey through life, we realize how similar our lives are to our ancestors.

So, this Passover I will encourage my parents to tell us their stories, and maybe I will tell my children my story and maybe…

For if the point of the seder is to bring everyone closer together, then what more important story could anyone want to hear?

STRACCIATELLA REALE (SPRING SOUP)

2 leeks, white part only, thinly sliced into rings
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/2 head escarole, washed and thinly sliced
1/4 lb. baby spinach, well washed and stemmed
2 quarts chicken broth, or more as needed
1 bunch small asparagus tips
2 tbsp. Italian parsley, coarsely chopped
4 eggs
4 tbsp. matzah meal
salt and coarsely ground black pepper to taste

In a heavy soup pot, sauté leeks in olive oil until they start to wilt. Add escarole, spinach, and stir until coated with oil and beginning to wilt. Add chicken broth, to cover. Bring to gentle simmer; cook until greens are tender. Add asparagus tips and half the parsley; continue to simmer. In small bowl, beat together eggs, matzah meal and remaining parsley. Just before ready to serve, bring soup to rolling boil and pour egg mixture into pot, stirring constantly. Adjust seasonings. Serve immediately. Serves 8.

TURKISH CHAROSET

There are as many variations on charoset as there are ways of retelling the Passover story.

2 sweet apples, peeled, cored and chopped
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup large golden raisins or sultanas
1/2 cup white figs, coarsely chopped
1/4 cup dried cherries (optional)
1/2 cup walnuts, shelled and chopped fine
1/2 cup ground almonds
1 tbsp. lemon zest
1 tbsp. brown sugar or honey
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
pinch of cayenne pepper
2 to 3 tbsp. sweet red Passover wine, or more, if necessary.

Cover apples with lemon juice in bowl. Chop fruit and nuts by hand, or if you prefer, place in food processor. Stir in lemon zest, sugar and spices; taste and adjust seasonings. Moisten with wine to make thick paste. Serves 6.

MATZAH LASAGNA WITH FRESH TOMATO-BASIL SAUCE

2 onions, peeled, and thinly sliced olive oil for cooking
1 lb. mushrooms, stems trimmed, cut into quarters
4 garlic cloves, peeled and minced
1 bunch fresh Italian parsley, stemmed and coarsely chopped
2 bunches fresh basil, stemmed and coarsely chopped
2 bunches fresh spinach, washed and stemmed
1 box frozen artichoke hearts, defrosted coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
2 boxes matzah

In large skillet, cook onions in oil until golden brown. Set aside. Sauté mushrooms over high heat, adding garlic, half the parsley, and basil to taste. When done set aside in small bowl. Braise spinach with garlic to taste in olive oil with just water clinging to their leaves, in a covered pan. When finished, set aside in bowl. Cook artichokes with half the garlic, remaining herbs, oil to taste, and a touch of water in small pan until tender. Set aside in bowl.

Fresh Tomato-Basil Sauce

1/4 cup olive oil
2 garlic cloves, peeled and minced
12 Roma tomatoes, stem end removed and cut into quarters or 1 28-oz. can pear tomatoes in juice
8 large fresh basil leaves
coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Heat oil in large skillet over medium heat. Add garlic and sauté until garlic gives off its characteristic aroma. Add tomatoes and cook over moderately high heat until tomatoes begin to break down and form a sauce. Stir frequently to help the tomatoes begin to break down. Add basil; season with salt and pepper; continue cooking over moderately high heat, stirring occasionally, until sauce is thick and no longer watery. Remove from heat and put sauce through the medium disk of a food mill.

To Assemble Lasagna:

Preheat oven to 375. Cover bottom of baking dish with a ladleful of sauce. Make a layer of matzah that completely covers bottom of pan. Spoon generous ladleful of sauce onto matzah. Using back of a spoon or rubber spatula, spread sauce evenly. Place layer of onions over sauce. Top with half the mushrooms. Again, drizzle with sauce. Make another layer of matzah. Continue layering with cooked vegetables, sauce and matzah until all ingredients are used. Finish with layer of matzah topped with layer of sauce. Cover casserole with aluminum foil. Place in preheated oven, cook 40 minutes or until bubbling hot.

MEDITERRANEAN SPINACH SALAD WITH DRIED APRICOTS AND OLIVES

1 lb. spinach, washed and stemmed
1/2 cup yellow bell pepper, chopped coarsely
1/2 cup red or orange bell pepper, chopped coarsely
1/2 cup Greek olives
1/2 cup dried apricots chopped coarsely
1/4 cup pine nuts
2 tbsp. Italian parsley, chopped coarsely
2 tbsp. chives, chopped coarsely
juice of 1/2 lemon
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. walnut oil
1 teaspoon cumin
1/4 tsp. cayenne
1 tsp. kosher salt, or to taste

Place first 6 ingredients in salad bowl. Pour remaining ingredients in jar. Shake vigorously. Pour contents of jar into bowl and toss salad gently. Serves 4 to 6.

Amica aims to make retirement invigorating

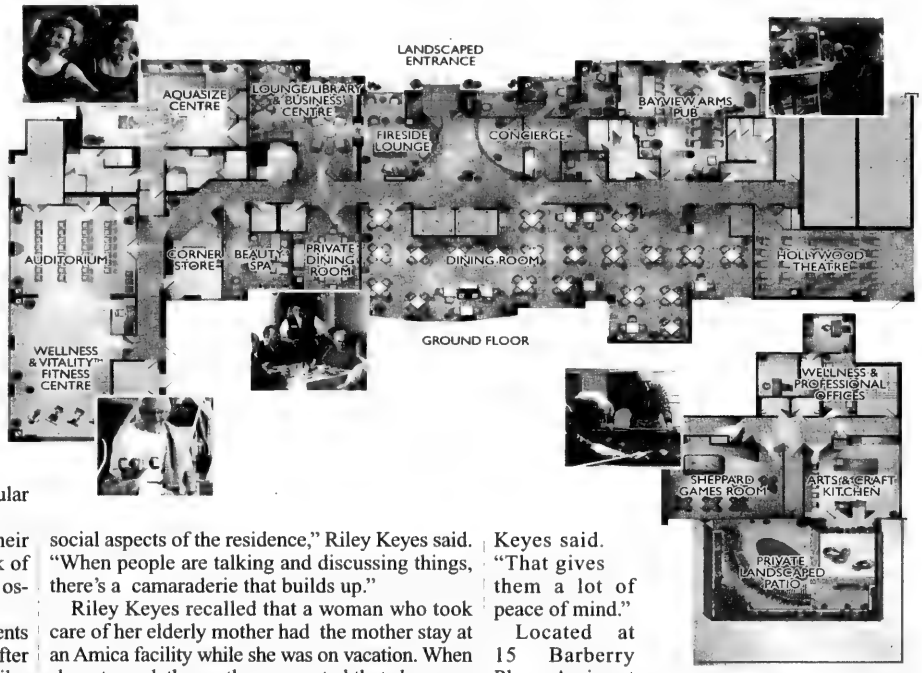
While retirement is something most of us covet, when the time arrives to stop working and settle into the seniors' lifestyle, many people find themselves at a loss.

It's difficult to get out to see your friends. It's a nuisance to cook your meals. Exercising seems like it requires strength you think you don't have. Amica at Bayview, a retirement residence opening in the Bayview Ave. and Sheppard Ave. E. area in late June 2003, is aiming to make the retirement experience invigorating.

"Our emphasis is on wellness, vitality and exercise," said marketing manager Vicky Riley Keyes.

"We are seeing the positive benefits of our wellness and vitality programs in all our communities across the G.T.A."

Amica's focus on exercise is cutting edge. Residents use special machines, free weights and do a variety of exercises to build up muscular strength, endurance, speed and balance.



Most importantly, the exercise improves their physical and mental health, reducing the risk of various heath problems, such as heart disease, osteoporosis and depression.

Riley Keyes said 85 per cent of current residents participate in the strength training exercise, after having a wellness and vitality co-coordinator tailor a program to their needs in consultation with their doctor. "It's like having a personal trainer, she says".

Amica Mature Lifestyles, operates 15 retirement communities across Canada and has built their reputation on providing hotel-inspired environments and services. Amica at Bayview is being developed and built by the Daniels Corporation, a well respected builder in the G.T.A.

Bright and well-designed suites offer a choice of studio, 1 & 2 bdrm. units. Each comes with a kitchenette and a private bathroom with built-in seated shower.

Lunches and dinners are prepared daily by a professional chef and late risers can head to the dining area for coffee and muffins in the morning. "Food is very important to our residents," Riley Keyes said. "We offer a selection of choices and can cater to special diets".

"As well as feeding the body, we want to continue to feed the mind." To that end, Amica at Bayview offers lectures and presentations to residents, as well as a movie theatre.

For billiard and card aficionados, Amica at Bayview comes equipped with a games room. If you're into some quiet time outside of the suite, read the newspaper in the fireside lounge.

There is also a greenhouse for gardening fans, a kiln for pottery and a aqua fit pool for pleasure and exercise.

"People will tremendously benefit from the social aspects of the residence," Riley Keyes said. "When people are talking and discussing things, there's a camaraderie that builds up."

Riley Keyes recalled that a woman who took care of her elderly mother had the mother stay at an Amica facility while she was on vacation. When she returned, the mother requested that she move into Amica full-time. "She said 'I've had such a good time that I want to stay'," Riley Keyes said.

Riley Keyes also noted that Amica at Bayview is an attractive living option for seniors because it is secure and provides health services. "A registered nurse is on staff 24 hours a day," Riley Keyes said. "That gives them a lot of peace of mind."

Located at 15 Barberry Place, Amica at Bayview is directly across from the Bayview Village Shopping Centre, and close to North York General Hospital. Its central locale makes it accessible to family and friends "We encourage residents to have family and friends stay over," Riley Keyes said, noting residents are free to entertain whomever they want.

Maintaining independence is important to many seniors and Amica at Bayview strives to let residents do just that. Residents can decorate and furnish their suites according to their personal styles and they can do their own laundry at an in-house facility if they prefer.

As the company web site explains, "residents maintain an active and independent lifestyle with the benefit of living in an assisted environment." For instance, housekeeping, which includes having bedding changed and the suites cleaned, is provided on a weekly basis.

Amica brings together services and amenities in one place and provides a forum for people to befriend one another. "When it's all here, people are more likely to join these activities and events," Riley Keyes said. "People have worked hard all their lives and now they are able to afford this lifestyle."

Amica at Bayview has 140 suites and is currently leasing suites to residents who will move in this July.

For information, call 416-977-3177 or visit their website at www.amica.ca.

YOUR PRIVATE COLLECTION, ENJOYED OTHER WAYS

Passover is a time of visiting, and eating together with family and friends.

The emphasis for this marathon cooking extravaganza is primarily on the seder meals; however, any afternoon between the seders is a perfect occasion for high tea.

High tea, originally a British working class tradition, was called "high" as it was often served standing at a buffet table or sitting on a high stool in a teashop.

High tea today is a more elegant affair served in restaurants and hotels around the world.

The traditional British high tea included savoury dishes, cakes, scones, marmalades of various kinds, tea sandwiches, and, of course, a selection of teas.

We have invited four chefs from four kosher kitchens in Toronto, and Carol Slatt of Lorac Wine/Galilee Wine Company to create a menu for a high tea at Passover.

The wonderful dessert recipes and sparkling wine and dessert wine matches will complement your high tea table. Select some of your favourite teas that are kosher for Passover.

CHOCOLATE BROWNIES WITH CHOCOLATE GLAZE

From Sweet York Desserts

Brownies:

8 oz. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, chopped
1 stick (½ cup) unsalted margarine cut into pieces
3 large eggs
½ cup sugar
½ tsp. salt
2 tsp. finely grated orange zest
¼ cup matzah cake meal
¼ cup pecans, coarsely chopped

Glaze:

3 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
⅓ cup sweet red kosher wine
2 oz. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, chopped
6 tbsp.unsalted margarine, cut in pieces
16 pecan halves

Brownies:

Preheat oven to 350. Line bottom and sides of a 9-in. square baking pan with wax paper. Melt chocolate and margarine in a metal bowl set over a saucepan of barely simmering water, stirring until smooth. Remove from heat and cool 5 minutes.

Beat eggs, sugar and salt in a large bowl of electric mixer on high speed until pale and thick. Beat in chocolate in batches on low speed. Stir in zest, matzah meal and nuts just until blended. Spread batter in baking pan and bake in middle of oven until firm and a tester comes out clean, 25 to 30 minutes. Cool in pan on rack, then invert onto a platter and removed paper.

Glaze:

Whisk together sugar, cocoa and wine in small saucepan. Bring to a boil, whisking, then simmer 2 minutes, whisking occasionally. Add chocolate and whisk until melted. Remove from heat and whisk in margarine until smooth. Chill glaze stirring occasionally, until spreadable. Spread glaze over brownies and arrange pecan halves on top. Cut into 16 squares with knife.

Serving suggestion: Carmel Cuvée Brut Reserve Sparkling.

CHOCOLATE AND ORANGE TART, POACHED PEAR, SERVED WITH A SOFT CARAMEL SAUCE

From Zuchter Berk Caterers

Tart:

½ lb. of sweet dough (using cake meal)
4 oz. chocolate
½ cup whip topping
zest of 1 orange

Preheat the oven to 350. Roll the dough to ¼ inch and place in the 6 individual tart moulds. Place the tarts in the oven and bake until light golden colour (6-8 minutes). Chop the chocolate and place in a bowl. Bring the whip topping to a boil, then pour over the chocolate while stirring. Add the zest. Pour the mix in the tart shells, and let it chill in the fridge for 3-4 hours.

Poached Pears:

3 Forrel pears
4 cups water
½ bottle of Muscat
½ lb. sugar
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 lemon

Put all these ingredients, except the pears, in a small saucepan (small enough to have the pears completely immersed in the syrup while being poached), and bring to a boil. While waiting for the syrup to boil, peel the pears, rub them with half of the lemon (so they don't turn black) and place them in a bowl of cold water with the other half of the lemon (squeezed and left in). Once the syrup is boiling, place the pears in the saucepan, cover and poach them until a knife can go through without resistance (10-15 minutes). Let them cool in the syrup, in the fridge.

Sauce:

1 cup (scant) sugar water
½ cup whip topping, room temperature

Passover Food Ideas

TREAT GUESTS TO A TRADITIONAL HIGH TEA

Place the sugar in a small saucepan and add just enough water to dissolve it. Place on the stove and cook it until a light brown colour, remove from heat and add the whip topping really slowly (the difference of temperature makes the caramel triple in size and splash). Stir well and place back on the stove to get a smooth consistency. Let cool down in the fridge for 6-8 hours.

Suggestion for presentation: Cut the pears in half, core them and slice them to form a fan. Place the tart in the centre of the plate, place the fanned pear on the tart and add a couple of mint leaves for colour. Drizzle the sauce around the tart, and decorate with a few cut strawberries. Serves 6.

Serving suggestion: Chilled Fantasia Peach.

BRANDIED PEACHES

3 dozen peaches
32 cups water
4 cups sugar
2 oz. Carmel Brandy 777
lemon juice

Peel, half and pit peaches, add a squirt of lemon juice, bring water and sugar to a boil, add peaches and cook until just starting to get tender. Place peach halves into sterilized 1- litre jars, pour in boiling syrup, enough to just cover the peaches. Top off with 1 tablespoon of brandy. Seal and place in boiling water bath for 7-8 minutes. Remove and let stand for 3 weeks before serving. Yield: 6-8 jars.

Serving suggestion: Small glasses of Carmel Brandy 777 to complement.

CHOCOLATE TORTE WITH MUSCAT & GRAPE CONFIT

Created by Pastry Chef Sitram Sharma

4 oz. dark chocolate
1 cup 35 per cent cream
2 egg yolks
1/3 cup sugar
2 oz. white chocolate

Melt dark chocolate over bain marie or double-boiler at medium heat. Whip egg yolk and sugar until light and fluffy. Whip 35 per cent cream to soft peak. Whisk all ingredients including chocolate until smooth, soft mousse. Refrigerate in 3 3x3-in. circular moulds until set (approximately 1 1/2 hours). Melt white chocolate and use to decorate.

Private Collection Muscat and Grape Confit:
green and red grapes
2 oz. Private Collection Muscat

Dice green and red grapes. Heat muscat and grapes over medium heat until warm. Drizzle Private Collection Muscat and grape confit around chocolate torte.

Serving suggestion: Carmel Private Collection Muscat.

QUESTIONS ABOUT KASHRUT? CALL THE PESACH HOTLINE

"I'm a vegetarian. Do I have to have meat on my seder plate?" " I have never made my home kosher for Passover, but I would like to. How can I do it?" "What should I feed my pets on Pesach?"

These are some of the many questions answered over the years by the toll-free Operation Pesach Passover Information hotline – 1-888-MATZAH1 (1-888-628-9241), since its inception in 1985. The hotline will be open this year from April 7 to 15, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., eastern time.

"The Passover holiday is often perceived as very complicated. People run to hotels as far away as Hawaii to avoid the hassle," says Rabbi Ronald Price, executive vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ), the transdenominational education and outreach organization that sponsors the hotline.

"Operation Pesach takes some of the mystery out of the holiday preparation and helps people bring Passover into their homes for a hands-on joyous experience."

Calls to the New Jersey-based hotline will be answered by rabbis, lay leaders and the editor of The Kosher Nexus, the UTJ's national kashrut newsletter. After-hours calls will be recorded and returned the next day.

The UTJ also maintains a national clearinghouse for the selling of chametz. To access it, call the hotline, or visit www.utj.org.

Muslim, Jewish students eat and laugh together

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Breaking bread, sharing ideas and attempting to quell stereotypes were the goals of an informal dinner of Jewish and Muslim students at the University of Ottawa on March 25.

A mix of 18 students from U of O's Muslim Student Association (MSA) and the Jewish Student Association Hillel Ottawa (JSA) responded to the JSA initiative and gathered together for a small, yet powerful evening.

The informal jamboree was fired up by a group discussion dealing with wide-ranging topics from people's home countries to biology class. After mingling and playing icebreaker games where students had to ask each other peculiar questions such as "Do you eat sushi?" or "How many languages do you speak?" the group dined on a spread of falafel and pita.

"Peace is not just written on paper. It starts with people," said Michelle Divon, the 17-year old daughter of Haim Divon, the Israeli ambassador to Canada.

"It's amazing that both sides showed up. That everyone made the effort is incredible," said the high-school student at Ashbury College. She and her friend Lana Ayoub, the daughter of the Jordanian ambassador to Canada, came up with the dinner idea, she said.

About the recent hostile environment on several Canadian campuses, including at Carleton University just across the Rideau Canal, Divon said, "I don't know why the two groups don't talk or speak; it's ridiculous; you're all Canadian."

Judging from the dinner's spirited atmosphere, the groups didn't merely talk, but enjoyed each other's company.

"This will help us progress," said Riaz Ingar, president of the MSA. "[Now, we] can get to know each other as individuals. When you know someone on a personal basis, it's harder to discriminate and have a bias."

After the icebreaking game, the group was sat at assigned places to ensure a Muslim student would sit beside a Jewish student.

"With all the negativity that is going on, we want something positive," said Inbal Soloman, a JSA member who helped organize the event. "As opposed to in your face political rhetoric, this will set a level playing field."

Her friend Karen Swirsky added, "It's interesting. We don't focus on our differences, but our similarities."

After enjoying a good laugh with Swirsky, Sogol Kafi, who has only been in Canada two months after moving from her native Persia, said, with a wide smile, "I never had these chances in my other country."

Kafi, a U of O biology student, said, "This event was totally perfect. I found out about it in residence and was really amazed." She said organizers should advertise such events more to let more people know about them.

Muslim students from Carleton University – a campus known to be more politically active than U of O – declined the invite, saying it wasn't appropriate at this time. But Leor Grebler, the incoming JSA president at Carleton, remains optimistic.

"It [the event] is a great way to bring down walls and to show that we can coexist," he said. "There shouldn't be animosity between the two communities. This is a good test case, we can expand and make a bigger event at Carleton."

The two organizations agreed to continue such events, and suggested students from more religions should be included in the future.

URGENT APPEAL FOR PASSOVER FOOD FOR NEEDY ISRAELI FAMILIES!

Passover Seder is very near and in the town of Tzfat, a community in northern Israel, there is an urgent need to relieve hunger. Due to the severe economic downturn and the bad weather, income for these families has been drastically reduced.

As you know, since the war started, tourism is at an all time low. This has had a domino effect on hotels, shops, tour guides, etc., resulting in a massive loss of jobs for those families who depend for their daily sustenance on those employers. Tzfat has also been hit with exceptionally bad weather: in just one week, as a result of the heavy rain and snow the Sea of Galilee rose more than two feet in just one day. This is a blessing, of course, but it is virtually impossible to work in such weather - for those who are lucky enough still to have jobs.

THEY NEED OUR IMMEDIATE HELP!

The organizers of the Passover Food Drive in Tzfat, who have been involved for many years in providing Passover food for needy families, will distribute the food packages. People have to register to get such help, and so far over 300 families (comprising about 3,000 individuals) have asked for help!

Each package of food that is given to a needy family (according to size) costs between 800 - 1000 NIS (about Can. $300) - not much in the scheme of things when you are employed. But when the family has no income ... And when, because of the terribly inclement weather, many families will be paying at least that amount simply to heat their homes - a priority - There Will Be No Money Left to Buy Food for Passover.

So whatever you can do to help us help them will be a blessing. Listed below is the cost of cases of Food.

Canadian Dollars Per Case: $185 Matzah $95 Oil $75 Tuna $55 Eggs $38 Matzah Flour $28 Canned Fruit $20 Tomato Sauce

You can specify which item (or family package) your contribution should pay for, or you can leave the choice to the Israeli organizers to allocate funds to buy the most needed items.

Please send your tax deductible donations made payable to J. Brass of Canada and mail to:
Toronto Zionist Council, 788 Marlee Ave., Toronto, ON M6B 3K1, Attention: Tzfat Passover Food Drive

For information call 416-781-3571 or 416-256-2858, ext. 24 or e-mail: nomi@torzc.org

שיחה עם גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה?

המלחמה בעיראק תימשך קרוב לודאי הרבה יותר זמן מאשר האמריקאים תכננו. די מדהים לקרוא שחם נאלצים לעצור את קצב הלחימה בשל מחסור חמור באספקה- דלק, מזון, חלקי חילוף. מה הם בדיוק חשבו כשהם נכנסו לשם- שכל חיילי סאדם יזרקו את נשקם וידעיפו עליהם פרחיזמ הרי מדובר במשטר עקוב מדם, שכל מה שבראש שלו זה אמצעי לחימה. גם הכניסה של כוחות יבשה לפני ריכוך מאסיבי עם חיל אויר וטילים נראית לי אישית מאוד תמוהה.

יש דבר אחד שנדמה שכולם מסכימים עליו: המשך בלתי פתור של הקונפליקט יגרום לנסיגה משמעותית במצבה הכלכלי ובאיכות החיים של ישראל, ושיכויזיה לחיזוק מדינה מודרנית ואטראקטיבית ליהודי העולם ולתיירי תלויה בפתרון הסכסוך. אבל שיאאר ביניהם.

המקום שבו אנו צודקים

בימים קשים אלה, תודה לאפרת שהזכירה לי את שירו הנפלא של יהודה עמיחי, שיר שנכתב בשנות החמישים, אבל הופך ליותר ויותר רלבנטי עם השנים:

מָקוֹם שבו אנו צודקים
לא יצמחו לעולם
פרחים באביב.

המקום שבו אנו צודקים
הוא רמוס וקשה
כמו חצר.

אבל ספקות ואהבות עושים
את העולם לתחוח,
כמו חפרפרת, כמו חריש,
ולחישה ונישמע במקום
שבו היה חבית אשר נחרב.

למה שתק התוכי

אשה מגיעה לגיל שמונים, ושלושת בניה שהצליחו יפה בחייהם מקיימים שיחת טלפון אין להפתיע את אמא.

אומר הבכור: כל חייה רצתה אמא בבית גדול- אני הולך לקנות לה וילה חלומית.

אומר השני: כל חייה חלמה אמא על קאדילק מרהיח וזה מה שאקנה לה.

לעומת זאת, לבנה הצעיר היא כתבה: "מושלה' שלי, אתה היחיד שיודע מה אמא אהבה...העוף ששלחת לי היה כל כך טעים!"...

מטלפן מושלה' בהיסטריה לאמא ואמר לה" מה עשיח אמא, זה היה תוכי שידע לדקלם את כל התנ"ך!"

היחה שתיקה על קו הטלפון, ואז ענתה לו אמא: "נו, אז למה הוא שתק?..."

New CSU executive considered less radical

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University Hillel officials hailed the election of a moderate group to the executive of the Concordia Student Union (CSU), ousting the radicals and pro-Palestinian activists who have dominated the student government for the past three years.

"I'm ecstatic," said Noah Sarna, co-president of Concordia Hillel. "This is a tremendous victory for not just Jewish students, but all students."

The slate Evolution, Not Revolution, headed by Natalie Pomerleau, won a landslide victory over its closest rival Clean Slate, which was closely associated with the current CSU executive, by a margin of 1,163 votes.

"I think there will be a more relaxed atmosphere on campus next year, and more easing in communication between Hillel and the Palestinian supporters because the new CSU will act as honest brokers, and not further divide students," Sarna said.

Pomerleau, a third-year computer science student, promised the CSU would not take sides in external political issues. Hillel, which is suing the CSU, claims that the current regime has actively favoured the Palestinian cause and is withholding funding from Hillel because of its pro-Israel activism.

One of Evolution's five vice-presidents, John Michael Toews, organized a petition this semester calling on the CSU to stay out of the Israeli-Palestinian debate. Another vice-president, Brent Farrington, is a member of the USA Student Association, which, like Hillel, challenged the CSU's demand that all student clubs sign a "statement of principles" or have their funding withheld.

In addition, supporters of Evolution won slightly more than half of the 30 seats on the Council of Representatives, the CSU's legislative arm.

The new government takes office at midnight May 31.

A total of 3,875 votes were cast for the five slates in the running over the three-day election at the end of March, or about 16 per cent of the approximately 24,000 undergraduates eligible to cast ballots. That's an improvement over turnouts that have been around 10 per cent in the past few years.

Widespread apathy had been blamed for the rise of the radicals within the CSU.

Evolution's slogan was "Students first, activism second," and Pomerleau said slate members consider themselves moderates. During the campaign, Pomerleau complained that some of the slate's posters had been torn down or defaced because Evolution had been perceived by some as being too right-wing.

Among her goals, she said, is to restore students' confidence in the CSU, repair relations with the administration, and improve Concordia's reputation externally. Pomerleau believes the role of the CSU to leave its affiliated student clubs to represent positions on international matters and political questions.

Although Hillel was officially neutral in the elections, Sarna acknowledged, what was observed in the student newspapers, that its membership voted overwhelmingly for Evolution.

Hillel activist Naomi Sarna was elected to the CSU Council, and the other Hillel co-president, Noah Joseph, was elected as one of two student representatives on the board of governors.

Seifert was polite to Jews: former SS colleague

VANCOUVER — A former Nazi prison guard last week identified Michael Seifert as a fellow guard serving with him at the Bolzano prison camp in wartime Italy.

Peter Makelke, who lives across the lane from Seifert in east Vancouver, described his neighbour and former SS colleague as a kind and gentle man who never hurt anyone at the prison camp.

But in later testimony, Makelke recalled that in late 1944, Seifert and another guard were accused of raping an Italian woman after a bout of drinking, the Vancouver Sun reported.

As punishment, Seifert was placed in an isolation cell in the Bolzano prison camp, though his cell wasn't locked, he retained a handgun and was able to obtain home-made whiskey, Makelke said.

Makelke was testifying at an extradition hearing to determine whether Seifert will be removed to Italy. Three years ago, an Italian military court convicted Seifert in absentia of killing 11 prisoners at the camp in 1945 and sentenced him to life in prison. Italy is asking Canada to extradite Seifert, a former sawmill worker, so he can serve his sentence.

Testimony at his Italian trial showed Seifert starved a 15-year-old prisoner to death, savagely beat another teenager with a stick, hanged a prisoner on a fence until he died, gouged out a person's eyes, beat prisoners before shooting them and tortured a woman before killing her and her daughter.

Seifert is being represented by Doug Christie, who has acted for Holocaust-deniers Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra, as well as Imre Finta, who was tried and acquitted of war crimes charges. Makelke testified he and Seifert were ethnic Germans who lived in the Ukraine – then part of the Soviet Union – when German forces occupied the area. They both ended up as guards at Bolzano in northern Italy. Makelke identified three old military photographs of Seifert, including one showing him wearing an SS uniform.

Makelke, who was a sergeant in charge of the prison camp guards before the war ended, testified initially he and Seifert were security service police who worked under the SS.

But, under cross-examination by Christie, Makelke admitted he was an SS officer and concealed that fact from Canadian immigration authorities when he came to Canada in the 1950s.

Testimony also indicated Makelke first told the RCMP on Feb. 27 that he had known Seifert only since 1962, but a day later told police he met Seifert during the war, the Sun reported.

Earlier in the week, B.C. Supreme Court Justice Selwyn Romilly ruled that Seifert, 79, failed to prove he is mentally unfit to face an extradition hearing.

Vickar was prominent Western Canadian philanthropist

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ed Vickar, who died Feb. 21 at age 87 after a lengthy illness, will be remembered as a philanthropist writ large, a big man with a booming voice and an outgoing personality that filled a room. He was an entrepreneur who loved people and happily shared his wealth with others.

The Winnipeg-born Vickar was the eldest of five sons of Gella and Sam Vickar, pioneer farmers in the Jewish farm colony of Edenbridge in northern Saskatchewan.

His first venture was the purchase of a general store in Fairy Glen, Sask. He and his wife, Marian Hoffer, who he married in 1940, and their daughter, Elaine, who was born in 1942, lived in the back of the store. In 1946, he moved his young family to Melfort, Sask., and became a farm equipment dealer. His son, Garry, was born that year as well.

Shortly thereafter, the Ford Motor Company asked him to become a dealer. After a short time with Ford, he switched to General Motors and began his 47-year relationship with the world's largest car manufacturer. During his years in Melfort, Vickar took an active role in civic affairs and the Jewish community.

In 1963, Vickar, his wife, Marion, and their son, Garry, moved to Winnipeg to reunite with their daughter Elaine Sharfe, who had married and moved here earlier.

In Winnipeg, it didn't take long for Vickar to show his leadership qualities in both the Jewish and general communities. The Vickars joined Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, the city's largest congregation. Vickar attended services regularly, was a board member and the first member to establish a trust fund at the synagogue.

In the 1960s, Vickar chaired the Winnipeg Histadrut and Israel Bonds campaigns. In the 1970s, he chaired the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign and the midwest region of the Federated Zionist Organization. In the 1980s, he was a member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's multiple appeals commission and was a member of the regional board of the Jewish National Fund. In 1997, he endowed the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada at the new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Vickar's association with Ben-Gurion University in the Negev began in the early 1980s, when he co-founded and later chaired the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Associates for Ben-Gurion University. He endowed a library in the university's school of social work, financed the Hoffer-Vickar Chair of Orthomolecular Studies and built a visitor's centre at the university's campus at Sde Boker. In 1998, the university granted him an honorary doctorate.

Vickar was a man who "had a smile for everyone," recalls daughter Elaine.

"He could walk into a room full of strangers and leave calling them all friends. He treated everyone the same no matter their race, religion or status, be they business associates, the store clerk, the hotel bellman or former prime minister John Diefenbaker, with whom he was on a first name basis. He took great pride in the achievements of his children, and reveled in the company of his grandchildren and great-grandchildren."

Although he was confined to a wheelchair for the last few years of his life, Sharfe says her father still found joy in every moment and thrilled to the company of family and friends – even when he couldn't open his eyes to welcome them.

Vickar was predeceased by his wife Marion in 2000, after 59 years of marriage. He is survived by Elaine and Sherwood Sharfe of Saskatoon and Garry and and Bonnie Vickar of St. Louis, as well as by seven grandchildren, 11 great-grandchildren, and his brothers Norman, Harry and Joe.

Jewish experiences highlighted in anti-racism event

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Three members of the Halifax Jewish community played prominent roles in a one-day conference held here last month to mark the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

As more than 250 people sat in awe at the Pier 21 immigration heritage museum in Halifax, Holocaust survivor Marianne Ferguson described life in her native Poland, as well as changes she experienced when she arrived in Canada and incidents of racism toward Jews in her adopted country.

At the conclusion of her presentation, one of six talks on a panel titled Racism: Past, Present and Future, the audience rose as one to applaud her appeal for peace.

"The Bible teaches us to love our neighbour as ourselves," she concluded. "Let us take pride in our friendship with our fellow men and women, no matter what their colour, race or ethnic background. Only if we do this, will we also be able to get along with other nations and eventually have peace on earth."

Hanna Zatzman, 15, a grade 9 student at Halifax Grammar School, represented Jewish youth. "I consider myself lucky to be born in North America, 43 years after the Holocaust, when anti-Semitism is at a low ebb. But I have faced many racist stereotypes and incorrect views, which need to be broken," she said.

She said stereotypes are caused by ignorance, such as calling a Jewish place of worship a Jewish church.

She said many people expect every Jew to be a wealthy professional. "This is not true, and that stereotype can cause a general dislike towards the Jewish community. Society also tends to define a Jew by her or his appearance, and assumes that a person is Jewish if she/he has a large nose and dark curly hair."

She said her life has been barely touched by blatant and intended racism, yet she said she is aware of the desecration of synagogues in Canada and Europe and the bullying of Jewish children at schools.

"Even here in Halifax during the Jewish [High Holy Days], synagogues hire police to guard them. And we have security guards at Jewish summer camps for fear of violence," she said.

Later, she expressed pride at representing the youth of the Jewish community. "I didn't know so many people in Halifax were this active in this type of event, and so interested in expressing their opinions."

Dead Sea Scrolls to be exhibited in Montreal

"The wonderful thing about the scrolls is that the Hebrew they are written in can be read by anyone with a knowledge of the language," said Snyder.

Although the scrolls are the exhibit's main piece, Snyder said many of the other items are unique and some have never travelled abroad before.

"They are literally invaluable," he said. "Some of them are the only material proof of the existence of key historical figures and emblematic sites mentioned in the Bible."

Although a dollar value is placed on the collection for insurance purposes, Snyder said he could not disclose what it is.

One of the oldest pieces is a stele, or monument, from the King David time period.

Among the most interesting items are a carved ivory pomegranate believed to be the only relic from Solomon's Temple that dates to the mid-eighth century BCE; the ossuary of Caiaphas Josephus, who turned Jesus over to Pontius Pilate; and the only known burial epitaph of a Judean king, Uzziah.

Other notable pieces are a silver amulet from Jerusalem from the days of Jeremiah and the ossuary of "Simon the Temple Builder," a workman who apparently participated in the construction of Herod's temple.

"The objects connect ancient Israel to the Bible and to the physical landscape of contemporary Israel," he said. "They feature numerous biblical inscriptions, scrupulously documented to their source of excavation and illuminate the period of the gradual formation of Jewish traditions as we know them today and the beginning of Christianity."

Snyder said he thinks specimens bearing representations of a flower similar to the fleur-de-lys will be of particular interest to Quebecers. The emblem, which decorated Solomon's Temple, was adopted by the Crusaders in the Middle Ages and became the symbol of the French monarchy. Among the objects on view will be a limestone window balustrade from about 800 BCE.

From King David to the Dead Sea Scrolls will also include rare and ancient Bibles, Talmuds and prayer books from the Jacob M. Lowy collection of the National Library of Canada.

This is the most ambitious collaboration the Jerusalem-based Israel Museum has undertaken with a Canadian museum and a coup for Pointe-à-Callière, a relatively small museum specializing in archeology and history.

But it is not the first time this museum, housed on a historic site in Old Montreal, has run a biblical-themed show. A few years ago, with the co-operation of the Israeli consulate, it held an exhibit on crucifixion.

Snyder said he hopes this exposure will revive the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum, its fundraising arm, and said he believes the exhibit will be good public relations for Israel. "The artifacts demonstrate the Jewish patrimonial heritage in the land of Israel. They show that Jews have roots in Israel going back thousands of years."

Poll explores issue of anti-Semitism

The poll also asked respondents about other minority groups, such as natives, immigrants, Arabs, gays and blacks, about sentiment toward them and the images they project. Jews fared better on these questions than all other groups.

For example, 67 per cent of Canadians think anti-Arab sentiment is a "somewhat" or "very" serious problem in Canada, while 29 per cent believe Arabs project a negative image. Only 16 per cent think Arabs project a "very positive" image.

Seventy per cent of those polled also feel there is serious anti-immigrant feeling in Canada.

Jedwab said the poll was taken in connection with the International Day for the Prevention of Racial Discrimination on March 21.

But it took on added resonance in light of recent events in the Middle East, especially the buildup to war in Iraq.

"Over the past few weeks… there [have been] concerns that levels of intolerance may rise," he said.

Jedwab said results of the poll indicate Jews are "well-respected within Canadian society."

He said the poll deliberately shied away from questions such as, "Do you believe Jews are smart, rich, powerful, etc…," because such questions, in his view, tend to be leading and produce results that are misleading or skewed.

In terms of the breakdown of the results by region, 59 per cent of Quebecers and Ontarians – the highest percentage in Canada – feel anti-Semitism is a serious problem in this country, while 15 and 10 per cent, respectively, believe Jews project a negative image.

By contrast, only 44 per cent of Western Canadians – the lowest in the poll – think anti-Semitism is a serious problem in Canada, while 10 per cent think Jews project a negative image.

Canadians aged 18 to 29, at 61 per cent, show the most concern about anti-Semitism being a serious problem.

Sharon promises the cabinet a debate on road map plan

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon Sunday said the cabinet would soon hold a comprehensive discussion on Israel's preparations for the road map plan.

Sharon was responding to calls by several ministers who said that in view of the issue's importance, it was imperative to bring the road map before the cabinet and not just before the security-political cabinet.

During Sunday's cabinet session, Sharon said he was hesitant to raise the issue before the government because of the possibility of leaks. "It is not the kind of issue one could bring before the government or the cabinet at such an early stage because as soon as things are discussed in the government or the cabinet, they are leaked," he said.

Sharon said that in all talks with the American administration, Israel had clarified that it would not agree to make compromises on issues related to the security of its citizens, adding that despite the special relations between Israel and the American administration and the strategic co-ordination between the two nations, they do not see eye to eye on everything.

Minister Without Portfolio Uzi Landau slammed the road map, saying it was a prize for Palestinian terrorism. He said it was not enough for Israel to merely declare reservations to the road map, but that it should ensure major changes to the plan and include a demand for the Palestinians to cease incitement in their education system.

Absorption Minister Tzipi Livni said Israel must clarify unequivocally to the administration that with the foundation of a Palestinian state, the issue of the right of return for Palestinian refugees will no longer be on the agenda.

She said unlike the Clinton framework, which says the foundation of a Palestinian state will solve the refugee issue, the road map makes a distinction between the foundation of a Palestinian state and the refugees.

Belgium amends war crime legislation

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The Belgian senate has approved changes to the Universal Jurisdiction Law that allowed Belgian courts to hear war crimes cases against foreign leaders, notably Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and former U.S. president George Bush Sr.

The senate's approval of an amendment to the 1993 law was designed to invalidate high-profile war crimes cases that have come to embarrass Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt's government.

The senate backed a change to the "genocide law," enabling Belgium to refer foreigners facing war crimes charges to their own governments if they are democracies with a record of fairness in justice.

The change was approved by Belgium's House of Representatives last Wednesday. It will be effective retroactively on cases against many leaders, as well as IDF officers, for their involvement in killings at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in 1982.

Aside from Sharon and Bush, suits are pending against U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, Iraq's Saddam Hussein and Cuban President Fidel Castro.

Palestinians name square for killer of four U.S. soldiers

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Authority officials have named the centre of the Jenin Refugee Camp after Ali Alna'amani, an Iraqi suicide bomber who killed four American soldiers the last Saturday in March. The following is the announcement in the PA newspaper Al Quds April 2: "The officials, the institutions and the National Islamic Forces in the Jenin Refugee Camp... decided to continue the blood donor campaign for Iraq and decided to name the centre of the refugee camp "Ali al-Na'amani" after the shahid [died for Allah] who was the first suicide bomber in Iraq..." Israel furious at British official for comparing it to Iraq

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Israel is furious that England's top diplomat is comparing it to Iraq.

In a radio interview two weeks ago with the BBC World Service, Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said the West had been guilty of "double standards" by pressing Iraq harder than Israel to obey the United Nations.

"There is real concern that the West has been guilty of double standards, on the one hand saying the United Nations Security Council Resolutions on Iraq must be implemented; on the other hand, sometimes appearing rather quixotic over the implementation of resolutions about Israel and Palestine," Straw said.

Israel immediately protested to Britain's ambassador to the Jewish state, calling Straw's comments "worrisome and outrageous."

"They do not contribute to the peace process, and might even hinder progress toward achieving a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict," the director general of Israel's Foreign Ministry told Ambassador Sherard Cowper-Coles.

Israel rejected the "baseless attempt to create a linkage between the [Israeli-Palestinian conflict] and the international campaign against the Iraqi regime and its attempts to arm itself with weapons of mass destruction."

A top adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon rejected Straw's comments in the influential British daily the Financial Times.

"Mr. Straw appears to believe that comparing one of the world's worst aggressors to Israel is appropriate," Dore Gold wrote April 1.

"Such expressions," Gold wrote, "hardly strike anyone acquainted with recent Middle East history as conveying any sense of justice."

He pointed out that UN resolutions regarding the Arab-Israeli conflict put obligations on both sides, while resolutions on Iraq require action only of Saddam Hussein – an argument Straw himself made recently in Britain's Parliament.

Israel argues that the Arab parties have not met their obligations under the UN resolutions, while Israel alone is criticized for not complying.

An Israeli embassy spokesperson said Britain has not apologized for Straw's statement.

Britain has taken the lead recently in trying to restart the Middle East peace process, often angering Israel along the way.

Observers say British Prime Minister Tony Blair needs to placate British public opinion, which tends to be more sympathetic to the Palestinians than is public opinion in the United States.

In January and February, London hosted two conferences aimed at reforming Palestinian Authority institutions.

Israel was not invited to the first one, and Palestinian delegates were barred from attending after a double suicide bombing in Tel Aviv killed 23 Israelis and foreign workers days before the event.

In the BBC interview, Straw called the travel ban on the Palestinians "quite unreasonable," arguing that Palestinian reform was an essential step in the peace process.

"We are 100 per cent committed to the establishment of a viable Palestinian state. To have a viable Palestinian state you've got to have viable institutions inside Palestine," Straw said.

He also condemned Palestinian terrorism against Israel.

"I feel upset and angry about the plight of the Palestinians, but I also am angry and upset about the terror under which the Israelis have had to live and the way in which a combination of injustice to Palestinians and terror against Israelis have made it so difficult for those two fine people to live in peace," he said.

March 31

• Three Israeli Arabs were arrested on suspicion of operating a bomb-making factory for Islamic Jihad. The factory, in Jaljulia, is the first of its kind to be discovered inside Israel.

• National Infrastructure Minister Yosef Paritzky considered reactivating a pipeline that runs from Haifa to Mosul in northern Iraq in the event a friendly post-war regime emerges in Iraq.

April 1

• In its annual human rights report, the U.S. State Department alleged that Israel committed "numerous, serious human rights abuses" in the West Bank and Gaza. The report also criticized the Palestinians for not complying "with most of their commitments, notably those relating to the renunciation of violence and terrorism."

April 2

• Senior Israeli and Palestinian security officials reportedly held their first talks in months. Israeli media reported that the head of the Israeli army's southern command and the head of Palestinian security in the Gaza Strip had recently met as part of efforts to ease violence in Gaza.

April 3

• Former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres was called a murderer by Muslim and pro-Palestinian students while giving a speech at a National Union of Students conference in Blackpool, England. Despite the heckling, he appeared unfazed.

April 4

• The Israeli army began moving out of Tulkarm and allowed residents to return to their homes, following the capture and arrest of Tanzim and Islamic Jihad heads in the West Bank refugee camp. The army also imposed a curfew on Jenin and began conducting searches there.

High Court denies women's group right to conduct prayers at Western Wall plaza

By MOSHE REINFELD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A nine-member panel of Supreme Court justices ruled Sunday that the group known as Women of the Wall may not conduct prayers in the Western Wall plaza, but the Court also instructed the government to prepare the adjacent Robinson's Arch area for their use within a year.

In a 5-4 vote, the Court prohibited the women from conducting their service, in which they wear prayer shawls and tfillin and read from the Torah, because, the panel said, their presence would offend other worshippers and cause a public disturbance. The group has been trying to hold organized prayer services at the Wall for 14 years and say such practices are becoming increasingly accepted among the Orthodox. Their previous attempts, however, have provoked anger and violence in the haredi community.

Sunday's ruling overturns a decision by a three-justice panel in May 2000, which granted the women permission to pray in the plaza. The Court was ruling on an appeal filed by the state to the earlier decision.

The Court also ruled that if preparations at Robinson's Arch, an archeological site at the southern end of the Western Wall are not completed within a year, the group must be allowed to pray at the Wall.

Justice Mishael Cheshin, summing up the majority opinion, noted that while Robinson's Arch is an integral part of the outer wall of the Temple, it does not have the same significance as the Western Wall itself. Nonetheless, Cheshin argued, if the government were to provide an organized prayer area at Robinson's Arch, it could be seen as an extension of the Western Wall plaza itself.

He added, however, that in its present state, the Robinson's Arch site is not suitable for such prayers. The site is currently used primarily for archeological exhibitions.

"The Western Wall plaza is a wide space," wrote Cheshin, "and with a little bit of good will, the government could provide the Women of the Wall with a place to pray according to their custom."

Justice Eliyahu Mazza, who supported the minority view, said the decision to allow the group to pray at the Robinson's Arch site denies their right to pray at the Western Wall itself – a right already recognized by the Supreme Court.

Women of the Wall has consistently rejected proposals for alternate sites. Sunday's ruling was "very disappointing," said the group's chair, Batya Cohen-Kallus.

"Robinson's Arch is nothing more than an archeological site," and does not have the sanctity or holiness of the Western Wall, she said.

The Court's decision to prepare the Robinson's Arch area for the Women of the Wall was also criticized by archeologists. Ayalet Mazar, who heads the Antiquities Authority's campaign to publicize its work on the Temple Mount, said access to the 70-metre stretch of the Western Wall involves clambering over the ruins of what was Jerusalem's main shopping thoroughfare during the reign of Herod, nearly 2,000 years ago. In order to ensure safe access for the worshippers, the Antiquities Authority will apparently be asked to remove these relics.

Canadian Hezbollah agent linked to anti-Sharon plot

JERUSALEM — A Canadian arrested in Hebron is a key man in a Hezbollah plot to kill Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israeli security sources told the National Post recently.

In a weekend news item, the Post reported that Fauzi Mohammed Mustafa Ayub, 38, was arrested last June in a Palestinian police office during a sweep by Israeli soldiers. He had been placed in custody by Palestinian security services after attempting to obtain the components for a bomb.

Quoting unnamed Israeli security sources, the Post reported that Ayub was a senior Hezbollah operative who worked with the group's elite unit headed by Imad Mugniyah, one of the world's most wanted terrorists.

The Post also quoted an unnamed Israeli official saying "Canada has an enormous infrastructure of Hezbollah inside the country."

In the past, security sources have asserted that Canada is an important base for Hezbollah, serving as a source of money and important military equipment including night-vision goggles.

Under enormous political pressure, the federal government outlawed Hezbollah in December after resisting doing so for months. Government officials had argued that Hezbollah includes a charitable wing that provides important social services.

Ayub, a native of Lebanon who obtained Canadian citizenship after moving here in 1988, was able to travel freely with his Canadian passport. He was trained in Beirut in the use of explosives and arrived in Israel in October 2000, shortly after the outbreak of the intifadah, the Post reported.

He rented a room at a hotel in Jerusalem and Israeli sources say he began spending a lot of time in an area where many government buildings are located.

Following the arrest of another Hezbollah agent, Ayub left Jerusalem for Hebron, where he made contact with a third Hezbollah operative and began making plans to assemble a fragmentation bomb. His activities attracted the attention of Palestinian police, who brought him in for questioning. He was captured at the police station by Israeli forces during a raid in June 2002.

Israeli security officials say Ayub was probably collecting intelligence about potential targets, building a terrorist infrastructure within Israel and the Palestinian territories and planning the assassination plot.

The unnamed Israeli official told the Post that Canada's outlawing of Hezbollah put the terrorist group under increased pressure. Ayub is being held in custody under Israel's Imprisonment of Enemy Combatants Law.

AN OPEN LETTER TO U.S. PRESIDENT GEORGE BUSH FROM CONCERNED CANADIANS.

At the National Citizens Coalition we believe Canada must stand by our friends in times of need. That's why we sent this letter to President George Bush. But more needs to be done.

Here's what you can do:

1. Contact President George Bush and let him know that Prime Minister Jean Chrétien doesn't speak for all Canadians when it comes to Iraq. Here's his e-mail address: president@whitehouse.gov

2. Contact Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. Urge him to change his policy. Urge him to stand up for our allies and friends. It's not too late. Here's his e-mail address: pm@pm.gc.ca

3. Fill in the coupon below or go to our web site to help us spread the message. We need your help to do it.

Now is the time to take a stand!

March 26, 2003

Dear Mr. President:

Yesterday, in an extraordinary speech, Paul Cellucci, your ambassador to Canada, expressed sadness and disappointment that our government has failed to back up your efforts to rid the world of Saddam Hussein and his weapons of mass destruction.

Canada, said Mr. Cellucci, "Is not there for us."

We want to let you know, Mr. President, that many Canadians, including the 40,000 supporters of our organization, share your ambassador's sense of sadness. We believe Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is not only turning his back on our allies, he's also turning his back on Canada's proud tradition of standing up for freedom and democracy.

Canadians fought beside Americans in World War II and in Korea. We stood with you during the long years of the Cold War. We battled shoulder-to-shoulder in the first Gulf War and in Afghanistan. We are continuing to fight with you in the ongoing war against international terrorism.

In other words, it has never been Canada's way to sit on the sidelines and watch while others fight for what's right. And that's why many Canadians are embarrassed and ashamed that our government has opted not to join the "Coalition of the Willing."

Our hearts go out to the brave Coalition soldiers who are fighting to make the world a freer and safer place. Canada and the world owe them a great debt.

Yours truly,

Birthright saved from budget ax

By STEWART AIN
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — The popular Birthright Israel program, which has brought 40,000 university-age students to Israel in the last three years, narrowly averted a funding crisis last week.

The Israeli cabinet restored much of the $14 million (US) the finance ministry had proposed cutting as part of the government's emergency budget plan.

Had all the money been cut, it may have forced the end of the project.

"It's encouraging to see that the Israeli leadership recognizes the importance of its role in the Birthright Israel program for world Jewry," said Marlene Post, chairman of the organization.

She credited Natan Sharansky, the Israeli minister who overseas Diaspora affairs, with working with the office of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to restore the money.

The original cuts had been part of an emergency economic plan that calls for slashing in midyear $2.3 billion (US) from the budget to pull the country out of its deepest recession in more than 50 years. Israel is currently running a $6-billion deficit.

The economic plan, motivated in part by U.S. pressure in return for military aid and loan guarantees, calls for slashing expenses and welfare benefits, firing state employees and other cuts that are so deep they sparked a strike by Israel's major labor federation, the Histadrut.

Sharansky said that in arguing for the restoration of the Birthright cuts, he had to contend with the finance ministry, which argued it was "cutting money from defence and children and that not to cut the budget of a group that was bringing American Jews here was not fair. I said this was the only Zionist" enterprise "we have and that we have to do everything to support it," he said.

Before the cabinet vote last week, the Birthright's executive director, Shimshon Shoshani, was said to be willing to accept the same 10 per cent cut proposed for all government ministries in 2003.

The finance ministry had proposed cutting Birthright Israel's budget by more than 25 per cent this year and then eliminating it entirely next year.

Instead, Sharansky said he convinced cabinet to cut about $2 million (US) this year and $4 million next year from the $14 million the government had pledged to provide each year for five years.

The government of Israel is one of three equal partners in Birthright Israel. The others are the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization for 189 North American Jewish federations, and a group of 13 individual philanthropists, plus Hadassah, each of which pledged to contribute $5 million (US) over five years.

The project's founders are philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt.

Through a spokesperson, Bronfman said he hoped to see the cuts restored by the Knesset and had "great confidence that we will prevail."

Steinhardt said that although the cuts were "certainly far less Draconian" than had been proposed, he was also hopeful the money would be restored. "I think there is a recognition that Birthright is a program that, however dire the Israel budget, it is not in the interest of Israel or the Diaspora to eliminate," he said.

Post said that for every $1 (US) Israel invests in Birthright, it gets $2 in return. In its first three years, all three partners contributed $42 million and the project has brought $67 million to the country. "Israel gets double its money back, so it's not losing money" on this program.

Post said Birthright provided the "largest source of Jewish tourism to Israel" during 30 months of Palestinian violence. "The tourism industry is decimated and will not turn around overnight, and it was Birthright that maintained what was going on in Israel in terms of tourism."

Sharansky said the reduction that was made is still "a very serious cut. But… the proposed cut would have been enough to close down the project."

Palestinians gain from anti-war activism

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Since military action began in Iraq, American college campuses have erupted in protests against the war – many of them including pro-Palestinian, anti-Israel rhetoric.

"I personally think that [the Iraq war and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict] are really related," said Shaun Joseph, 22, who heads Students Against War on Iraq at Brown University in Massachusetts.

Joseph, a non-Jew who describes himself as a socialist, characterizes the two conflicts as acts of "U.S. imperialism – both in the U.S. support of Israel's actions against the Palestinians and in this direct war on Iraq."

Experts say anti-war forces represent a minority on campus, but they are far more vocal than the war's supporters.

Analysts note similarities to the opposition to the Vietnam War two generations ago, when anti-war forces comprised only a fraction of the student body but gained so much attention they profoundly influenced the country.

With students transfixed by the war – MTV, which has sent a correspondent to Kuwait, says young people rank the war as their top issue of interest, alongside drugs – Jewish leaders fear anti-war protesters could introduce the Palestinian agenda to a huge audience.

"You're going to have all these young people engaged in discussion or concern about the Middle East in the context of the Iraq war who will have been exposed to potentially very hostile" messages about Israel, said Wayne Firestone, director of the Center for Israel Affairs for Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

"If the teach-ins they go to and the rhetoric they're hearing at the rallies are all anti-Israel because that's whose running the anti-war protests on campus, then there's a serious concern that they will be affected by that," he said.

According to Jonathan Kessler, leadership development director for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, "The anti-Israel activists on campus have made a strategic decision to embed themselves into the anti-war movement," so they can "engage large numbers beyond their traditional coalition of disenfranchised.

"They're willing to soft-pedal their anti-Israel animus for the time being, or at least until U.S. policymakers are no longer focused on Iraq," Kessler said.

U.S. President George W. Bush has pledged to present the international "road map" toward Israeli-Palestinian peace after the new Palestinian Authority prime minister is confirmed in coming weeks. And international pressure for a peace agreement is likely to mount once the Iraq war ends.

Helping children cope with difficult times

By JOANNE FOSTER and DONA MATTHEWS

Many young and sensitive children are forced to think about difficult matters at an early age. They may be confronted with, or preoccupied by, severe illness, death, war or even the loneliness of the human condition long before they have the cognitive abilities to put these kinds of ideas into perspective.

Children's worries and fears can become exacerbated during these difficult times when everyone is thinking and talking about the war in Iraq and health threats such as SARS (Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome). Their feelings can become even more troubling if they try to share their thoughts with others, only to discover that their peers are happily focused on their daily lives or that adults don't want to discuss such ideas with them. Not finding anyone who understands or who can help them achieve a deeper understanding can leave children more isolated and troubled than before. Putting their thoughts into words can also be difficult for them.

No matter what a child's temperament, abilities or concerns, parents and teachers should listen actively and sensitively and ensure that the child is in a secure and dependable environment. By recognizing children's innate developmental schedules, rather than attempting to mould their behaviour and thinking, we are much better able to help them be the best they can be. The younger and more exceptional the child, the more important responding flexibly to individual development is.

Sometimes, children's reactions to world events are intense, and they need help to make sense of what is happening. During times of adversity, when everyone's anxieties are heightened and emotional responses are unpredictable, parents and teachers can provide support and comfort to children in many ways.

Direct and open communication between home and school is important because both can influence children's perceptions. Parents and teachers are encouraged to listen to children's questions, to value their opinions, to show a genuine interest in their concerns and to be willing to respond to them. Children's cognitive levels and resources differ with age, development and personal experience, so adults need to be attuned to this, as well as to their emotional well-being.

Children who are limited in their understanding of war, politics and health epidemics can be cautioned not to try to find solutions that may be beyond their ability, but rather to consider what they can do. They may want to do something positive and helpful, and such involvement, within reason, can be encouraged. Emphasizing the joys in the world, people's resilience and the importance of tolerance and building relationships can also be beneficial. Trying to explain the difference between good and bad leadership, regimes and policies can be difficult even for adults. Children need to be assured that there is still reason and goodness in the world and that these remain the forces underlying their day-to-day existence.

At a time like this, children can be helped to develop the skills necessary to manage their emotions and to acquire greater emotional stability. They should be encouraged to play and to continue activities that provide some relaxation and a balance in their lives, and helped to understand that this does not mean they don't care about the people who are dying. They can write down their thoughts in journal form, paint what they are thinking, act it out dramatically or express it musically. What they produce can be for sharing, or not, as the child prefers. The opportunity to express their feelings in a safe and supportive environment can be calming, cathartic and help to alleviate confusion.

Discussion can also be effective but is best when children are able to concentrate on ideas. Try to have conversations at opportune times when they are not overwrought. When children are exceptionally troubled by what is happening and cannot be calmed, it can be helpful to consult a professional.

It is not good for children to see adults acting hyper-vigilant. Continued nurturing and ongoing attentiveness to daily needs and schedules are more constructive for children than a constant focus on conflict and suffering. Some strategies for adults to help children cope include:

- Acknowledge there are troubles in the world.
- Listen to the children in your life patiently and attentively. Make sure that they feel listened to.
- Encourage them to express their feelings, concerns and ideas for solutions in a variety of ways.
- Maintain and model a healthy acceptance of oneself and diverse others. Do not demonize whole nations or religions.
- Stay attuned to what is going on in the child's world.
- Be sensitive and responsive. Try to maintain your sense of humour.
- Be patient.
- Be trustworthy. Now is a time when security and predictability matter more than ever.
- Be anticipatory without hovering unnecessarily.
- Help children to realize and accept their limitations. They are only children and cannot be expected to fix major or global problems.
- Help them set productive and reasonable goals about what they can and cannot do about the circumstances.
- Respect and value their curiosity-driven learning. Show an interest in and acceptance of it.
- Convey an attitude of honesty, but keep explanations at a suitable level, commensurate with the child's cognitive ability and emotional competence.
- Encourage the building of emotional intelligence. Model good coping mechanisms yourself and send positive messages that affirm the child's sense of self.
- Network and communicate with others in the children's lives. Become knowledgeable about resources, support groups, links and other possible ways to offer comfort and support.
- Reinforce family ties and friendships. During times of trouble, social support makes all the difference.
- Be available.
- Seek out psychological guidance or counselling if necessary.

By being supportive of children and helping them better understand world events, adults can help them manage their feelings and try to come to terms with circumstances that may be beyond their experience and their years.

Clifford Odets' Berger family sings the blues

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Clifford Odets originally named his 1935 Depression-era play Awake and Sing! with an appropriate moniker: I Got The Blues.

A Jewish family in the Bronx is besieged by marital strife and minimal funds, forcing the characters to sing the blues to a backbeat of compromise.

Awake and Sing! has been revived in Toronto by The Co. at Equity Showcase Theatre, running through April 12.

Anyone who goes back to a panic-stricken 1935 New York City won't be disappointed by the superbly staged production. The nine-member cast do Odets' script justice, evoking his street-slang, his layered characters and their desire for hope, by delivering each line with passion.

Awake and Sing! opens at dinner with the Berger family, as the steely matriarch Bessie coerces her pregnant daughter Hennie into a loveless marriage with a man who isn't even the baby's father. According to Bessie, any life away from the poverty they endure is a life worth trying.

Her unvarnished view of American life differs from that of the dreamers around her. Son Ralph desires freedom and untethered access to his orphan girlfriend; Grandfather Jacob spouts Marxist ideals but sustains himself with Enrico Caruso records; Father Myron yearns to succeed, but only if his racehorse brings him happiness; and Hennie admits she could use a new dress, which later translates to a deep longing for an opulent lifestyle.

Director Dean Gabourie paints a bleak picture of the Berger family – their meagre fruit basket is limited to apples, Ralph complains of owning only one clean shirt, and tired faces streaked with despair impart a poverty that threadbare clothes could only hint at. A nice evocative touch is the 1930s living room, designed with underwear-laden clotheslines hanging overhead.

In the first scene, the father, Myron, a pathetic downtrodden man, mutters a line that echoes through the play: "The whole world is changing before our eyes."

He says it again later, when an unexpected death rattles the family, fracturing already tense relationships. Myron's sentiment touches each character, since their individual worlds are transformed under the auspices of renewed hope.

Essentially, Awake and Sing! became a source of healing for Depression audiences when Odets first staged it with The Group Theatre. While each character desires something different, the intent is the same: to pull the family out of poverty and better their own lives.

Adrian Griffin and Heidi Weeks Brown; two of the principles in Awake and Sing!

Odets was known as a playwright for the people, a writer who supported unions and hard-luck labourers. His dialogue became respected and was often imitated in subsequent decades.

As befits a dialogue-reliant script, the cast uses small actions to accompany Odets' lines – a fatigued hand complements a sleepy confession, a fist becomes more tightly clenched during a moment of jealousy.

Danielle Bourgon as Bessie is particularly adept at deepening her character's pain. Bessie is complex in her varied shades: cynical, humorous, anxious, frustrated, determined. The strong character is given her due by Bourgon's fiery delivery, softening at the right moments, hardening in the next second.

Don Allison as the Yiddish grandfather, Jacob, also shows his emotional range, summoning an obscure scene-stealing anxiety difficult to express on the stage: the pain of being ignored.

And Ralph, played convincingly by Aaron Willis, explains his 17-year-old optimism in a line that sums up his motivation: "I want to take the Earth in two hands and polish off the dirt."

Love grows in the poverty-stricken home, although the central affair barely sizzles. Adrian Griffin as the smarmy bachelor Moe Axelrod reveals his obsessive intentions towards Hennie with pizzazz. But Heidi Weeks Brown plays Hennie so distantly and superficially you wonder where Griffin sought inspiration to turn from huckster to poet and confess: "You're home for me, a place to live!"

As a result of Odets' crackling dialogue, the characters have a difficult time delivering some lines clearly, stumbling over some of the expressions. The New York accents are merely passable but still lend some authenticity to an identifiably American play.

Awake and Sing! imparts the U.S. fantasy of succeeding above your position despite overwhelming forces from like poverty, class and pressure. For the Bergers, add the obstacle of being an ethnic minority, and the struggle to climb tugs the heartstrings harder.

Odets once wrote, "When I write, what comes out is something that is very natural and very easy for actors to speak because it has always been spoken." And like his plays' lines, his themes emerge as timeless testaments to the working-class dreamer who wishes for a cloudless sky.

NEW GUIDE FOR THE PERPLEXED HELPS STUDENTS DEFEND ISRAEL

Mitchell G. Bard, author of the widely-used book Myths and Facts, has produced another title that should prove useful. The book is pocket-sized and only 75 pages long, but it has a double-barrelled name – On One Foot: A Middle East Guide for the Perplexed, or How to Respond on Your Way to Class, When Your Best Friend Joins an Anti-Israel Protest.

On One Foot provides short responses to more than 50 tough issues that students face, along with a brief paragraph on the history of each. Topics include the roots of conflict, peace, disputed territories and settlements, human rights, refugees, Jerusalem, violence and the United Nations. To order, call 1-310-364-0909 or e-mail info@ononefootbook. com.

Bard edits the Jewish Virtual Library, which bills itself as "the world's most comprehensive online encyclopedia of Jewish history and culture." Its Web site is www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org.

TRAVEL NOTES FROM ALL OVER

Yes, despite everything, there are still lots of people traveling all over the world in these perilous times. For readers who are planning international journeys, some of the destinations below may prove of interest.

For those who prefer to stay relatively close to home, Travel Talk recommends Canada as a superlative travel destination. After all, as the song puts it, "You can see castles in Spain / thru your window pane / right in your own backyard."

Either way, a safe and happy Passover to all.

The Pianist, Nowhere In Africa, do well in Academy Awards

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The Academy Awards this year had a distinct Jewish connection.

The remarkable Holocaust film, The Pianist, surprised many observers by taking three major awards for direction (Roman Polanski), best actor (Adrien Brody), and for adapted screenplay.

Also, the German film, Nowhere In Africa won for best foreign film and two documentaries were nominated, Prisoner of Paradise and The Collector of Bedford Street, although neither won.

The Pianist was obviously a leading candidate in a number of categories, but many people felt that Roman Polanski's past legal problems would result in the film being passed over by Academy members. To the credit of the voters, this did not turn out to be the case and they bestowed three awards on the film .

As most people know, The Pianist is the true story of survival by Wladyslaw Szpilman, a piano virtuoso who lived through the Nazi occupation of Warsaw. Hopefully, these awards will encourage more people to see this remarkable film before it is released on video later this year.

Nowhere In Africa is an excellent film about a Jewish family that manages to flee Germany in 1938 and finds sanctuary during World War II in Kenya. The father, who was a lawyer in Germany, manages to obtain a job managing a farm in the East African country and brings his wife and daughter to join him in the relative safety of the British colony.

The film was directed by Caroline Link, who also directed a very heart warming film called Beyond Silence that has just been released on DVD. Beyond Silence tells the story of Lara, a young non-Jewish German girl who falls in love with klezmer music.

Forced to make propaganda films for the Nazis

As far as the two documentaries are concerned, Prisoner of Paradise recently played in Toronto for about a week. It tells the story of Kurt Gerron, a Jewish actor/director who was forced to make propaganda films for the Nazis while incarcerated at the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

The Collector of Bedford Street is a wonderful short film about Murray Schaul, a Jewish man with a mental disability and his attempts to live as normal and independent a life as possible.

The film will be presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in early May and is definitely worth the effort to see.

Restoration of Cairo shul discussed

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The restoration of the historic Ben Ezra Synagogue in Cairo depended on cooperation between Jews, Christians and Muslims, says world-renowned Canadian architect Phyllis Lambert, who has spearheaded the project for more than 20 years.

An illustrated lecture by Lambert on the restoration brought out several hundred people to the National Library of Canada on March 23.

Lambert, the founder and director of the Canadian Centre for Architecture in Montreal and the initiator of the Ben Ezra Synagogue Restoration Project, shared some highlights of the enormous undertaking with her audience, which included members of the Jewish community, architects, historians, academics and local and federal politicians.

The medieval Ben Ezra Synagogue has been a place of worship for Cairo's Jews for 1,000 years. The original structure was built within the walls of a Roman fortress, and renovations have been done on the building as far back as the 15th century.

The synagogue once held the Cairo Geniza, a treasure trove of Jewish documents uncovered in the late 19th century, but had fallen into extreme disrepair prior to Lambert's initiative.

The peace agreement between Israel and Egypt signed by the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat allowed discussions to take place between Muslim authorities and the World Jewish Congress, headed by Lambert's brother Edgar Bronfman, which led to the launch of the project in 1981.

"The research was conducted both archeologically and historically" in order to preserve evidence of the very long history of the Jewish community in Cairo, Lambert said.

The project was delayed by some initial challenges, including Muslim laws regulating the construction of non-Islamic properties, as well as Jewish laws dealing with the preservation of writings. But by 1989, after overcoming the early setbacks and after the appointment of a resident project co-ordinator, the project was "back on the rails," Lambert said.

The lecture was jointly sponsored by the National Library of Canada and the Council for the Jacob M. Lowy Collection.

Day school tournament sees record number of entries

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

As a cheerleader and drill-team member who grew up in New York, Sherie Bromberg knows all about the pride and honour one feels in representing their school. It's why she went to great lengths to ensure her son's school, the Leo Baeck south campus, had a team competing at the recent Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament.

The small North York school was a first-time entry in a record field of 13 that took to the ice at Chesswood Arena for the eighth annual hockey tournament held for Toronto-area Jewish day schools.

"They weren't the best team, they weren't the worst team, but they had a lot of fun," said Bromberg, who in addition to coaching the club, worked to attract sponsors and collect donations as prizes for the raffle.

Associated Hebrew Schools Kamin branch were finalists in the Junior B (Jerusalem) Division.

Associated Hebrew Schools Posluns team got to the finals in the Junior A (Tel Aviv) division.

"I just wanted [the kids] to feel good about themselves, that they were playing hockey with their buddies, trying their best at the game that they love," she said.

Evan Bromberg, an 11-year-old AA novice goalie with the Greater Toronto Hockey League's Toronto Penguins, can thank his mother for the opportunity to compete with his school friends after last year playing on the Thornhill campus team. Leo Baeck finished third in the junior division's B group.

There were eight schools divided into two groups of four in the junior division with placement determined on the regular season standings.

Schools played an eight-game schedule over the winter months, all 7:00 a.m. starts so the children could be at school by 8:30.

The junior division, which had a skills competition during the tournament, consisted of students in Grades 3 through 5, while the five senior division squads included those up to Grade 8. The players involved represented all skill levels, from house league to AAA.

Associated Hebrew School defended its senior division championship, beating Bialik 5-3 in the final. United Synagogue Day Schools-Bathurst won the junior division's group A, defeating Associated-Posluns campus, while Leo Baeck-Thornhill captured group B, knocking off Associated-Kamin campus.

Participants received T-shirts and bobblehead trophies.

Tournament co-ordinator Moe Benaim credits Bromberg and Brian Kimmel from Heschel with making this year's event a resounding success.

"They were two new very small schools," he said. "With their hard work this year and aggressive recruiting they were able to field competitive teams. Sherie was very instrumental in organizing the tournament."

Benaim also coached the team from Associated-Kamin. His son, Jacky, a Grade 5 student, was the team's regular season scoring champion with 23 points on 12 goals and 11 assists.

USDS Bathurst captured the title in the Junior A (Tel Aviv) division.

We were all at Sinai

I turned to the diminutive man standing next to me and remembered his face from a Jewish chain gang in Goshem, Egypt. He was hunched over and his eyes had dimmed. I cried a tear for him, knowing the humiliation he suffered at the hands of the slave drivers.

A dark cloud dotted with the sun's rays hovered over Mount Sinai. A bolt of lightning crackled overhead and all Jews turned their heads to see Moses climb down the hill. A call to celebrate bellowed out. Jews who had been enslaved in Egypt stood next to the Jews of the Temple periods. Together they shared the desert floor with Jews of the prosperous and successful North American 21st century.

We were all at Sinai, and I wanted to meet every Jew.

As a journalist, I walked through the crowd, reading people's name tags. Two rows behind me, to the left, was Moses Montefiore – a man who would encourage the Jewish people to build the State of Israel.

A dignified woman stood next to him. It was Chana Senesh, a woman deemed by fate to be a Jewish heroine during a horrifying time called the Holocaust.

I saw the Chofetz Chaim arguing with Maimonides and Rashi. What a triumvirate of knowledge. What a force.

A sign reading Toronto Jews could be seen among the sea of banners pitched high above the ground. I spotted David Rosenzweig near the south foot of Sinai. He would be a pious Jew who would live a righteous, albeit a short, life. He was standing with his wife and children – smiling.

All Jews stood at the base of Mount Sinai. There was room for everyone.

Suddenly, Moses appeared. He lovingly cuddled the tablets, the way a mother would a child in the marketplace. He looked to find another Golden Calf. There was none. Aaron, Moses' brother, exhaled.

Moses announced: "There is one God. Love Him. Do not steal. Do not kill."

The reluctant leader then turned to the children and whispered, "Respect your parents because they created you. In this they share the high merit of creation with God."

We celebrated for days. Jews from Kiev danced with those from Mesopotamia. Moses laughed and B'nei Yisrael were joyous.

As the party wound down, Moses continued to reveal the Torah. Humbly, he stuttered, "We are to be a light unto the nations. Our lives will never be simple, but they will be enlightening and creative.

"Search for truth, and be certain you will find it in peace. Do not forge war until you have pursued a course of peace. Do not rejoice at the sorrow of your enemy, but be courageous in your stand against them. Never forget you were a stranger in a strange land, and you will respond well to the stranger in your midst. Remember to shoo away a mother bird before you pluck her eggs from their nest.

"Our story as a people is a splendid one," Moses continued. "Tell it to your children on Pesach. Narrate the Exodus from Egypt with adoring zest. Remind the little ones that Jews were slaves, controlled by the will of others. Teach them never to be complacent with their lot and wealth."

God's servant sat down. It was obvious Moses was exhausted and aware his duties would soon end. He had successfully managed to "let my people go." Moses smiled an all-knowing smile, and tiredly looked up at heaven and closed his eyes.

God whispered into Moses' ear: "This is the beginning of a long journey called the Jewish people. Well done."

With that, Moses fell asleep.

Chag Samayach. Happy Pesach.

A NEW TWIST ON CHAROSET

2 Granny Smith apples
juice of 1/2 lemon
1/2 cup fresh mango, peeled & diced
1/2 cup chopped toasted pecans
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tblsp. honey
1 tblsp. sweet wine

Peel, core, and dice the apples and sprinkle with the lemon juice. Place all ingredients in a food processor. Pulse once or twice just to break up. Let sit for the flavours to meld. Yield: about 2 cups.

About Life

Dear Ella,

From the time we were married, my Passover seders have traditionally been at my parents' home for one and my in-laws' home for the other. Over the years, our circumstances have changed and we now have three kids, ages five, three and one. The oldest two are rambunctious boys and my youngest is a very curious little girl.

My parents have childproofed their home as best they can, but my in-laws have not. Their home has glass tables, beautiful artwork and figurines. The couches are white and the rugs are Persian. I'll stop there.

Going to their home for the seder is a nightmare. We rarely go there during the year. When we see them, we either meet at a restaurant or they come to us. How do I get out of this year's seder at their home without hurting their feelings?

Pass Over the In-Laws

Dear Pass Over the In-Laws,

Passover is a time for family and friends to get together and enjoy the holidays. It would be a real shame if your family could not spend it together for material reasons.

I understand that going to your in-laws' home under the conditions you describe would not only be uncomfortable, but possibly dangerous as well. Under their present living arrangements, that is not an option.

I know you already have your hands full, but how about a seder at your home. Perhaps your mother-in-law could help with the cooking and you could buy some of the food to make less work for yourself. You could even use paper products so there are no dishes, but don't deprive your children and their grandparents of having a seder together. These are warm memories they will have for the rest of their lives.

I'm sure your in-laws will be just as relieved with the change of venue as you will. Don't be afraid to approach the subject, or perhaps let your husband explain it to them. Take that extra step so the whole family can celebrate the seder together. It's a special time.

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Hospital Update from Joseph Mapa, President and CEO

Clearly, Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) is the top issue. We are working tirelessly to implement the provincial directives for hospitals and ensure that we continue to provide safe, quality care to our patients. In order to do this, we have had to limit our services. We understand that closing our clinics and limiting surgery and doctors' office visits has created inconvenience and more significantly potential distress. The provincial directives are specific and in the opinion of Dr. Donald Low, our Microbiologist-in-Chief and key advisor to the Ministry of Health and Long-term Care and Toronto Public Health, the steps we have taken are necessary to stop the spread of this infection. We have asked Dr. Low to provide you with some answers to questions you may be having about SARS.

What is Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS)?

Dr. Low: SARS is a severe form of pneumonia, accompanied by a fever. It is not to be confused with the common cold. It is not yet known what organism (germ) is causing the infection. Individuals who have had direct contact with a SARS patient, or have traveled to China (Guangdong Province), Hong Kong, Singapore, or Vietnam (the city of Hanoi), should watch for the following symptoms:

- sudden onset of fever (greater than 38 °C or 100.4 °F), and
- respiratory symptoms, including cough, shortness of breath, or difficulty breathing

Who is at risk?

Dr. Low: SARS is only considered in people who have had:

- Close contact, within 10 days of onset of symptoms, with a person who has been identified as having SARS. Close contact means having cared for, lived with, or having had direct contact with respiratory secretions and body fluids of a person with SARS.
- A history of travel, within 10 days of onset of symptoms, to an area where SARS transmission is occurring. To date, these areas include: Guangdong Province of China, Hong Kong, Vietnam (City of Hanoi), Taiwan and Singapore.
- People who have been to the The Scarborough Hospital, Grace Division or York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill between March 16 and today

How is SARS spread?

Dr. Low: The cases we are seeing in Toronto are not airborne. It is believed the illness is spread via droplets from coughing and sneezing or from direct face-to-face contact with an ill person.

How is SARS treated?

Dr. Low: Patients with SARS are being treated in hospital. Cases are being kept in isolation rooms and hospital staff are using appropriate precautions.

Who can I call for more information?

Dr. Low: People who don't have any symptoms but have general queries about SARS can call Ontario's Health Infoline at 1-888-668-4636 for more information or can check the ministry website at: www.health.gov.on.ca

- If you have no symptoms but have been to the The Scarborough Hospital, Grace Division between March 16 and today, please call Telehealth Ontario at 1-866-797-0000 to get further direction.
- If you have no symptoms but have been to the York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill between March 16 and March 28th, please call York Region Public Health Unit at 1-800-361-5653 to get further direction.
- People who are in home isolation and have any concerns should phone their local public health unit (check ministry website for telephone numbers).
- For further updates on our Hospital, please visit our website at www.mtsinai.on.ca

SARS upsets Passover plans

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

This Pesach will be different from every other Pesach at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care as it and other organizations in the Toronto Jewish community continue to deal with fallout from the worldwide SARS outbreak.

Director of social work Linda Jackson said that although there have been no cases of SARS (severe acute respiratory syndrome) anywhere at Baycrest, the elderly, and particularly the frail elderly, are especially at risk of contracting the disease and suffering the most from it.

The result, she said, has been an emotional and logistical nightmare, as the entire main complex – comprising the Jewish Home for the Aged, the Apotex Centre and the hospital – has been placed under relative isolation.

In past years, many residents have left Baycrest for seders with family or friends, and many volunteers and family have taken part in the various seders held at the facility.

This year, because of a ban on day passes for residents and patients and a ban on most visitors and volunteers that was only scheduled to be partially lifted just before the holiday, plans have been changed. There will be one large seder at the main complex, and smaller ones on the floors, all run by staff, said Baycrest's director of pastoral care Rabbi Nachum Berlat, who, aside from his regular duties counselling and comforting residents and their families, has been working hard to prepare for the holiday.

As well, because the synagogue has been unavailable for public gatherings due to efforts to prevent SARS, plans are for yizkor to be said on the floors. But despite all the precautions, the entire institution has been kashered for Pesach, Rabbi Berlat said.

All children have a portion

Editorial

The golden, guileless smile on the young boy's face as he squeezes the piece of matzah directs our hearts and our minds very quickly to the essence of this holiday.

Magid. We tell the story of Pesach.

First and foremost, we tell the story to our children, even when their years are as tender as the young curly-head in the photo, at the earliest shaping of memory, so that they will be able, one day, to tell the story as well.

The Haggadah leaves no room to doubt this. The story must be told to our children, and in a manner that is comprehensible to children, indeed to all of our children whether they are wise, wicked, simple-minded or incapable of even formulating questions.

No one is excluded.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Shul Unveils Addition

VICTORIA — Congregation Emanu-El, Canada's oldest continually operating synagogue, unveiled its new $1.3 million educational and cultural centre last week. It was erected next to the shul's original building, which was built in 1863 and declared a national historic site after its restoration in 1982. The new structure houses classrooms, a reception hall, a library and archives, a rabbinical office and Vancouver Island's first mikvah. The 200-family Conservative shul raised the funds for the centre almost entirely from local and regional fundraising.

Library Reopened

SASKATOON — The library of Congregation Agudas Israel was reopened last week, one year after a still-unsolved firebombing ravaged 3,000 books. The shul received donations of cash and books from across the continent to help restock the collection, but many items will never be replaced, library chairwoman Gladys Rose said. Many items were out of print and some were up to 200 years old. The firebomb hit an unused classroom where the books were being stored after water damage to the library forced the shul to move them.

ISRAEL

Arab on High Court

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Arab has been named an acting Supreme Court justice. Observers say if Salim Joubran's trial period until the end of the year is successful, he will be named to a permanent post on the court. His appointment fulfills a promise Yosef Lapid made to name an Israeli Arab to the court when he became justice minister earlier this year.

Meeting Cancelled

JERUSALEM — Israel's justice minister cancelled a meeting with German foreign minister Joschka Fischer last week after Fischer refused to come to the Justice Ministry because it's in east Jerusalem. Germany doesn't recognize Israel's claim to east Jerusalem, which it captured from Jordan in 1967. Fischer was in the Mideast for talks with Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

WORLD

Jewish Soldier Killed

NEW YORK — Cpl. Mark Evnin of South Burlington, Vt., became the first known American Jewish military casualty of the war on Iraq. Evnin, 21, a marine sniper scout, was killed by Iraqi gunfire in an April 3 ambush in Kut. His mother Mindy said he was a proud Jew who believed he was helping Israel and hoped one day to join its army.

Pogrom Marked

MOSCOW — Politicians and dignitaries joined local Jews in Moldova to mark the 100th anniversary of the Kishinev pogrom. On April 7, 1903, 49 Jews were killed and thousands left homeless after Jewish homes and businesses were torched by angry mobs. A memorial to the victims was unveiled in a park in Kishinev, now known as Chisinau. The pogrom was sparked by false claims Jews used Christian children's blood to make matzah.

Restaurant Arson

PARIS — A fire at a kosher restaurant near Paris was arson, police said. The window of the restaurant in Epinay-sur-Seine, in the northern suburbs of the capital, was smashed early April 3 and flammable material was thrown into the building. The restaurant was empty at the time of the attack. Police have yet to establish whether the motivation was anti-Semitic.

Arafat OK'd Attacks, Barghouti Tells Shin Bet

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat gave clear instructions when he wanted a halt to terrorist attacks and let it be known when he did not, according to a Palestinian leader on trial in Israel.

According to a document released for publication last week, Marwan Barghouti said during Shin Bet questioning that Arafat made specific requests to him and other Palestinians when he wanted a ceasefire, Ha'aretz reported.

When Arafat was quiet about terror attacks, it was interpreted as a green light, Barghouti said, according to the report.

Barghouti, head of Arafat's Fatah movement in the West Bank, is being tried in Tel Aviv for involvement in the murders of dozens of Israelis in terrorist attacks. The trial resumed last week. He does not recognize Israel's right to try him.

He told Shin Bet that Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount just before the start of renewed Palestinian violence in September 2000 was "the straw that broke the camel's back," although the main reasons for the intifadah were the failed Camp David talks in 2000 and settlement expansion.

BBC, CJC aim to bar Al-Jazeera from Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada's two main Jewish advocacy organizations are opposing plans to carry the Arab-language Al-Jazeera television news network on digital cable services in this country, thus stirring a debate on free speech.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada plan to speak out against a proposal by the Canadian Cable Television Association (CCTA), an industry lobby group, to allow its members to carry the Qatar-based network.

Both groups say they will intervene at future hearings of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) to argue that Al-Jazeera, often referred to as the "Arabic CNN," should be denied a licence because it has a track record of broadcasting anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, and that it glorifies suicide bombers. Thus, they contend, the network is incompatible with Canadian values and will likely contravene Canadian anti-hate law.

Earlier this month, the Canadian Cable Television Association asked the CRTC to include Al-Jazeera as part of a package of ethnic channels on the broadcast regulator's list of available digital channels.

"The issue is not politics or conflicting points of view or [broadcasting] undesirable material," said CJC president Keith Landy. "This has everything to do with upholding Canadian law."

Landy said material broadcast by Al-Jazeera is "likely to expose identifiable groups to hatred" in Canada and thus would violate the Criminal Code's hate provisions, not to mention contravene broadcast standards.

He said he didn't have specific examples at hand, but that generally, the network has been "virulently anti-Semitic," has denied or trivialized the Holocaust, and has lionized suicide bombers and terrorists as "martyrs." It has also aired hate-filled diatribes against Israel, he added.

Asked how it falls to CJC to decide a matter of law enforcement, Landy replied, "We of all people know when to identify anti-Semitism. We know what Holocaust denial is. We know what can masquerade as an opposing view."

Al-Jazeera is perhaps best known for broadcasting exclusive interviews with Osama bin Laden and for airing the Al Qaeda leader's videotaped threats against the West.

Many Canadians already receive the 24-hour news network via the "grey market" U.S.-based DirecTV satellite service.

Requests to the CRTC to carry "bundles" of specialty channels are based on demand, says Janet Yale, president and CEO of the CCTA, which represents, among others, Rogers Cable and Shaw Communications.

"We receive requests from customers to add services regularly. These are based on consistent and quantifiable demand," Yale told The CJN.

The 2001 census tallied more than 200,000 Arabic speakers in Canada.

Yale said her organization has not prescreened Al-Jazeera and doesn't as a practice preview any service it is asked to apply for, but she said the CCTA is proceeding on the basis that the network is "presumptively legal."

However, "we do not want to be involved in anything that's against the law.

"If the CRTC decides it's not legal, then that's their decision. I think this is about the right to access to different sources of information. If someone finds it objectionable or offensive, then they won't buy it."

Joseph Ben-Ami, a spokesperson for B'nai Brith Canada, rejects any linkage of the issue to free speech.

"It's just nonsense. The right to free speech is not equal to the right to promote hate."

He said Al-Jazeera consistently broadcasts messages "that arguably contravene the Criminal Code. Would we tolerate the CBC or CTV broadcasting calls for death to Jews?"

B'nai Brith plans to appear before the CRTC with "hard evidence" of Al-Jazeera's track record, Ben-Ami said.

Also slated to appear at the licensing hearings will be the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations, which has said it will argue for the granting of a green light to Al-Jazeera.

Ironically, Al-Jazeera bureaus have been shut down in Jordan, Bahrain, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia because the station has consistently sought out Israeli perspectives on Mideast issues. As well, earlier this month, two of its correspondents were kicked out of Baghdad without explanation.

Liberty, not licence

From the editor's desk

Into the vacuum of law and social order in Iraq swooped mayhem and havoc.

As these words were being written, anarchy reigned in Iraq. Looting was rampant on the streets of the country's major cities and in its palaces, offices, stores, homes, museums, schools and hospitals. No building seemed spared. There was no safe haven, no sanctuary from the pillaging, and worse, from the frenzied mob.

Even the marbled floor of the main mosque in Najaf became an altar for slaughtered souls when two Shiite clerics were sliced and hacked to death by their unforgiving co-religionists.

The government of Saddam Hussein fell last week, or rather, was toppled by the combined might of the Anglo-American coalition forces and the generally surprising irresolution of the Iraqi fighting forces.

The lock of the oppressor's shackles was smashed. The tightly bound restraints were thrown off. But never having known freedom in any real sense, the Iraqi people now confuse licence for their newfound liberty.

The coalition is attempting to restore some semblance of order, but all its measures are stop-gap. The Iraqi people's best hope is for the anarchy to be ended quickly and for the vacuum to be filled by credible and capable believers in, and practitioners of, the democratic process.

It is an interesting historical footnote that Iraq's liberation from tyranny occurred on the eve of Passover, the quintessential freedom holiday celebrating liberation from tyranny.

Among its many lessons, Passover also teaches us that the transition from slavery to freedom is not an easy one. Freedom is not the absence of authority. It is in fact the opposite. It is devotion to and respect for rightful authority.

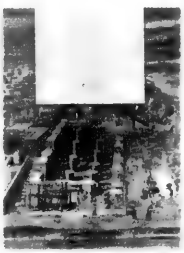
The liberated people of Israel learned this at the foot of Mount Sinai. They had Moses as their teacher.

The people of Iraq will have to learn this lesson as well. But they have neither Sinai nor Moses.

The fighting has not yet ended, but the war is over. Prosecuting the search for Saddam has replaced prosecuting the war.

To the great relief of supporters and opponents of the war alike, their worst fears, thankfully, did not materialize. A much smaller number of civilians than originally feared was harmed. A much smaller number of soldiers than feared was killed.

The people of Israel have begun to unseal their sealed rooms. The dark threat of disaster has begun to lift from above their heads.



And in an equally remarkable turn of events, as U.S. Marines were shooting at the last pockets of resistance from a hidden enemy across the Euphrates River, U.S. President George W. Bush elliptically hinted to the Ba'athist regime of Syria that their time to be "changed" may be next. They too must submit to the more modern norms of international behaviour, the president told them. He wants Syria to desist from aiding the former Iraqi regime and to destroy the weapons of mass destruction he knows to be buried under Syrian sands.

The decision by Bush to go to war, and the relatively swift defeat of the Iraqi armies, appear to have set in motion a new gravitational force in the region affecting entrenched geo-political tides.

Though the region's final shape will be clear to historians and political scientists only after many more years have elapsed, significant structural change appears to be unfolding in the Middle East. New political currents, with post-Saddam Iraq as the watershed, will soon begin to flow through the region.

These currents will undoubtedly flow onto Israel's shores as well. Whether they are "warm" or "cold" will become clearer in the near future.

Each year I try to highlight a newly published Haggadah that has come across my desk. This year is no exception.

The Katz Passover Haggadah, distributed by Feldheim Publishers and printed in Israel by Ma'arava Machon Rubin Publications, is a masterpiece aimed primarily at younger readers. It is compiled by Rabbi Baruch Chait and features the breathtaking art of Gadi Pollack and backgrounds by Evgeny Markovich.

The Katz Haggadah is traditional in its outlook but radically unconventional in the sweep and grandeur of its graphic design. The pages that contain the Haggadah's text are in both Hebrew and English, but "uncrowded" as Rabbi Chait notes.

There is, however, considerable commentary at the end of the Haggadah, along with extensive references for the artwork and an exhilarating essay by Rabbi Mordechai Neugroschel that discusses some of the latest scholarly and archeological findings on the historicity of the story of the Exodus.

Rabbi Chait also includes a small, stand-alone seder guide that is a helpful tool for anyone charged with the responsibility of leading the seder. For sheer imaginative force and ability to captivate the young reader, the illustrations in the Katz Haggadah are unrivalled.

MOCK KNESSET: Students from youth groups across the political and religious spectrum – Bnei Akiva, Habonim-Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, the North American Federation of Temple Youth, United Synagogue Youth and Young Judaea – met recently at York University's Osgoode Hall to debate issues facing the Israeli Knesset today. Each group researched and represented a political party that held views different from the ideology of their own organization. During the day-long session, the 62 participants joined committees, debated issues according to their party's platform, created resolutions and tried to have them passed into law. Program co-ordinator, York student Aliza Jesin, 20, said the goal was to teach students that there is more to Israel than just security and that Israel faces some of the same problems as Canada. The event was organized through the Toronto Jewish Youth Council and sponsored by the Jewish Agency for Israel. Seen are members of Habonim Dror, who represented Shas.

Ottawa not shutting down CMDA: president

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There is no truth to an Internet petition that claims the Canadian government is planning to shut down the offices of Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA), the organization's national president said last week.

A petition hosted at www.PetitionOnline.com is badly out of date and misleading, said Joseph Bitton, the CMDA's Montreal-based leader.

Nevertheless, CMDA is "getting a lot of problems" because of the petition, Bitton said, and even the U.S. branch of Magen David Adom is seeing its supporters question whether they should be giving money to an organization they fear may be violating the law.

"It's created some confusion and people wonder if something is wrong," Bitton said. "It's not good for our organization or Israel."

The petition, which the Web site describes as one of its 10 most popular, voices opposition to "the planned closure of Canadian Magen David Adom by the Canadian Government and the CCRA (Canada Customs and Revenue Agency)."

Online petition called inaccurate

A Web link to the petition is being circulated through e-mail lists, and so far, 157,865 signatures have been recorded, the Web site claims.

Bitton said at one point last year, CMDA was concerned that it might be closed. The organization fought a legal battle with the CCRA over the transfer of an old ambulance to the Israeli army, and the CCRA reportedly was also concerned that MDA ambulances were being employed in the disputed Palestinian territories.

But soon after, CMDA cut a deal with the CCRA to ensure better control over its funds, hiring two agents in Israel to supervise their disbursement. Use of the ambulances in the disputed territories is not prohibited by any law and will continue, Bitton said.

"We're functioning normally and we're issuing tax-deductible receipts for all donations," he said.

CMDA has contacted the petition's sponsor, but was told he could not get the petition removed. Bitton said CMDA is trying to contact PetitionOnline.com, but so far has had no luck.

National child poverty coalition keeps pressure on governments

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The national, non-partisan coalition, Campaign Against Child Poverty (CACP), is planning its next in a series of newspaper ads set to run before the provincial election, says its co-chair Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld.

At a recent multi-faith breakfast meeting co-sponsored by CACP and RBC Financial Group, Rabbi Bielfeld urged CACP's steering committee to "continue to bring the issue to the attention of the governments of Canada and Ontario.

"In this province, nearly 400,000 children are living below the poverty line, and of those, more than 40 per cent live $10,000 below the poverty line. It is staggering, that since 1989, poverty has increased," said Rabbi Bielfeld, the rabbi emeritus of Temple Emanu-El.

CACP educates the public about the high level of child and family poverty in Canada. Composed of citizens from faith groups, social justice groups, charities and child welfare organizations, the CACP has previously printed ads in the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail. Its first ad, in January 2001, was an open letter to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien setting out proposals for his upcoming throne speech.

Others have included an ad signed by 400 faith leaders, and one expressing disappointment that the prime minister reneged on his promises to include the issue in the throne speech.

The upcoming ad needs to be published "in order to add to our voices," Rabbi Bielfeld said. "We need to remind the federal government that prayer alone will not end child poverty."

He said the seeds for CACP were planted in 1998 when a member pointed out that "Toronto is a magnificent place to live, yet there is an increase in child poverty.

"We resolved that trying to eradicate that poverty was the only decent way to preserve society. How could we sit idly by when so many children were in need?"

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, co-chair, Campaign Against Child Poverty, holds a mock-up of the newspaper advertisement CACP plans to run before the next provincial election. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

A coalition was formed that included other faith groups and cut across political and religious lines.

"We moved our agenda onto the government platform," the rabbi said. "The government needed to take up steps to eradicate child poverty."

Over the years, CACP has met with many government ministers, with the support of Campaign 2000, a national network of more than 85 organizations that monitor progress in putting an end to child poverty.

After meeting with Finance Minister John Manley in January, who Rabbi Bielfeld said was "at first was lukewarm about the issue" of affordable child care, the government announced a number of long-term investments to address child poverty, including increases to the National Child Benefit, a joint initiative of the federal, provincial and territorial governments that provides support to low-income families with children and encourages them to participate in the workforce.

Other projects the government announced were increased funding for provinces, territories and First Nations to help provide quality, regulated child care, and new expenditures for affordable housing agreements with the provinces and territories.

CACP said in a recent press release that it is pleased with these announcements, but it is concerned that Ontario has so far refused to spend federal funds on regulated child care spaces, and has not matched the federal funds for affordable housing.

Its next steps, among others, is to focus efforts to end the clawback of the National Child Benefit for families on social assistance, so that all children benefit from this federal programs, the press release said.

At the breakfast, June Callwood, CACP co-chair, said that as a child, she once went without food for three days.

"After years of meeting, [CACP] persisted and Campaign 2000 persisted, and for the first time in Canadian history, child care got on the throne speech and budget.

"We need to defile the apathy that creeps up on us all. A well-nourished, well-cared for child has the chance to turn into a healthy adult."

MORE PEOPLE WHO COULD HAVE ANY CAR IN THE WORLD HAVE THIS ONE.

If you're at that point in your life when you're trying to choose a truly great car, it may help you to know what people before you have done. The vast majority chose an S-Class. And not just because of that fabled star on its hood. But because of everything that stands behind it. The stunning blend of power and style. The unflustered ride. The awe-inspiring, yet never intimidating technology. The total reassurance of the complete package. And lastly, we're told, because of the test drive. For once they step into an S-Class, most drivers refuse to ever step down. Mercedes-Benz. You're ready.

All children have a portion

Everyone has a place at the seder table, and the experience is more profound as a result. Story, symbol and ritual combine with the broad goodness of sharing to form the gentle, sustaining seed from which lifelong memories can take root in the souls of our children.

On the Shabbat before Pesach, most communities read a rather stern haftarah portion among whose 20 sombre verses we find a special foreshadowing of the directive that none must be excluded from sitting at the seder table.

"Lo, I will send you Elijah the Prophet before the coming of the great and awesome day of the Lord that he may turn the hearts of the fathers back to the children and the hearts of the children back to their fathers." Malachi (3:24)

We cannot tell our children the story of Pesach if they are not at the seder with us. We cannot answer their questions if they are not there to ask them. And as our tradition teaches, we do not fear, nor have we ever feared, questions – however difficult they may be. Far greater is the fear that we might be too hard-hearted to listen, too self-absorbed to understand, or too insensitive to answer appropriately.

A story is told about a poor man who came to his rabbi's house to ask him a question regarding the rituals of Pesach.

"If a person cannot afford to buy wine, can he fulfil the obligation to drink four cups of wine by substituting milk?" he wanted to know.

The rabbi answered with the only permissible answer available. He told his guest that milk could not be substituted for wine at the seder. The questioner thanked the rabbi for his patience and bid him farewell. The rabbi then gave him 25 rubles with which to buy wine for the holiday.

After the man had left the house, the rabbi's wife, who had overheard the brief conversation from an adjacent room, approached her husband with her own question.

"Why did you give the man 25 rubles when wine costs two or three rubles?"

Her husband smiled. "When a poor man asks if he can use milk at his seder because he cannot afford wine, it is obvious that he cannot afford meat either."

How important it is, therefore, that even as we open our homes on seder night, we open our hearts too. For our hearts know well, in the way that a flower knows about sun and water, of the sources of the strength of our people. And in the days and months that lie ahead for the Jewish people, we will need to be strong.

All of our children, all of Israel, have a portion at the seder table. For the story of the miraculous exodus from Egypt includes us all and must be told – and retold – to us all.

And what a story it is. It is one of the seminal uplifting stories of human history, ineradicably engraved for all times into the hearts, souls and minds of every generation.

We thank God for enabling us to live to see this day. Let us make it a day for all our children, for the entirety of Israel.

Chag samayach.

Concordia's Lowy writes

I wish to clarify remarks reported in a recent article in The Canadian Jewish News on my presentation to the Brigadier Frederick Kisch Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion ("Concordia asks Quebec to de-certify student union," CJN, April 3). Some of the comments attributed to me do not accurately reflect my position.

It is no secret that relations between recent student governments and Concordia's administration have been strained over the past several years. Disturbed by the actions of the Concordia Student Union (CSU) leadership, including the student handbook, Uprising 2001, and allegations of financial fraud in the CSU, I asked the government of Quebec in October 2001 to conduct an inquiry into CSU activities. I have not in the interim pursued this matter.

I did, however, mention that the government of Quebec is launching a public consultation on Bill 32, the law on the accreditation and financing of student associations. This law has not been revised since 1993. We fully intend to participate in this process, as will other Quebec universities.

Following my remarks to the Royal Canadian Legion and in response to questions, I tried to put student activism at Concordia in context. As I explained to the audience, students understandably bring with them a perspective on world issues based on their life experience. That is appropriate and something we fully expect at Concordia. Moreover, we promote free and democratic debate about issues of concern to students, always in an environment that respects diversity.

On the other hand, for quite some time, I have been clear that I believe the leadership of the CSU these past few years has not represented the interests and priorities of most students.

I was also clear about my role as rector. Notwithstanding my personal beliefs on any political issue, my responsibility is to ensure decisions are made in the best interest of all members of the Concordia community.

A wake-up call

Henry Srebrnik's article, "Canadian Jews should rethink alliances," is a much-needed wakeup call for Canadian Jews (CJN, March 27).

Canada's Liberal party continuously supports (or equally as abhorrent, abstains from) resolutions condemning Israel in the United Nations and allows its members to make unconscionable statements that draw a moral equivalency between Palestinian terrorist attacks and Israeli defensive measures.

As was written in The CJN by David Goldberg, director of research and education at the Canadian-Israel Committee, "to the extent that Canada has anchored its foreign policy on the principles of internationalism and multilateral diplomacy, its voting record on the 20 Israel-related resolutions – support for 15 and abstentions on the remaining five – should be of deep concern to all Canadians" ("Edging toward irrelevancy: Canada's vote at the 57th UN General Assembly," CJN, Jan. 16). Indeed, as Srebrnik writes, "Israel is in greater danger now than at any time in its history" and it would be grossly negligent for Jewish Canadians who care about Israel to vote for the Liberals.

Students, smarten up!

Regarding the article about Carleton Jewish students ("Carleton Jewish students denied protest rights," CJN, April 3): what nonsense! What rights? I'm tired of reading about any students – Arab, Jew or anyone – demonstrating on campus. None of it should be allowed. Students are on campus to study, absorb and learn, and when their education is complete, to get a job and help their parents and other taxpayers with the burden of looking after this country.

I am prepared to subsidize university students' education as long as students keep focused on their goal, which is to accomplish the maximum amount of education in as short a period of time as possible. The university is not the place to spend frivolous hours arguing and demonstrating with other students. None of these fringe groups should be allowed on campus. You want to demonstrate? Get off the campus, get a soap box and put it in a park like they do in Speaker's Corner in England and yell your lungs out. Smarten up and do something constructive while taxpayers struggle to subsidize your education.

Ashamed of PM

For several months, the Canadian federal government waffled and refused to share the United States' concerns about border security and the war against Iraq.

In the decades since World War II, the United States has given our country an unprecedented, generous free pass on military and defence matters. Canada continues to gain immensely from trade agreements that give us exciting access to the world's biggest market.

I am deeply ashamed that Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and his cabinet have failed to rebut vocal anti-American rhetoric and insults against the countries who joined the "coalition of the willing."

To remember this Passover...

Lessons for parents from the Exodus

By JANE ULMAN

"Boy, you guys sure take the fun out of being free," says Jeremy, 13, who is unsuccessfully lobbying for a later curfew and who, post-bar mitzvah, is taking this business about being an adult entirely too literally.

"You think being free is about having fun?" I ask. "How much fun do you think the Israelites had on their 40-year trek through the desert?"

"Lots."

"What do you think was the most fun — being swallowed up by the earth when they rebelled against Moses and Aaron at Koreh or being bitten by fiery serpents and dying? Or having to eat the exact same food every day for 40 years?"

Yes, there's a reason the Torah commands us, no less than four times, to teach the story of the Exodus to our children.

And a reason that we parents need the refresher course as well.

Leading a pack of 603,550 cranky Israelites, along with their wives and children, their flocks and herds, is, after all, not that different from leading a pack of four cranky boys from birth to self-sufficiency, as my husband, Larry, and I are doing.

Moses only reluctantly accepts the challenge. "Who am I that I should go to Pharaoh and free the Israelites from Egypt?" he asks in Exodus 3:11. At 80, Moses doesn't think he's up to the task. At 50-something, with sons 12, 13, 15 and 19, Larry and I understand his hesitation. Especially now that ours are all essentially teenagers, eager to cast off the chains of childhood.

For 40 years, Moses has to endure the Israelites' constant kvetching, such as their wailing in Numbers 11:4-5: "If only we had meat to eat! We remember the fish that we used to eat free in Egypt, the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, the onions and the garlic."

At one point, after the Israelites relapse into idolatry, creating the notorious Golden Calf, Moses pleads for divine assistance to "bring up these people" (Exodus 33:12). They are too stiff-necked for him to handle.

I understand. I've had my share of Moses-like meltdowns, whether it's dealing with their incessant bickering over whose turn it is to sit in the front seat, the forgotten homework project that's due the next day or their need to be in different places, in different parts of the city, at the exact same time.

"I can't do this anymore," I cry, exasperated.

The next generation of solid Jewish citizens. [Israel Sun file photo]

"So who told you to have four kids?" one of them invariably asks.

But rather than empathize and collectively rise to the occasion, they rattle their individual chains more demandingly, in true teenage fashion.

"You're not the boss of me," Danny, 12, says.

"Actually, I am," my husband answers. "And I have your birth certificate to prove it."

As well as a mandate from God.

The Torah, interestingly, doesn't command us to love our children, but it does command us to educate them. "You shall teach them diligently to your children," Deuteronomy 6:7 instructs us.

And so, despite their protests, we send them to school and guide them at home. We provide for them, protect them and prepare them for lives as adults. And that mandate causes us to restrict certain freedoms such as later bedtimes and extended sessions on AOL Instant Messenger. Instead, we push for increased attention to homework, more help with household chores and less tormenting of their siblings.

After all, Moses doesn't struggle to bring the Israelites out of Egypt, after 430 years in slavery, so that, once safely across the Red Sea, they are free to carry on as they please.

And we parents don't devote all our time, energy and money to bringing our kids to the brink of adulthood, only to release them to unfulfilling and unfocused lives of lollygagging about or indulging in "sex, drugs and rock 'n roll."

Obviously, when the symbol of liberation is a matzah, the proverbial bread of affliction, freedom is not about unfettered fun.

Moses is accomplishing nothing less than transforming the Israelites from idolaters to monotheists, from slaves to founders of the Jewish nation. As God urges Moses to tell Pharaoh, in Exodus 7:16 and elsewhere, "Let my people go that they may serve me."

And we parents are doing nothing less than creating the next generation of solid Jewish citizens.

And so, every year, on the 14th of Nisan, we gather together as a family to retell the story of the Exodus, a transcendent moment in Jewish history as well as in Jewish family life.

As a people, this year, we measure how far we've come in the last 3,315 years. As parents, Larry and I measure how far we've come in the last 20 years.

Passover is also an opportunity to remind our sons that the first seder was held while the Israelites were still in bondage, giving them hope that their suffering under our seemingly oppressive rule, like the Israelites under slavery, is finite.

And our job, as restrictive parents, is also finite.

When our children are grown, Larry and I will finally have reached the Promised Land. Then we can watch our sons say to their own teenagers, "You think being free is about having fun?"

For us parents, it will be.

Jane Ulman lives in Encino, Calif., with her husband and four sons.

And the victims of terror

By GIL TROY

Once again, during this year's seders, we will celebrate our joyous holiday of liberation with heavy hearts. Even as we revel in our freedom as Jews in the modern world, our brothers and sisters in Israel are in pain. This year, in particular, as we mark the one-year yahrzeit of the Netanya seder massacre, when 29 people ranging in age from 25-years-old to 92-years-old were brutally murdered, we must reclaim our symbols, remember our losses and reaffirm our commitment to Israel, the Jewish people and a true peace.

In the 29 months since the Palestinians turned away from negotiations toward violence, too many have died and too many have been injured, on both sides. And too many seders will have empty chairs – missing husbands, fathers, brothers, sons; missing wives, mothers, sisters, daughters.

The power of the seder, which remains one of the most popular of Jewish ceremonies, comes from its ritualization of memory. It is a most primal, most sensual, most literal, of services. The seder plate – with the charoset representing the mortar used in building and the salt water representing the tears shed by the slaves – helps us visualize the trauma of slavery.

The physical acts of reclining, of eating special foods, of standing to greet Elijah the prophet, help us feel the joy of yetziat Mitzrayim, of leaving Egypt. And, in an affirmation of the importance of peoplehood, we mark this special moment not as individuals but as a community.

In that spirit, we cannot proceed with business as usual. We must improvise a new ritual that marks our present pain, that illustrates our vital connection with Israel and with Israelis today. Let each of us, as we gather at our seders, intrude on our own celebrations by leaving one setting untouched, by having one empty chair at our table.

Let us take a moment to reflect on our losses from these terrible two-and-a-half years. And as we do that, let us not just remember the dead as hundreds of nameless and faceless people, but let us personalize them. Let us take the time to find out the name of one victim of the current conflict, one Jew who cannot celebrate this year's holiday, one family in mourning.

Let us call out the name of Benny Avraham, age 20, one of the Israelis kidnapped by Hezbollah in October 2000, and now presumed dead by the government, but still sought by his family and people of conscience throughout the world. Let us call out the name of Koby Mandell, age 13, a young American immigrant brutally killed in May, 2001, whose father, Rabbi Seth Mandell, talks about the empty seat at his Shabbat table and shares the pain of watching other boys grow up, watching their voices deepen, their shoulders broaden, their gaits quicken, even as his son lies dead.

Let us call out the names of Noy and Dvir Anter, aged 12 and 14, who were "guilty" of the crime of going down to the lobby of the hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, with their mother and sister in search of a cup of coffee – of being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Let us call out the names of Maryam Attar, 27, Kamar Abu Hamed, 12, Abigail Leitel, 14, Mordechai Hershko, 41, and his son Tom Hershko, 15, a Muslim, a Druze, a Baptist and two Jews, who were among the 17 murdered in Haifa barely a month ago on March 5. Let us call out the names of Ernest and Eva Weiss, aged 80 and 75, residents of Petach Tikvah who survived the concentration camps only to be slaughtered while sitting down for the Pesach seder at the Park Hotel just a year ago.

As we call out these names, let us commit to some action, to embrace the families of the victims. As we call out these names, let us commit to building a friendship with Israel and Israelis that is not just about politics, and not solely about mourning and memory.

And as we call out these names, unlike too many of our enemies, let us not call for vengeance, let us not call for more bloodshed. Instead, as we mourn, let us hope; as we remember the many lives lost during this crazy and pointless war, let us pray ever more intensely for a just and lasting peace.

Information about many of the Israelis killed in the current violence can be found at the Israeli Foreign Ministry's Web site at http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/home.asp. Ideas about how to help families of victims can be found at http://www.walk4israel.com.

Autonomous yet dependent

At the end of last month, at the beginning of the war on Iraq, my son got married in Costa Rica. Don't ask! Caught up as we were in the middle of the conflict's international controversy and concern over it, we nevertheless celebrated our simchah with joy and gladness. How could we be so happy while others were so angry and frightened? I felt the tug of war but not the horror. My son was getting married.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

With reflection, I became aware of the diversity of emotions and the pull of history. The call of worldly concern contested with the appeal of personal autonomy. And these twin standards permeated other aspects of the simchah. In many ways, this wedding was a testimony to our family's self-sufficiency. My husband and sons conducted all the Sabbath services. I gave the dvar Torah. My husband and eldest son conducted the wedding. We did it ourselves and we were proud of our independence.

Yet we were also aware of our Jewish connections and relatedness. Our guests came from Israel, South America, Canada and the United States. They did not just help make the simchah; they made it. And without the local Costa Rican Jewish community, we would not have had kosher facilities or the use of a Torah. So we were both autonomous and dependent, isolated and connected.

Weaving a web of relationships while remaining free is the hardest lesson to learn – for both nations and young married couples. How much can we or should we depend on others and how far can we or should we go it alone? This duality of human existence is never more poignant than during marriage or war.

Situated as we are between Purim and Passover, it is worth noting that these holidays introduce both patterns. Queen Esther must go alone to save the people. In her courageous command to Mordecai, she acknowledges her solitary duty and prepares for the consequences. Yet she wisely introduces a communal component: everyone must fast for three days, for they are all in it together.

Passover, too, percolates with these twin themes. Moses stands alone as no other leader in our history. At one point, God even offers to make a nation from him. Total sovereignty. But Moses refuses and our Haggadah does not accentuate or even highlight our hero. He is rather hidden from our view as our telling of the exodus emphasizes the communal experience of redemption. Nevertheless, the very holiday that locates our national liberation mandates a personal and independent view. Each of us must see ourselves as though we were in Eygpt, independently redeemed by God. Independence and involvement, isolation and interconnection – both aspects of our lives coexist and are fully entrenched in our Jewish tradition.

Learning from the sages of Bnei Brak

In the Haggadah, we read the story about Rabbi Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, Rabbi Joshua ben Chananiah, Rabbi Elazar ben Azariah, Rabbi Akiva and Rabbi Tarfon sitting in Bnei Brak discussing why we recite the Exodus from Egypt at night.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It's not surprising to find eminent rabbis sitting at the seder table telling the story of the Exodus – or is it? Rabbi Eliezer did not even think one should leave one's house for the seder – yet there he was. Looking behind the story, it's not clear what it's meant to teach us, beyond the final stated decision of the sages that even in the messianic age, we will recount the Exodus.

When we look at the biographies and philosophies of the five rabbis, we begin to see that their presence together carries multiple messages.

Rabbi Eliezer, along with Rabbi Joshua, was a pupil of Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai. The two students spirited him out of Jerusalem just before the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE.

Yet these scholars could not be more different.

The wealthy Rabbi Eliezer married the daughter of Rabbi Gamliel, the Patriarch, and followed the school of Shammai. A difficult man, Rabbi Eliezer was excommunicated when he refused to accept the decisions of the majority, maintaining that only traditions learned from one's teacher should form the basis of halachah. Despite the antiwar stance of his teacher Rabbi Yohanan, Rabbi Eliezer backed the Zealots. He died an excommunicate and only after his death were his rulings reinstated.

Rabbi Joshua, his fellow student, was poor all his life. A Levite and follower of the school of Hillel, he was a peacemaker. He joined his colleagues in excommunicating Rabbi Eliezer.

Rabbi Elazar was a wealthy man, descended from Ezra the scribe. Even after being appointed in Rabbi Gamliel's place to head the academy, he humbly acceded to Rabbi Gamliel's reinstatement and took the second chair in the academy. He is famous for his dictum, "The Torah speaks in the language of men." He opposed Rabbi Akiva's interpretive methods, preferring the plain meaning of the text.

Rabbi Akiva, a Hillelite, is well known. His greatness is indisputable, his kindness legendary. When Rabbi Eliezer was excommunicated, it was Rabbi Akiva who informed him. Rabbi Akiva proclaimed Bar Kochba the messiah and, with Rabbi Tarfon, died at the hands of the Romans.

Rabbi Tarfon was a priest and while he and Rabbi Akiva often clashed (Rabbi Tarfon preferred the Shammite school), they remained close.

So we have priest and commoner, poor and rich, modest and arrogant, all sitting together with halachic approaches that were at opposite ends of the spectrum. Why put them together?

Recall that Rabbi Eliezer believed that the tradition of teacher-to-pupil-transmission was the final word on halachah. Is he included to highlight the tension between his view and the emerging rabbinic consensus that halachah is determined, after much argumentation, by the majority?

Or is it, as the late Rabbi Louis Finkelstein argued, that this was a meeting to plan the rebellion of Bar Kochba, whose uprising would bring destruction more horrific than that of 70 CE? But they may not have been all of one mind on that. Rabbi Elazar and Rabbi Joshua both died before the Bar Kochba rebellion and may not have supported it.

Finally, Rabbi Akiva was one of the four who entered paradise, along with Ben Zoma, who argued that "all the days" meant we should tell the Exodus story at night. He differs from the conclusion of the sages that "all the days" means we are to retell the story of the Exodus even in the days of the Messiah. Is he mentioned to make us reflect on the dangers of too much messianism and too much inquiry into the mysteries of the upper worlds?

I do not have answers, but I love the questions raised by this illustrious gathering. With so many different approaches to the story of the Exodus, Passover is the time when we should be the most open to all these possibilities, to limitless speculation, to questions without final answers.

We must also remain aware of the shadows falling over these men assembled for our guidance, since some will die in an abortive rebellion and one will die an excommunicate, while only two apparently emerged unscathed from the upheavals their century was to bring.

Clearing out the clutter at Pesach

With Pesach just around the corner, I once again began to look forward to the more peculiar rituals of the Festival of Freedom. In my family, that includes heated discussions over whether this year's horseradish is hotter than last year's (it's always hotter than last year's, but never as hot as the "chrane" of 1995 – now that was a batch that could curl your nose hairs).

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

The rites of Passover also include singing "Echad Mee Yode'ah" as fast as that guy in the old Federal Express commercial; marvelling at the height of this year's sponge cake (at this rate it will soon need an observation deck); and, in Winnipeg anyway, wishing that the Jets were still around and in the NHL playoffs.

Much of the practice of Pesach, of course, revolves around food. We gripe and kvetch in unison about the edibles while we persist in noshing on farfel, matzah and odd-looking buns. (For more than one reason, my friends and I joke that Pesach is the holiday that binds our people.)

This year, my wife and I are getting excited (and anxious) about the pre-Pesach clean-up. It's not just about switching dishes and scrubbing the kitchen. We're trying to see this Pesach as a time to rid ourselves of the household clutter that enslaves us.

We'll finally box up the old 486 computer that's been gathering dust since the days when the Haggadah's evil son wasn't so bad. We'll pack up old novels that we've already read or never will. We'll sort through old clothes and donate the stuff that didn't fit us before Pesach (and certainly won't after). And, then there's the junk mail. The credit card offers, the ads for stock-buying newsletters, assorted flyers and special offers… let my people go (to a recycling bin)!

This long overdue cleansing is not intended to diminish the important tasks of ridding the house of chametz and preparing for the seders. In fact, responding to the plague of clutter will enhance the holiday experience. As adherents of the ancient Oriental practice of Feng Shui will tell you, good surroundings can improve well-being, while a bad environment can actually make you ill. It's so easy to become slaves to crowded closets, cluttered "junk drawers," overflowing bookshelves and maxed-out e-mail inboxes. A thorough springtime cleaning, coinciding with Pesach prep, can offer a family-sized exodus.

But beyond the mundane tasks of cleaning the house, could this Pesach also be a time to clear some of our emotional clutter as well? In Winnipeg, like much of Canada, it has been a brutal, oppressive winter. Pesach is our first chance to open the windows, smell the spring air and experience some clarity. The senses come alive as Pesach nears. You can feel the cobwebs dissipate.

And what about our intellectual clutter? As the world order changes yet again – this time as a result of the war in Iraq – are we prepared to open our minds to what the new realities might mean for us as Jews, as Canadians and as supporters of Israel? Clinging to old opinions and biases without testing them against new realities is a form of self-imposed slavery. Let's prepare ourselves for a post-war period where creative solutions can find their way back to the negotiating table.

For those of us who have found ourselves in disagreement with our fellow Jews about approaches to Mideast peace and about the positions of the Israeli government, this is a time for healthy dialogue and effective communication within the Diaspora and between the Diaspora and the people of Israel.

So as we unpack our Pesach dishes, let's wish each other the Pesach gift of freedom, in all its forms: from clearing the clutter in our physical spaces; from clearing our minds and letting the fresh spring air reduce our winter-imposed stress; and, from thinking and acting creatively to challenges, old and new.

Chag samayach. Go easy on the horseradish. It's likely hotter than last year's.

The Kirshner File

The fall of Baghdad spelled finis to Saddam's regime

Three weeks after allied forces swept into Iraq, the war reached a climax. On April 9, in an extraordinary event that symbolically marked the end of the despotic Saddam Hussein era, American Marines pulled down an iconic six-metre high bronze statue of Saddam in central Baghdad that had been erected in Paradise Square only a year earlier. Jubilant Iraqis swarmed around the fallen idol, its extended right arm raised toward Jerusalem, and kicked it in a spasm of suppressed rage. At last they were free to express their loathing of the tyrant on the Tigris who had bestrode Iraq like a colossus for 24 years. A banner headline in the Toronto Star, "Saddam Toppled," told the story succinctly.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Even as Iraqis celebrated the fall of a dictator on a warm spring evening, American troops were still meeting stiff resistance from diehard Baathists firing at them in defiance. But the scruffy young men in jeans defending a dying regime with rocket-propelled grenades were doomed. Baghdad was no longer under the sway of Saddam's republic of fear. Within 48 hours of Baghdad's rapid conquest, the northern cities of Kirkuk and Mosul, the gateways to Iraq's richest oil fields, had been captured bloodlessly. In the last major engagement of the war, the Marines occupied Tikrit, Saddam's hometown.

Before Baghdad was more or less subdued, the Fao peninsula, Umm Kasr, Basra, Najaf and Karbala capitulated to American and British armoured columns. But in what seemed like a replay of the war in Afghanistan, when Osama bin Laden and his core associates disappeared into a black hole, Iraq's leadership was still at large, despite the coalition's best efforts to kill or track them down. The failure to bring them to justice is troubling and exasperating. But they will be found, dead or alive.

Saddam's downfall will have seismic consequences, and may be as pivotal as the dissolution of the Ottoman empire, which gave birth to Iraq, Syria and the British mandate in Palestine. It is certainly as important as the sudden collapse of Egypt's and Iraq's monarchies in 1952 and 1958, respectively.

For the majority of Arabs, still reeling from shock, disbelief and dismay, the monumentality of it all harkens back to the 1967 Six Day War, when Israel stormed into the Sinai Peninsula, the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, forever altering the politics of a turbulent region.

But as humiliated as Arabs feel by the imposition of a Pax Americana in Iraq, the long-suffering Iraqi people could well be the chief beneficiaries of Saddam's demise. Iraq, a template of Arab totalitarianism, stands on the cusp of a rendezvous with democracy. If the experiment succeeds, as it did in Japan and Germany after World War II, Iraq might well serve as a model of constructive change in the Arab world. In the worst-case scenario, the allied invasion could inspire a regressive reaction of anti-Western nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism and usher in a wave of instability.

Should democracy, or a variant thereof, take root in Iraq, the shock waves could spill into Syria, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iran and the Palestinian Authority. These authoritarian governments, some of which have been pampered by the United States, will inevitably come under irresistible pressure, from within and without, to institute far-reaching reforms. Bashar Assad of Syria, the last remaining Baathist ruler, will in particular feel the heat. So will Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian leader who has agreed to share power with a newly appointed prime minister, Mahmud Abbas (Abu Mazen).

The neutralization of Iraq as a rejectionist Arab state that challenged Israel's legitimacy is a landmark in the annals of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Formerly regarded as the only Arab nation capable of standing up to Israel, Iraq has been removed from the strategic equation. The once-vaunted eastern front, composed of Iraq and Syria, has slipped into the twilight of history, much like the military threat Egypt posed to Israel before the 1979 peace treaty.

The chilling effect of Saddam's departure may yet be felt in southern Lebanon, where Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, faces Israel in a tense standoff. Having watched developments in Iraq with a sense of foreboding, Assad and the mullahs in Tehran may think twice before unleashing Hezbollah.

The dynamics of the new situation in the Middle East, with all its hopes and uncertainties, could have a profound impact on a resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute. If only as a sop to Arab sensibilities, the United States will likely step up its efforts to settle the problem on the basis of a two-state solution, which eluded negotiators during the contentious and now-defunct Oslo process.

The "road map" to peace, a joint venture of the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia, will be officially published when Abu Mazen forms a government. Ariel Sharon, Israel's prime minister, is none too keen to withdraw to the 1967 borders, even in exchange for peace and security. But if the Palestinian side drops its insistence on the "right of return" and sincerely accepts Israeli statehood, Israel will have no alternative but to settle with the Palestinians. Certainly, most Israelis will heave a sigh of great relief if a fair agreement with their Palestinian neighbours is possible.

For the Kurds, the largest minority group in the Middle East bereft of a state, the war in Iraq may be the harbinger of better days ahead. Thanks to the 1991 Gulf War, they already control a Kurdish autonomous area in northern Iraq. The question is whether Washington, with Turkey's acquiescence, will countenance its continued existence. For now, the Kurds will not press for full-blown sovereignty.

U.S. Marines topple a statue of Saddam Hussein in central Baghdad.

Turkey, the sole Muslim member of the north Atlantic alliance, could have been a spoiler had the allies not defeated Iraq so handily. The much-discussed northern front the United States had counted on to encircle Iraq fizzled after Turkish parliamentarians rejected the entry of 62,000 U.S. troops into Turkey. But in a concession announced on April 2, some two weeks into hostilities, Turkey allowed the United States to use its territory for overflights and resupply efforts.

By that point, after a fairly rocky start, the war was going reasonably well for the coalition. The pyrotechnics of the early "shock and awe" phase, during which Baghdad was pounded mercilessly in a bid to induce surrender, were quite impressive. But shock and awe gave way to a series of startling setbacks that had armchair generals darkly warning of a Vietnam-style quagmire.

As the allies bypassed cities to minimize civilian casualties, Saddam's fedayeen attacked lengthy supply lines stretching out thinly from Basra to Baghdad and ambushed a convoy in Nasiriyah. Sandstorms added to the misery, as did a string of "friendly fire" incidents, an unsuccessful Apache helicopter assault on the Medina division of the Republican Guards and two suicide bombings.

There was hand-wringing speculation that the coalition had failed to commit sufficient divisions to the battle and that Saddam's regime would not, as U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney had forecast, fold like "a house of cards." Yet after a pause, during which the ferocity of American air strikes never ceased, the allied juggernaut thrust forward and demolished the Iraqis, a Third World force confronting a superpower. The allies were destined to win by virtue of their vastly superior equipment, their mastery of command-and-control techniques, their unrivalled domination of Iraqi skies, their better training and iron discipline and their flexibility.

Deployed in static defensive positions, Iraq never used its air force to fend off attacks. Due to strong warnings from U.S. Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld, Iraq refrained from using chemical or biological weapons (which have yet to be found). And American special forces prevented Iraq from blowing up dams that could have slowed the allies' advance and from setting fire to all but several oil wells. The United States also crushed an Ansar al-Islam redoubt near the Iranian border.

There were a few surprises. Iraq did not attack Israel, as in the 1991 war. Perhaps Saddam lost that capability after American, British and Australian soldiers captured airfields and severed bridges in western Iraq.

Neither was there a general uprising. Ordinary Iraqis were afraid to rise up until they were sure Saddam had been vanquished. In 1991, the United States had urged them to revolt, only to withdraw its support once the rebellion had begun. The consequences were fearsome, and Iraqis had no wish to fall into that trap again.

With Saddam now a relic of the ugly past, Washington has been presented with a rare opportunity to win hearts and minds and bring order, stability and democracy to Iraq. But the United States should not remain in Iraq a day longer than necessary. In 1982, Lebanese Shiites greeted Israeli soldiers with rice and rosewater. By the mid 1980s, the Shiites were Israel's enemies and Hezbollah, a Shiite movement, had morphed into a potent force.

For weeks, the kindergarten children have been slaves living in the time of Moses and Pharaoh. As they learn about Pesach, their classrooms are transformed with pictures, pyramids, and holiday books. They clean the classroom to "make Pesach" and bring a Passover food item to donate to the needy. The junior kindergartens present a Model Seder to parents and grandparents, and the senior kindergartens have their own Seder, and read the Haggadah. Senior kindergarten and Grade 1 children go to a matza factory to bake their own matzot. At the family Seder, our children know the four questions and even some answers.

Web site lists variety of made-in-Israel products

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As far as Web sites go, www.israeliconsumerproducts.com is about as simple as you can get. No Flash, no fancy jpegs, no whiz-bangery to speak of.

Just a single page containing a simple form with two empty fields and a pull-down menu.

Simple on the surface, but remarkable for the service it provides.

If you're looking for a "made-in-Israel" product available near you, but you don't know which retailer carries it, you can find it on www.israeliconsumerproducts.com with a few taps on your keyboard.

Visitors can enter their city of residence in one of the fields and choose a product from a list of 27 possible categories in the pull-down menu. Alternatively, you can enter a brand name in the other empty field. From there, the site's search engine takes over, scanning a database of 3,000 stores in more than 100 communities before it coughs up a local retailer where you can buy the product.

Looking for Israeli cosmetics in Saskatoon? Try Spa Ahava on Broadway Avenue. Need linens, draperies and fabrics in Winnipeg? Try the Revelle store near you. How about bathroom accessories in Toronto? Try Rona, Wal Mart and Zellers stores and look for the Accent, Keter, Keterware, Lipski and Outstanding Solutions brands.

"It's just remarkable what you can buy and where," says Walter Seaton, a retired engineer who conceived of the Web site and paid for it out of his own pocket.

If you live in Toronto or Montreal, you can expect to find made-in-Israel products, he said. But Israeli linens have found their way to Whitehorse, Yukon, and you can even find Israeli goods in Carrot River, a tiny community in the northeast corner of Saskatchewan near the Manitoba border.

Purchasing Israeli products is a tangible way for Canadian Jews and others to support Israel. "The current economic situation is unacceptable and anything of this nature is very helpful," Seaton said.

"I am a very ardent Zionist. Israel is very important to me and I have a fairly large family and relatives living there," he said. "I feel Israel is vital to the existence of Judaism."

Israeliconsumerproducts.com has been about 18 months in the making. Back in the early, seed stage, Seaton considered placing newspaper ads to inform the public about available Israeli products. But that proved pricey and he found his information was incomplete. He determined that a constantly updated Web site would be the best, and most comprehensive, way to keep the public informed.

During a visit to Israel, he solicited the support of the Israeli Export Institute and later, the Israel-America Chamber of Commerce. With these heavyweights behind him, he approached Israeli importers for their support, finding good, but not complete, co-operation.

Nevertheless, the database owes much of its thoroughness to the information provided by suppliers, who are best placed to enumerate all the retailers carrying Israeli-make products, Seaton said.

Importers can also access the database and make changes – adding new products and deleting discontinued ones – keeping the site as up-to-date as possible.

Besides the traditional Judaica, books and foods, you can find such things as fresh flowers, garden equipment, sheds, plumbing and shelving. Canadian Tire, Costco, Home Depot and Rona are among the retailers carrying Israeli merchandise, Seaton said.

Launched only a few weeks ago, it's too early to tell whether the site will be successful. If it records few hits (visits), Seaton said he'll shut it down. But if it takes off, expansion to the United States may be next and from there, perhaps to other countries in the English-speaking world.

Historian draws parallels between Iraq and Europe in the 1930s

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

There is a certain timelessness to a Bernard Lewis lecture.

Although the Princeton University professor emeritus is usually described as one of the world's leading experts in medieval Islamic history, he is just as likely to discuss quotes from biblical Hebrew writings, debate an esoteric point from an ancient Greek text, tell a 13th-century joke or draw an analogy from modern Arabic poetry to emphasize a point he's making about the current war in Iraq.

Lewis, 86, a British-born Jew known for his prolific writings on Islamic history, recently delivered the Barbara Frum lecture at the University of Toronto's Massey College. In an informal question-and-answer session the next day, he drew parallels between Europe of the 1930s – a time he remembers vividly – to Iraq of today.

Bernard Lewis

"Adolf Hitler came into power in Germany with certain grievances, many of which were well grounded... However, Hitler then proceeded to defy the League of Nations again and again," Lewis said.

Hitler "remilitarized the Rhineland and nothing was done. He annexed Austria and nothing was done. He annexed Czechoslovakia, occupied and took it over and nothing was done. By the time he invaded Poland, a clear unequivocal act of aggression, the League of Nations was rendered completely useless," Lewis said.

The University of London-educated scholar then pointed out the dangers the West might have faced if the U.S.-led coalition had not gone to war against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

"If the West had done nothing [in the 1940s]... if they had left it to the League of Nations – or the United Nations in the present time – it is not difficult to imagine what would have happened.

"If the peace movement had prevailed then, Hitler would have won the war and the Nazis would be ruling the world," Lewis said.

The historian also pointed out that the political order and anti-Semitism that exists in Iraq and Syria today has its roots in Nazism and not in Arab or Islamic culture.

During World War II, Syrian and Lebanese territory was controlled by the Vichy government in France and became a base for Nazism. The Ba'ath Party, which now rules Syria and Iraq, was formed in Syria at that time and was modeled on the ideology, structure and methodology of the Nazi Party, Lewis said.

"Other European models were tried, but none of them worked. This one really did work, but it maintained itself through the use of brute force," Lewis said.

Later, "when the Soviets replaced the Third Reich as the patron and protector of anti-Western interests, the necessary adjustments from the Nazi to the Communist model were few and simple."

Lewis, whose most recent book, The Crisis of Islam, was released earlier this year, noted that the Middle East today has also absorbed European and Nazi style anti-Semitism.

While it is perfectly legitimate to criticize policies and actions of a state [Israel] or the doctrines of an ideology [Zionism] without necessarily being inspired by anti-Semitism, Lewis said, the Islamic historical dislike of "the other amongst them" never had the "theological quality that prevails in European anti-Semitism."

He said there is a distinction between people who are "anti-American because they see America as the patron of Israel and those who are anti-Israel because they see Israel as the puppet of America."

Lewis said he believes that the current point in time has incredible potential.

"There is a great yearning for freedom in Iraq, but the people are understandably cautious.

"They look at the world and remember what happened in 1991 when they came out in great numbers all over the country" to greet the Americans. Later, tens of thousands were ruthlessly slaughtered by Saddam's forces – many with chemical weapons – while the Western world did nothing and the United Nations just watched, he said.

"This might explain why today there is a certain lack of enthusiasm greeting liberators. The Iraqi people want to be sure they won't be abandoned this time," Lewis said.

Other Mideast countries, such as Egypt and Jordan, are much further ahead on the democratic time line than Iraq and Syria, he said. Egypt and Jordan may not be democracies in any real sense, but "they're a long way from the ruthless, oppressive regimes of Syria and Iraq."

Iran, on the other hand, has "Christianized Islam," Lewis said. It has adopted the notion of heresy and has held a sort of Inquisition, and it has created a functional equivalent to the Pope, as well as a college of cardinals and a bench of bishops.

"In the not too distant future, we hope they will also have a reformation," he said.

As to whether it is possible to establish a democracy in Iraq given the prevalence of authoritarian governments in the area, Lewis said wryly: "In Europe and the United States, people are afraid that it won't be possible. In the Middle East, there is a different fear – that it will be possible."

Walk WITH Israel

It's Time to Tell the World

Sunday, May 25

Coronation Park at 9:15 a.m.

On Sunday, May 25, we're sending a message to the world about our community's extraordinary support for Israel at a time of continuing turmoil. Join the UJA Federation Walk with Israel on May 25 and tell the world how much you care about our Jewish State.

Your presence at the Walk will mean the world to the people of Israel who are suffering from the after-effects of terror attacks, a deteriorating economy and weakened social services.

Rain or shine, this year's Walk with Israel begins with registration at 9:15 a.m. at Coronation Park (across from the CNE's Prince's Gates at the corner of Lakeshore & Strachan). The Walk, starting at 10:30 a.m. will then wind through the streets of historic downtown Toronto before wrapping up at The National Trade Centre for the exciting RioCan Festival.

"We invite you to join the Walk with Israel, the world's largest solidarity walk on Israel's behalf," says Chair David Peltz, who is sharing his duties with Dodi Weill. "Close to 25,000 men, women, and children participated last year, making it the most successful ever. This year's Walk will be even more meaningful, considering the uncertain world we, as Jews, are living in."

"Now is the time to express your pride in Israel when hatred for Israel is growing in many countries and on many campuses," adds Weill. "After all, what will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?"

Sponsorship proceeds from this year's Walk will assist Israel's victims of terror and other vulnerable Israelis. You can become a sponsored walker by collecting contributions online at www.jewishtoronto.net and click the Walk with Israel button.

For more information or a Sponsorship Kit, please call the Walk Hotline 416.631.5736 or visit our website. If you'd like to join our Walk with Israel Volunteer Team, call the Walk Hotline.

Holocaust survivor testified at Zundel trial

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Dennis Urstein was a fastidious man, always impeccably groomed, a man who stood ramrod straight and was a straight arrow when it came to the principles he lived by. A Holocaust survivor, he was one of the very few prisoners who served as a sonderkommando in Auschwitz-Birkenau and lived to tell the tale – with the meticulous precision he displayed in other aspects of his life.

Obituary

A native of Vienna, Urstein died recently of a heart attack after battling a series of illnesses. He was 79.

Until illness slowed him down in the last year or so, Urstein was one of the survivor community's most energetic and riveting speakers, busily visiting schools, speaking at memorial events and testifying at numerous trials in Germany, describing the awful events of his youth.

In the 1970s and '80s he often flew to Germany to testify at war crimes trials of former SS personnel. In 1985, he was one of several Holocaust survivors who testified at the trial of neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel, enduring the sneering cross-examination of defence lawyer Doug Christie.

Bernie Farber, executive-director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, remembers how well Urstein stood up to the questioning.

"At a time when no one knew how ugly Doug Christie could be in cross-examination, Dennis Urstein stood up to him with tenacity," he recalled. "It gave a lot of survivors heart to see him stand up to him."

Urstein's experiences gave him a unique perspective on the events of that time.

As a young inmate, he was on one occasion ordered to repair the roof on the gas chamber building where he witnessed the killing process. On another occasion, he was seconded to the sonderkommando, the work detail that was given the gruesome job of removing the intertwined bodies of Jews from the gas chambers and carting them away for incineration.

Dennis Urstein

His daughter, Marilyn Barlow, recalls the stories her father would tell, how he was given grappling hooks to separate the bodies and how the bodies were thrown in pits and burned.

When he returned to the barracks that evening, "all the fellow prisoners were shocked to see them. They looked like ghosts."

To get him through those horrific times, her father thought of his grandfather and those images gave him strength, Barlow said. "He loved his grandfather and was close to him."

Her father described him as an old country gentleman – a gutte neshama (good soul) – with a bottomless supply of sweets. "He always thought of him at the brink and he believed that's what saved him."

Her father's parents, unfortunately, did not survive the war. Sensing the trouble ahead, in 1939 they escaped to Belgium. Dennis was deported in 1940 to the concentration camp at Molines and in September 1942 to Auschwitz.

While working in his job sorting the belongings of incoming prisoners, he saw his parents arrive on a transport in April 1943 and sent immediately to the gas chambers. "He couldn't do a thing. That must have been horrific," Barlow said.

Urstein remained at Auschwitz until the camp's final days, when he and other inmates were forced to march to concentration camps in Germany. He ended up in Dachau and was liberated in April 1945 when he weighed 72 lbs.

After he got his strength back, Urstein joined a clandestine group of survivors that went in search of Nazi perpetrators.

Later in Salzburg, Urstein met Claire Kimerling and a few months later they were married. Marilyn was born in Austria and soon after the family moved to England and then to Canada in 1951.

Her father worked as director of packaging for Shopsy's for 25 years and then for a Loblaw subsidiary for another 10.

Barlow remembers her father as an opinionated and stubborn man, one who was fiercely independent and who knew right from wrong.

Urstein is survived by his wife Claire, daughter Marilyn and son-in-law Ron Barlow, granddaughter Eliza and Avy Kattsir, great-grandchildren Joshua and Rebecca and sister Lily and Leon Schmetterling in Stuttgart, Germany.

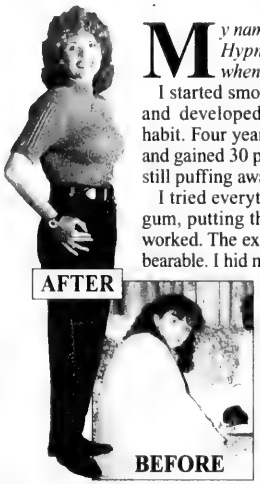
HAPPY PASSOVER TO ALL MY CLIENTS, RELATIVES & FRIENDS

"I kicked a 31-year smoking habit and lost 23 pounds!"



My name is Deborah Crews. Hypnosis worked for me when all else failed.

I started smoking when I was 16 and developed a two-pack-a-day habit. Four years ago I tried to quit and gained 30 pounds. I was fat and still puffing away.

I tried everything: the patch, the gum, putting them down. Nothing worked. The excess weight was unbearable. I hid my body under baggy clothes.

A day after my second session I lit a cigarette, took a few drags and threw it out. It didn't taste good. It stunk.

I haven't smoked since. No cravings. Zero withdrawals.

Hypnosis made weight loss easy. I didn't diet. Never felt deprived. I didn't even know it was happening. My dress size plunged from a 14 to a sexy size 8. I lost 23 pounds.

My self-esteem is at an all time high. I look in the mirror and love what I see. Positive Changes Hypnosis deserves 100% of the credit.

I finally rid myself of the old habits that devastated my health for years. You can do it too. Pick up the phone and call Positive Changes Hypnosis.

Sincerely,
Deborah Crews

P.S.: My husband and I will soon take a romantic adventure to Cancun with the money I saved on cigarettes and junk food.

Why Hypnosis succeeds where other methods fail

- Fad diets often cheat your body of its nutritional needs. Even some of the so-called "natural" herbal cocktails can have harmful side effects on some people. None of them teach you to change the habits that caused you to put on the weight in the first place.
- Positive Changes Hypnosis programs correct habits into the subconscious, where habitual behaviour comes from. It corrects a myriad of behavioural problems without popping a single pill, counting calories, or depriving yourself of the food you enjoy.

OUR NO-RISK GUARANTEE
Your success is our top priority. If at your first program session you are not satisfied for any reason, we will refund 100% of your money before you leave the building. No questions asked. YOU RISK NOTHING.

WE-STAY-WITH-IT GUARANTEE
We evaluate your needs, then determine a fee. Once the fee is paid there are ABSOLUTELY NO MORE CHARGES, regardless of how many sessions you may need to attain your desired results. We stay with it until you're happy!

SARS upsets Passover plans

On March 28, families of patients and residents were told they couldn't visit the centre. Two days later, companions paid by families to sit with or care for residents, along with anyone not providing direct care, were also barred. Volunteers, who provide many services at the facility, were banned as well.

Staff who interact directly with the residents must wear masks, gowns, gloves, and in some cases goggles. As well, everyone entering Baycrest has their temperature taken and must give assurances they are feeling well and have not been in contact with anyone who has the disease. And anyone who has been at Scarborough Grace or York Central hospitals or has travelled to China, Hong Kong, Vietnam, Singapore or Taiwan in the past 10 days has been asked not to come to Baycrest.

Some restrictions have been eased as part of what the centre said will be a gradual phase-out over the next few weeks: palliative care patients can now have one visitor at a time, and trained volunteer feeders have returned.

On April 15, the day before Erev Pesach, Jackson said, restrictions were to be eased further, allowing family members and companions to visit the home and hospital one at a time and for other volunteers to be called back.

As part of its precautions, Baycrest is not accepting new admissions to any part of the centre, and community services, day programs, day passes for residents and patients, as well as outpatient clinics, have all been cancelled.

As those and other restrictions continue, every effort is being made to maintain contact with residents' families, Jackson said, from calling them every day to tell them how residents are doing to wheeling a resident to a window to wave to her family and show she is all right.

"We did that so one resident could see her new great-grandchild. We helped another one make a tape that could be played at her great-grandson's bar mitzvah."

While some family members have reacted angrily to the Baycrest ban, "most recognized that it was necessary, and that this was legally mandated – that it wasn't Baycrest that made the decision," Jackson said.

Toronto is the North American epicentre of the disease, and Canada as a whole has the third highest number of cases in the world, after China and Hong Kong. As of April 13, Canada had 283 suspect or probable cases, including 232 in the GTA.

Thirteen Canadians have died from the disease, all in the Toronto area, including one elderly Jewish man.

All the Canadian cases can be traced to a 78-year-old Toronto woman, who was exposed to SARS Feb. 21 during a visit to Hong Kong. Mount Sinai Hospital's chief microbiologist Donald Low told United Press International.

In the absence of many volunteers and other program providers, Baycrest staff are being very creative in trying to beef up programming on the floors, Jackson said.

For instance, members of the Baycrest choir are "roaming around giving impromptu concerts, and anyone with musical ability is asked to join in."

Holocaust survivors present unique challenges for Jewish seniors facilities, Jackson noted.

"From the first day we realized that that would be an issue," she said, citing the effect of "masks, uniforms [what the gowns might look like to the residents], different routines, strange voices." When coupled with the fact residents can't see their families, the situation has led to agitation and terrifying flashbacks.

Many of the same issues have arisen at Mount Sinai hospital. While visitors, volunteers, non-essential staff and out-patients are not permitted in the hospital, staff involved in patient care, as well as emergency patients, relatives of critically ill patients and certain specific individuals have been allowed in after being screened. Some elective surgeries were expected to begin again this week, and plans are to start allowing students, volunteers and some family to return.

Researchers at the hospital have played a major role in the provincial response to SARS. Dr. Low has been extensively involved in researching and tracking the disease, even though he himself was in a 10-day quarantine for part of the outbreak.

Mount Sinai's early response to the situation, he said, began when the World Health Organization issued an alert March 12 about a new infectious disease. At the same time, director of infection control Alison McGeer received a call from Scarborough Grace Hospital about a cluster of patients with unusual respiratory symptoms that matched those in the WHO alert.

On March 27, the hospital, like all Toronto health institutions, was ordered by the Ministry of Health to institute serious precautions. This included requiring anyone dealing with patients to wear a mask, gown, gloves and eye protection.

SARS is sending a message to the health care community, Low said.

"We have to pay more attention to the possibility of this happening again. Even if we beat SARS, we have to recognize the chance of new viruses, and new strains of bacteria, not only appearing, but being spread through the world."

Fortunately, Low said, the progress of the disease appears to be slowing, but he urged continued adherence to isolation rules.

Precautions are even in place for those who work with the dead. Members of the Ontario Association of Cemeteries have been told by health officials that they are fairly certain the SARS virus within a body dies about three hours after death. (To compare, the AIDS virus is said to die after one hour.)

Accordingly, cemetery staff are not required to take any particular precautions. However, some are being taken. Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (Pardes Sholom), for instance, has instructed its staff to wear masks and gloves.

Jordan Benjamin, of Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, said the funeral home has been in daily contact with the Centre for Disease Control in Atlanta, the Ontario Ministry of Health and the coroner's office to get the most up-to-date information on the illness, and to see what precautions are necessary.

Although there are no government rules for funeral homes about SARS, Benjamin said, "we have our own increased precautions." When picking up a body, he said, Benjamin's staff put on gloves, masks and eye goggles before entering (normally they only use gloves). When leaving, these are removed and disposed of in a safe fashion. The same precautions are in place for anyone handling a body, or even entering and exiting a preparation room – even if there is no body there.

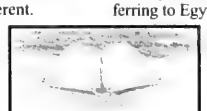
Jewish independence day

By RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL

Every country that has been able to achieve its freedom from an oppressive ruler will justifiably designate a day of rejoicing and reflection to mark its independence day. In this respect, the Jewish people are no different.



We were once slaves in Egypt and after 210 years of forced labour, we had our own Exodus. An eight-day holiday on the anniversary of this occasion is celebrated to signify the importance of the event of Exodus.

It would seem that after a lengthy holiday discussing the Exodus from Egypt, further talk of this miraculous event would be superfluous. However, in our daily prayers, we mention the Exodus numerous times. Even our holy objects, the tallit and tfillin, are associated with the Exodus, as it is said: "And it shall be a sign upon your arm and ornament between your eyes, for it is with a strong hand Hashem removed us from Egypt." (Exodus 13:16)

Why is it that we are constantly referring to Egypt and the miracles that occurred when we left? Isn't an annual remembrance on Passover enough?

To resolve this difficulty we must understand the meaning of true freedom, and how crucial this idea is to Judaism.

In Western civilization we are granted many freedoms, including speech, religion and travel. But the truth is that despite all these freedoms, we are not truly free. We are enslaved to a hedonistic culture that promotes all the destructive vices in the world.

Our tradition has come to fight against that. Our doctrine sees the material world as being a vehicle to achieve loftier goals, and not as an end unto itself.

True freedom comes when we can rise above the shackles of physicality, get in touch with our souls and learn how to nurture them.

This freedom took place during the Exodus from Egypt. God not only set us free physically, but he also granted us the Torah – a guide to living a spiritual life, free of this tumultuous world.

We need to repeat the events of the Exodus constantly to remember what true freedom is, lest God forbid we deify materialism.

Let us all use Pesach as a springboard so that every day we can remember our own independence day, and use it as a vehicle to come closer to God.

I would like to wish you and your family a chag kasher v'samayach.

Rabbi Karfunkel is head of the Forest Hill Jewish Centre in Toronto.

Remembering the righteous

The Righteous: The Unsung Heroes of the Holocaust*, by Martin Gilbert, Key Porter Books, $45, 2003.

Martin Gilbert is a renowned historian, biographer of Winston Churchill and student of the Holocaust. Over a 25-year period, he has compiled the stories of hundreds of Jewish survivors and the stories of many non-Jewish men and women who risked their lives to save them.

These accounts take the reader through Germany and every occupied country, from Norway to Greece, from the Atlantic to the Baltic, where small numbers of brave and humane men and women challenged Nazi barbarism by their life-saving actions.

The French citizens of Le Chambon sur Lignon stood up to the Vichy police, the German army, and the Gestapo and saved 5,000 Jews from destruction.

Demiter Peshev and the Bulgarian Orthodox Church and the Sobranie, the Bulgarian parliament, steadfastly defied the Nazis and refused to deport 50,000 Bulgarian Jews. Bishop Kiril wired King Boris warning that he would mount a campaign of civil disobedience and would himself lie down on the railroad tracks to prevent the trains from deporting Jews to death camps.

Italian diplomats, in defiance of Nazi orders, rescued tens of thousands of Jews in Croatia and southern France from the clutches of the Nazis, who sought their deportation and death.

Paul Gruninger, a Swiss police official, Aristides de Sousa Mendes, a Portuguese consul, and Sempo Sugihara, a Japanese consul stationed in Cracow – all three of whom defied the Nazis and their respective governments – lost their positions and were publicly humiliated for their acts of altruism. These three alone accounted for the rescue of 16,500 hunted and persecuted Jews.

How many rescuers or protectors of Jews were there in the German-occupied countries? Certainly too few, but their numbers reached into the thousands. It has been estimated that as many as 2,500 Poles were executed by the Nazis for their actions on behalf of Jews.

One must consider what has been called "the conspiracy of goodness." This means that for every family that hid Jews, there had to be knowledge and cooperation on the part of others, such as the grocer, the milkman and sometimes even the local policeman.

Given the dangers faced by every person who hid or sheltered a Jew, given the ever-present prospect of severe punishment, of execution and of the execution of one's whole family, the number of those for whom evidence of rescue has been ascertained is indeed high. By early 2000, a Yad Vashem committee in Jerusalem set up to commemorate those who risked their lives to save Jews had located 17,500 such people.

Every sensitive person is haunted by unanswerable questions: How would I measure up? Would I unlock the door? Would I take into my home this sick man, this pregnant woman, this frightened family – would I keep them for days, weeks, months, years, knowing that discovery of my act by the Nazi predators would mean the imprisonment, torture and death of my family? How do I buy food in my impoverished community? How do I call a doctor for someone who doesn't exist, or remove refuse or bury a body without detection, while outside the informer, bribed with vodka and cigarettes, looks on?

Rabbi Harold Schulweis has written: "The reiterated myth that the whole world wants us dead – always wanted us dead and will always want us dead – is pernicious and false. We are never so alone as when we act on that belief. There are friends out there and potential friends, friends to be cultivated. Remember the evil, but do not forget the good."

Favourite Passover things

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Cleaning and cooking and so many dishes

Out with the chametz, no pasta, no knishes

Fish that's gefilted, horseradish that stings

These are a few of our Passover things.

Today, a few of my favourite Passover online things.

For an excellent overview of the holiday, start off at the massive Virtual Jerusalem site [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/pesach/]. There's the VJ Haggadah, insights into freedom then and now, and a large area for kids. And the Orthodox Union site has an overview of holiday traditions, audio essays and an online copy of its 2003 Kosher for Passover Directory [http://www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/].

For something unconventional, I recommend Eliezer Segal's thought-provoking articles [http://makeashorterlink.com/?S6A226604] along with his hilarious "Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah" [http:// www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Uncle_Eli/Eli.html].

Not only do people clean their homes for Passover, but also they sell their chametz to a non-Jew so that they don't own any leavened products during the holiday. If your local synagogue doesn't provide this service, you can sell your chametz online. Fill out an online contract and e-mail it directly to a rabbi who will act as your agent in the sale [http://kosher4passover.com/chometz.htm].

Matzah and karpas and chopped up charoset

Shankbones and kiddush and Yiddish neuroses

Tante who kvetches and uncle who sings

These are a few of our Passover things.

If you want to prepare gefilte fish and karpas and charoset like Bubbie used to make, there's plenty of help online. Or you can try something a bit daring. The Jewish Food Recipe Archives has a huge Passover section with hundreds of suggestions [http://www.jewish-food.org/category.htm]. How about Creole Pot Roast Piquant with Russian Potato and Mushroom Croquettes topped off by Very Fudgy Brownies?

When you've had your fill of chicken, turkey and brisket, you may want to go meatless. Vegetarian Fat-free Passover Recipes will help you out with Seven-Vegetable Stew and Strawberry-Rhubarb Compote [http://euler.ecs.umass.edu/pass-veg/]. And at Beit Chatulim, you'll find recipes for Baked Eggs in Zucchini with Hollandaise Sauce, Banana Nut Matzoh Kugel and Not-Chicken Soup [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/pschrcpt.htm].

Motzi and maror and trouble with Pharaohs

Famines and locusts and slaves with wheelbarrows

Matzah balls floating and eggshell that clings

These are a few of our Passover things.

My favourite Passover kids' site is Nurit Reshef's From Pesach to Shavuot. (You will need a browser that can handle Java.) Reshef has created a "four-room" virtual playhouse. In the library, you can listen to stories in Hebrew and English, learn about the history of the holiday and click on an online Seder plate and create some silly holiday stories. When you get to the playroom, try out the holiday word search, complete the onscreen jigsaw puzzle. And don't forget to play (and win) Passover tic-tac-toe against the world's dumbest computer [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/pesach/pesachframes.html].

With Passover almost here, you might think it's too late to send greetings cards to friends and family around the world. Actually, you have more than enough time – if you send them via the Internet. The Jewish Theological Seminary offers nine postcards that you can personalize and e-mail to any address, free of charge [http://learn.jtsa.edu/postcard/passover.html]. I also like the cards at Greetz.com, which let you to attach tunes like Dayenu to them [http://www.greetz.com/pass over].

For more Passover Internet sites out there, check out Maven's links [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=125&T=1].

When the plagues strike

When the lice bite

When we're feeling sad

We simply remember our Passover things

And then we don't feel so bad.

Have a kosher and happy Pesach.

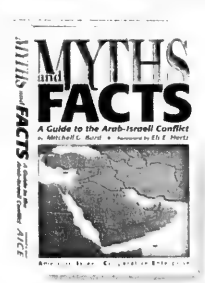
Despite rhetoric, Arabs have not helped refugees

MYTH:

The Arab states have provided most of the funds for helping the Palestinian refugees.

FACT:

Palestinian refugees have received millions of dollars through the Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA). Initially, the United States contributed $25 million and Israel nearly $3 million (US). The total Arab pledges amounted to approximately $600,000 (US). For the first 20 years, the United States provided more than two-thirds of the funds, while the Arab states contributed a tiny fraction. And Israel donated more funds to UNRWA than most Arab states. The Saudis did not match Israel's contribution until 1973; Kuwait and Libya, not until 1980. As recently as 1994, Israel gave more to UNRWA than all Arab countries except Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Morocco.



The United States is still by far the organization's largest contributor. In 2000, it donated nearly $90 million, approximately 31 per cent of the organization's $293 million in receipts. Meanwhile, for all their rhetorical support for the Palestinians, the Arab states contributed only two per cent of the UNRWA budget.

After transferring responsibility for virtually the entire Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to the Palestinian Authority (PA), Israel no longer controlled any refugee camps and ceased contributing to UNRWA. Meanwhile, in addition to receiving annual funding from UNRWA for the refugees, the PA has received billions of dollars in international aid and yet has failed to build a single house to allow even one family to move out of a refugee camp into permanent housing.

Women's role in synagogue discussed at forum

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Philip Scheim used to have a reputation as a staunch traditionalist. That changed in 2000 when he instituted a series of changes at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, including the right for women to have aliyot and read from the Torah.

Recently he took part in the last of a series of "conversational debates" on the Changing Role of Women in Synagogue Ritual, held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and hosted by Rabbi Wayne Allen. Representing a more traditional point of view was Rabbi Robert Pilavin of Spring Valley, N.Y.'s Jewish Community Center.

Unlike many other situations, the changes at Beth David were not precipitated by any outcry from the congregation, said Rabbi Scheim. "It was my sense that this was something that would be helpful to create a measure of excitement, within halachic parameters...It wasn't my comfort level, but I felt it was right for the community."

Rabbi Scheim had noted a degree of apathy among some of the younger congregants, he said. It no longer made sense to him that a woman with a PhD in Hebrew could not be called to the Torah while a man "with fractured Hebrew" could. On a personal note, he added that while he was saying Kaddish for his father, he began to feel offended because the husbands of women observing yahrzeit for a parent – not the women themselves – were given an aliyah. "To me that was not right."

Rabbi Pilavin, an alumnus of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary and a board member of the Union for Traditional Judaism, began his career at a fully egalitarian congregation almost 20 years ago. It became very clear that egalitarianism was not for him, he said.

In New York's Rockland County, where Rabbi Pilavin has been based since 1987, there is no consistency in patterns of egalitarianism, he noted. "Some synagogues would allow women to count in the minyan which they could not lead, and some would allow women to lead the minyan in which they did not count."

In spite of "a background of high principles," he suspects expediency played a role in some of those decisions.

His own synagogue is one of the few remaining Conservative congregations that is totally traditional on women's issues, he said.

Allowing women to lead Kiddush was "a major, major thing," he said, adding that only three women have actually led Kiddush in the dozen years since that change was instituted, but "when all was said and done, they were happier [because of the change.]"

Rabbi Pilavin dodged Rabbi Allen's question about his congregants' reaction to what goes on in other Conservative synagogues, sharing what he called "a bit of an inside joke," noting that a rabbi tries to time his vacation for five minutes before women return from Women's League conventions. "That's where they compare notes and very often the seeds of dissatisfaction are sown."

On a more serious note, Rabbi Pilavin questioned the wisdom of "trying to impose a secular grid of normativity on a religious value system." He also wondered whether introducing change, even if it was halachically defensible, would "create a climate of expectation that cannot be fulfilled."

In Rabbi Scheim's experience, that has not been the case. He noted that Beth David does not have trouble getting a minyan (a catalyst for some synagogues to consider counting women as part of the minyan), but said he does "not mind occasionally being the bad guy for what I consider to be the good of the community. Anything can't go. There still have to be standards."

Although the changes he instituted have not caused a dramatic change in the life of the congregation (or in numbers joining or leaving the shul), Rabbi Scheim said it has been evident to him that women who are called to read from the Torah are connected in a way they haven't been before.

Rabbi Scheim minimized the influence of the Conservative movement's leadership on individual congregants. To the best of his knowledge, for example, the practice of women putting on tfillin has not entered the Toronto Conservative community. "People have a comfort level with their own synagogues," he said. "There is not a sense of wanting to make everything identical."

Yet in some cases, Rabbi Pilavin has found, "anything less than identicalness [is] an insult." In his congregation, and in the Orthodox world, there are many highly educated Jewish women, he noted.

He pointed out that according to the Mishnah, it was considered an indignity to bring a king to testify, yet some women consider the issue of women's exclusion as witnesses in Jewish law to be problematic.

"I've come to the conclusion that just as happiness is a choice, being insulted is a choice."

Where do Canadians fit in Conservative movement?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Traditional Conservative Judaism in Canada brings "added weight to the other plate on the balance scale," says the vice-chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS).

Rabbi Michael Greenbaum, who spoke at a recent festive evening honouring five Canadian rabbis, stressed the importance of Canadian Conservative Jewry to the perpetuation of the North American Jewish community.

Rabbi Greenbaum delivered the keynote address at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, when Toronto rabbis Wayne Allen, Martin Berman, Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Steven Saltzman, along with Rabbi Lionel Moses of Montreal were awarded honorary doctorates of divinity by JTS 25 years after their ordination from the seminary.

Although four of the five rabbis are American-born, well over 20 Canadians are currently studying at the New York seminary's five schools, said Rabbi Greenbaum.

JTS' Canadian alumni include Rabbi Harvey Meirovich, dean of the rabbinical school at the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies (the Jerusalem seminary affiliated with JTS) and Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, immediate past president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, noted Rabbi Greenbaum. He added that the four largest Conservative congregations in North America are located in Canada, and that Toronto's United Synagogue Day School is the largest Conservative day school in North America.

"What a wonderful partnership," he said. "You send us your best and brightest. We train them. We educate them. We send them back to you and other parts of the globe to turn people on to Judaism and Conservative Judaism, and to touch Jewish lives in every way they possibly can."

Canadian Jewry has distinguished itself by a strong commitment to traditionalism, said Rabbi Greenbaum. No other Jewish stream has struggled as much as the Conservative movement with the tension between tradition and modernity, he said.

"[But] more often than not you have to have both/and, not either/or," he said. The notion of balance, he stressed, is a distinguishing feature of Conservative Judaism.

Why is this year different from all other years?

For many Pesach shoppers, this year's Passover purchasing is different from all other years. This year, a second element has been added to the mix. In addition to seeking kosher for Passover products, more and more shoppers are looking for the made in Israel label as well.

Tourism in Israel is down over 70% since the beginning of the Palestinian wave of violence more than two years ago and it has shrunk even further since the Iraq war. More than 87,000 Israeli businesses have failed since 2001, spawning a desperate economy. Almost 34% of all Israeli families live below the poverty line.

Short of traveling to Israel, buying Israeli products on an on-going basis is one of the best ways to help. Every single Jewish consumer can make a significant difference. Especially at Passover.

In addition to world-class, award-winning Israeli wines, so many other Israeli fine foods are available to grace your holiday table: chocolate covered matza, exotic fruit juices, fruits and vegetables, soup, cookies, teas, spices, herbs, liqueurs, chocolates and specialty nuts. It's an excellent way to help Israel both financially and spiritually.

Kosher for Passover food products have come a long way since the days of only matza and chicken schmaltz. Passover is big business in North America and Israel needs a big share of this market.

"Our family has become big consumers of Israeli pickles," says Joyce Goldberg of Toronto. "The Israeli olives are excellent too. Both products will be on my seder table for sure!"

Buying Israeli products for Passover is like inviting Israel to your seder, according to Joe Fox, who chairs the BUY ISRAELI project — an initiative of the Israel Now consortium, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consul General of Israel. "Products from Israel help create a feeling of solidarity," he says.

Continuity Program Grants

Enriching Jewish Life

UJA Federation recently awarded over $130,000 in Continuity Program Grants to 27 visionary projects. The majority of the funds for the grants come from Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto endowments.

"I believe it's a reflection of Toronto's incredibly diverse and exciting Jewish community, that our continuity grants have been awarded to organizations and initiatives that run the gamut," says Glennie Lindenberg, who chairs the Action Committee on Jewish Continuity, which approved the grants. "UJA Federation represents all of Jewish Toronto and ever since these grants have been given out, a wonderful cross-section of our community has benefited."

Here's a sampling of the commitment and creativity of continuity grant recipients.

Aish HaTorah Aish Café

What could be better than relaxing in a laid-back café while discussing and learning everything you've ever wanted to know about Judaism? That's the philosophy behind the new Aish Café, the brainchild of Rabbi Dan Rand. The relaxed setting provides the ideal atmosphere for Jews interested in their heritage to learn about it and, at the same time, meet each other. "I've always known that people enjoy taking classes and learning, but the key was to offer shorter classes and more variety in topics," says Rabbi Rand. "At the Aish Café, we've combined a real easy-going, user-friendly learning style with a social and entertaining atmosphere."

Rabbi Dan Rand

Betar-Tagar Youth Movement Zionism and the Jewish People

Citing the worldwide resurgence of anti-Semitism, including anti-Israel rhetoric on Canadian campuses, Betar-Tagar's Itay Gadot knows the UJA Federation continuity grant will go to good use. "Our biggest challenge right now is to reach our unaffiliated Jewish students," says Gadot, Betar-Tagar's emissary from Israel. "We must educate them about the connection between Jews and Eretz Israel, and create a passion for the Jewish people and the Jewish State." Much of Betar-Tagar's educational philosophy revolves around bringing as much of Israel to Toronto as possible. "This grant allows us to bring in speakers from Israel to educate our students, and to offer the tastes, sounds, movies, and art of Israel, so that our students will form a bond that will last a lifetime," he adds.

Itay Gadot

National Council of Jewish Women JIFY (Jewish Independent Female Youth)

"JIFY is made up of young women in their teens who become fully integrated into the Jewish community through the many programs of National Council of Jewish Women [NCJW]," says Terry Winston, Executive Director of NCJW — Toronto Section. "They're such great kids who — while performing mitzvot — are also being mentored by volunteers to help them learn various initiatives and programs to make them proactive in the community."

Kolel – The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning Home for the Holiday Series

Often worried about which prayer to say, or what candle to light, younger and unaffiliated families are reticent to participate in Jewish holidays and activities because they lack familiarity and comfort with traditional Jewish practices. Falling under the "practice makes perfect" philosophy, the Home for the Holiday Series empowers participants to take home the lessons learned to create fun, engaging and enriching celebrations, without feeling intimidated. "The program allows Jews exploring affiliation, to learn about our holidays and make them relevant to their own lives," says Kolel's Rabbi Jordan Cohen.

Enriching Jewish Life

Continuity Program Grants recently awarded by UJA Federation to 27 ambitious projects cover the varied spectrum of Jewish life in Toronto — from Jewish learning to social opportunities and Israeli experiences. These grants will benefit senior citizens, teenagers, and children alike. Here are just a few.

"Let's Get Together" provides a monthly gathering for seniors.

UJA Federation Continuity Program Grants

- Downtown Jewish Community School
- Maon Noam
- Q-Jews
- Holy Blossom Temple
- Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning
- Jewish Centre for Learning & Living Awakenings
- Hillel of greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services)
- United Synagogue Youth, Eastern Canada Region
- Betar-Tagar Youth Movement
- Bathurst Jewish Community Centre*
- Jewish Information Service
- Jewish Alcoholics and Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others (JACS) and its Middle School Addiction Awareness Project
- National Council of Jewish Women
- Congregation Beth Israel Anshei Minsk
- Holocaust Centre of Toronto
- Aish HaTorah
- Hashomer Hatzair
- National Council of Jewish Women
- Anshei Keiver Synagogue
- Circle of Care

* Grant comes from campaign funds

Circle of Care Let's Get Together Group

Let's Get Together ensures just that, a much-needed monthly gathering for frail seniors with little or no family support and limited social motivation. The group provides the opportunity for members to socialize, discuss, enjoy entertainment, and celebrate Jewish holidays in a warm, caring atmosphere. Transportation and programming are provided, bringing participants to the Circle of Care offices where many hugs and smiles are shared. "This group of seniors shows us so much gratitude, and it's so nice for our staff to see some of the people we help," says Circle of Care's Arnold Foss. "This UJA grant will focus on the holidays, making sure that none of these lovely people are forced to celebrate alone."

Larry Sonenberg and Lisa Eisen receive the grant for Hillel from Glennie Lindenberg, left.

Hillel of Greater Toronto Canadian Jewish Law Students Association

A while ago, Jewish law students approached Hillel (formerly Jewish Campus Services) about the possibility of starting a Canadian Jewish Law Students Association to be based in Toronto. Their wish was generated by the growing anti-Israel sentiment on campus and the students' need for solidarity. "This grant for the Jewish Law Students, will enable them to participate in their national conference, as well as other important conferences," says Zac Kaye, Executive Director, Hillel of Greater Toronto. "These students make up an important constituency with which we want to build a connection. This is an important opportunity to involve them with our programming — particularly when it comes to Jewish advocacy on campus."

Daniel Roth

Hashomer Hatzair

This historic youth organization believes in youth leading youth.

"It's very much at the forefront of youth programs in Israel theses day — letting young people do as much as possible to develop more leadership skills," says Ora Merin, Israeli shlicha and educational director for Hashomer Hatzair.

Her organization is all about building leaders by instilling in them a strong sense of "all-things-Jewish."

According to Merin, the UJA continuity grant comes at a perfect time, a time when membership in her organization continues to grow at a fever pitch.

"We've always been popular in Toronto, but over the past 18 months we have had such an increase in youngsters coming aboard. In fact, we're about to launch a southern branch by opening a new location inside the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. We've very excited."

Jewish Centre for Learning & Living Awakenings

"With this UJA funding, our pre-teens and teenagers will have the chance to relate to, and preserve, core Jewish values in the face of an increasingly homogeneous society," says the Centre's John Sherrington. This ambitious youth-oriented Jewish revival program — aimed at 11-14 year-olds — consists mainly of innovative and interactive study programs, allowing participants to discuss and learn important aspects of Judaism. "It's particularly important for them at a time when their Jewish consciousness is being raised through the lifecycle celebrations of Bar and Bat Mitzvah," adds Sherrington.

Brian Stewart lives up to CBC's journalistic ideals

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Brian Stewart's feature, "Question of War" (The National, April 3) is a reminder of the high quality journalism for which he, along with others at the CBC, including Joe Schlesinger, Patrick Brown and Anna Maria Tremonti, is well-known and respected.

This column has, from time to time, pointed out areas in which the CBC has strayed from its commitment to fair, impartial reporting and analysis (an exception is made for dedicated commentators like Rex Murphy). So it must also acknowledge those reports that reflect the CBC's commitment to being a trusted source of news.

In his story, Stewart, a senior correspondent for CBC TV News, dealt with the intense ethical debate about whether the war in Iraq is a "just war."

This is a heady and deeply philosophical subject. What stood out was the absolute seriousness and intelligent fair-mindedness that Stewart brought to the discussion. He did not choose to interview subjects with extreme voices, as journalists sometimes do when they want to inject sensationalism into an already hot topic, or worse, when they want a report to reflect their own opinions by directing more attention to one viewpoint. Rather, Stewart featured, in equal measure, two of the leading intellectual figures at the heart of reasoned debate today: Michael Walzer and Michael Ignatieff.

Walzer is an American political philosopher who has written extensively on the subject of just war. Toronto native Ignatieff is a historian, writer and broadcaster with an appreciation of the philosophical (as one would expect from the biographer of Isaiah Berlin).

The fact that Walzer and Ignatieff both happen to be liberals, a status disdained both by those on the far left (e.g., MIT linguist and political commentator Noam Chomsky) and those on the far right (e.g., U.S. commentator Patrick Buchanan) did not detract in the least from the interest and vigour viewers could find in the discussion.

Ignatieff and Walzer both opposed the Vietnam War as unjust. They are divided, however, on the war in Iraq.

Walzer believes that Saddam Hussein's "incredibly brutal regime" might have been contained by the United Nations and, therefore, did not justify full-scale war. Ignatieff argues that Saddam's despotism, combined with his acquisition of weapons of mass destruction and his threat to use them against Israel and his Arab and Muslim neighbours, justified the U.S.-led war.

What comes across in the interviews, emerging from Stewart's deeply probing questions, is just how conflicted – how humanely conflicted – Walzer and Ignatieff are. The question of war is too often rife with complex moral issues for which simplistic certainties are insults.

One cannot watch Stewart's treatment of the issue and fail to say, "Yes, yes, that's the way all good, serious journalists should treat complicated subjects."

Let this be a model for others at the CBC.

Once the fighting in Iraq reaches a resolution, more or less, and as the "road map" for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations becomes a topic of discussion, let us hope that other CBC reporters will follow Stewart's lead. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a complex subject that deserves to be reported in the deeply respectful and serious manner that Stewart has shown, avoiding simplistic "David vs. Goliath" stereotypes.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2004

ISRAEL AND THE JEWISH WORLD IN CRISIS

WHAT WILL TOMORROW HOLD IF WE DON'T ACT TODAY?

UJA FEDERATION

Together We're Stronger

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2004

A DEEPENING CRISIS

UJA Federation Campaign 2004 is an urgent call to action as the crisis gripping Israel deepens and as hateful anti-Israel sentiment - blatantly tinged with anti-Semitism - spreads around the world.

ISRAEL AND THE JEWISH WORLD IN CRISIS

Help us confront these disturbing realities:

- Terror attacks over the past two and a half years have wounded nearly 5,000 Israelis. Many of them are injured for life and require long-term care.
- Last year was the worst for Israel's economy since 1953. Israel's unemployment rate this year could exceed 12%.
- Almost 34% of all Israeli families live below the poverty line and over 40% of them are recent immigrants.
- The Iraq War's first five days alone cost Israel the equivalent of $500 million Canadian.
- In order to keep the economy on course, the government of Israel has proposed drastic budget cuts of nearly $5 billion Canadian, which will eliminate thousands of jobs and sever or reduce services for many Israelis who need them most.
- Violent anti-Israel demonstrations are taking place in virtually every corner of the globe.
- Anti-Semitic incidents in Canada rose significantly last year and violent hate crimes in France quadrupled in 2002.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2004

OUR RESPONSE

THE GLOBAL JEWISH ACTION PLAN

With dangerously unsettling developments facing Israel and the Jewish world, UJA Federation Campaign 2004, in conjunction with global Jewish communities, will provide funding for the following priority areas:

✡ Financial assistance for victims of terror and increased support for Israel's deteriorating social service infrastructure

- Campaign 2004 will help to provide trauma centres and services for Israel's most vulnerable and financial assistance for young people whose parents died in terror attacks.

✡ Expanded missions

- We will continue to support the people of Israel emotionally. Our dramatically expanded Missions program will bring at least another 1,000 mission participants to Israel - over and above the record 1,800 who have already experienced UJA Federation missions during these past two years of turmoil.

✡ Resources to counter a worldwide wave of anti-Israel hatred and anti-Semitism

- Through the new Israel Emergency Cabinet, Campaign 2004 contributions will help to forcefully counter virulent anti-Israel rhetoric and influence non-Jewish community leaders.

✡ Empower a new generation of Jews to proudly and forcefully meet these new challenges

- UJA Federation will be investing heavily in training programs for college and university students to defend Israel. We will also help to send Jewish young people on powerful Israel experience programs, with life-long impact, such as birthright israel.

What will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?

Striving for freedom

The celebration of Passover this year coincides with the 60th anniversary of the Jewish uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto. We know that even in the depths of that darkness, Jews in the ghetto held seders and observed Passover as best they could. This year at our seders, we should take a moment to reflect on the courage, heroism and tenacity of our brothers and sisters who fought in the ghetto revolt. To do so, in fact, is to acknowledge the meaningful nexus between the Exodus we celebrate annually at Pesach and the 1943 uprising, that no matter how formidable the obstacles, no matter how high the odds, human beings will strive for freedom over tyranny.

The Haggadah impels us to imagine the liberation from Egypt as a personal narrative, and as Jews in Canada, we take this commandment seriously. We cherish our freedom, both political and spiritual. We also clearly understand that our ancestors were delivered from Egypt not simply to be freed from the yoke of oppression, but to receive the divine law and a powerful moral and ethical set of guidelines that lie at the core of our way of life to this day. As such, we strive to protect and enhance the legal and statutory frameworks that promote civil society and safeguard our status as a minority community in a nation of communities. The further admonition from the Pesach story that "we were strangers in Egypt" underpins our efforts to promote social justice, equality and social cohesion in Canadian life for all Canadians.

For readily apparent reasons, these messages resonate even more clearly today. Israel faces a daily existential struggle against the tyranny of terror and the oppressive weight of Arab rejectionism. Against these implacable foes, it fights courageously. We must all re-commit ourselves to visiting Israel, the truest and most meaningful demonstration of our support and solidarity. Elsewhere in the region, the United States, Britain and other coalition members are engaged in toppling another tyrant who menaces the international community with modern plagues and ruthlessly deprives his own people of freedom and basic human rights. We pray for the safety of the allied forces and that of the long-suffering Iraqi people and the swift, successful resolution of the coalition's campaign.

Here at home, the messages of civil discourse and respect for the law seem to increasingly fall on deaf ears, a trend we ignore at our peril. We must redouble our efforts to entrench the policy of zero tolerance for racism, anti-Semitism and hate speech in our society. At the same time, we must promote the proposition that while political views, even those held passionately, can be freely expressed, such discourse must always be conducted in ways compatible with the basic Canadian values of civility, respect for diversity, social harmony and the rule of law. Universities in particular, which are marketplaces of ideas, cannot selectively limit freedom of expression or be manipulated by purveyors of hate and intolerance.

From my perspective, the key to promoting the values and messages of Passover in today's world is for all of us to act together, for everyone in the community to contribute time and energy and commitment to the best of his or her ability.

We well know the central place of the Exodus in Jewish history, as it was the pivotal experience of the liberation that set the stage for Jewish peoplehood and nationhood. Clearly, our people was redeemed from the "house of bondage" to serve a higher purpose. Pesach is a time for questions. This year, as we gather around the seder table, we ought to ask what that purpose might be and how we can contribute to making the world a better place for all.

I wish you and your family a chag kasher v'samayach.

West Bank yeshiva blends spiritual, secular

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The ability to blend a passionate, deepened commitment to Jewish tradition while at the same time embracing the world at large is a unique aspect of the Yeshivat Bat Ayin in Gush Etzion in the West Bank, says one of its teachers.

Many young Jews seeking to connect to their roots feel they must reject the values of the world they live in, Rabbi Yehoshua Kahan said in an interview.

Jews do not have to choose between the secular world and their desire to make a commitment to Jewish tradition "in its fullness, with all its details," he said.

Rabbi Kahan, who was recently in Hamilton and Toronto to recruit students, fundraise and raise the yeshiva's profile, said Bat Ayin Yeshiva, established in 1996 in the Gush Etzion community of Bat Ayin, has about 35 students, mostly from the United States and Canada.

Most are "working people who are motivated to make changes and re-evaluate what they are doing with their lives… We provide them with the materials," he said.

Often described as a contemporary chassidic yeshiva, Yeshivat Bat Ayin combines the spiritual depth of the chassidic tradition, the intellectual approach and textual focus of a traditional yeshiva and the openness of modern society.

The yeshiva embraces the chassidic vision, yet is not a closed, cloistered community, Rabbi Kahan said.

Rabbi Kahan said most students come from two distinct backgrounds. There are those who come from a traditional Orthodox upbringing and are looking for spiritual awareness, and there are those who feel "joy and lightness" but lack training in classic Jewish learning.

Both types of students benefit from interacting with one another, he said.

The yeshiva, located about 20 miles south of Jerusalem in a quiet, rural area, has a program for beginners, a beit midrash program for those with some background in classic Jewish learning, and a smichah (rabbinic) ordination program. The yeshiva's first three rabbis will be graduating in a few months. A program for Hebrew-speaking students is in the process of being established, Rabbi Kahan said.

The yeshiva has also had a women's midreshet program that could be revitalized in the future, he said.

The yeshiva's Web site is www.batayin.org.

Israeli students visit Canadian campuses

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — As one of a group of three Israeli students visiting Canada, Amnon Shukrun was hoping his visit would influence views of the Middle East conflict. But after visits to the University of Ottawa and several days in Montreal and Halifax, he said his dream remained unrealized.

Everything, however, changed in Baker's Lounge at Carleton University, where mere hours after speaking at the U of O, Shukrun was wiping away tears as he addressed 100 predominantly Arab students, on a campus marred by anti-Israel protests.

The three Israelis, Shukrun, 35, Nimrod Aviad, 25, and Maya Raday, 27, are university students who visited eastern Canada (Montreal, Halifax, Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto) thanks to Israel @ Heart, a non-governmental organization that sends Israeli students to North America to bring a personal perspective of life in Israel. Shukrun, Aviad and Raday were one of 18 groups of three sent on two-week visits to Canada and the United States.

Israel @ Heart is funded by a New York philanthropist who wishes to remain anonymous. The visit in Canada was co-ordinated by the Canada-Israel Committee.

Shukrun told of his father's death on the Golan Heights during the Six Day War – a tragedy that left his widowed mother alone and pregnant with him.

"In my situation, I could easily hate everyone, but I refuse to do that," Shukrun told a crowd at Carleton that started with 20 mainly Jewish people, but quickly mushroomed to include many Arab students.

"I am an Israeli; I live in a democratic state. We in Israel choose our leaders," said Shukrun, an MBA student from the University of Haifa, adding that he was proud of his father. "We're here for peace, to show a different side to this conflict… Our leaders need to hear your voices."

Shukrun was speaking directly to the students manning a display across the room in Baker's Lounge, where Solidarity for Palestinian and Iraqi Children (SPIC) was showing graphic pictures of graves and playing Gaza Strip, a video depicting primarily building rubble and dead or injured children.

"I see pictures of fathers buried in their backyards," he said about the display, clearly visibly distraught. "Why? Why must fathers die, I ask. Why did my father need to die?" he said, taking a long pause to regain his composure after beginning to cry.

Prior to their talk, all three Israelis went over to the SPIC table to see their information, meet the students and shake their hands.

"Both Palestinians and Israelis… know they can keep their hearts hard, but that will not lead anywhere," Shukrun said. "There are two sides to every point [and] not having the other side comment is wrong," he added.

Raday described her childhood vacations on the beaches of the Sinai at Ras Burka. She said 50 families would go there twice a year, but in 1985 when she was 10 years old, an Egyptian soldier opened fire on a group of children, killing many of her friends on the sand dune where she had been playing prior to her family's departure for home.

"That's a hard thing to come to terms with," said the Tel Aviv University film student, still admitting that she has dreams of peace and knows there is hope, even though, she added, her life has been stained with tragedies from terrorist attacks.

Aviad explained his everyday life as a law student at the University of Haifa. He said he must choose daily whether to risk his life and ride the bus, which he usually does, only to be faced with the dilemma of strategically selecting a seat, based on when the last suicide bombing occurred and where the least threatening area is.

"We're just people. We're not politicians. We're trying to have a normal life, the same as many Palestinians," Aviad said.

After the Israelis spoke, Arab students challenged them on topics, such as the legitimacy of suicide bombings, the Palestinian territories, access to education, the future of Lebanon and the possible solution to the conflict in the region.

"I don't have to go to school to hate Jews. All I have to do is look out my window and see my home getting destroyed," screamed the most vocal student in the mainly peaceful crowd, who left abruptly after his statement.

Others, including Nasr Zommo, the student running the SPIC table, accused Israel of running an apartheid system, the reason, he said, suicide bombers exist.

By the end of the question period, the two sides had agreed to each other's legitimacy and right to exist. Finally, the crowd cheered, together condemning violence, and the majority agreed that dialogue is necessary for peace.

* * *

From Ottawa, the group travelled to Kingston and then to Toronto. Raday said she was surprised at the response of Jewish students to their presence.

"I wasn't expecting it, but I found that one of our goals is to strengthen the Jewish community and show that they are not alone."

In Kingston, she said, a Jewish girl approached her, and "she told me she never heard Israelis who came to speak like us. I've heard that in every town we speak in. People connect with people.

"A lot of non-Jews tell us it's heartwarming to hear us come with a message of peace."

Shukrun suggested the Israelis' low key, personal approach was having an impact. "I think it's kind of a surprise to them because we come and we take out the sting. People seem used to hot slogans regarding occupation and we come from the other door. We're Israelis with normal lives… I think it gives a different perspective, at a personal and peaceful level. That creates a civilized discussion."

Man must pay damages for withholding get 15 years

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – In what is being described as a precedent-setting decision, a Quebec judge has ordered a man to pay damages to his ex-wife for withholding a get, the Jewish religious divorce, for 15 years after their civil divorce.

Superior Court justice Israel Mass, arguing that the case does not intrude upon religious authority, set damages at $47,500 because the plaintiff has been restrained from remarrying according to the Jewish faith and having children.

The identities of the parties involved are under an indefinite publication ban that Mass imposed three years ago because of the "highly personal" evidence presented. The case has been before the courts since 1995.

In his written judgment, Mass says the defendant entered into a civil obligation, or contract, when he consented in writing to appear before rabbinical authorities in Montreal to obtain the get "immediately" upon the granting of a divorce decree on Oct. 23, 1980. The final divorce was granted under those conditions on Feb. 9, 1981.

However, the defendant did not appear before the bet din for 15 years and finally gave his ex-wife a get on Dec. 5, 1995. As a result, Mass concluded, he breached a civil obligation – the Consent to Corollary Relief – and his ex-wife could seek damages.

However, the damages awarded fall well short of the $1.35 million sought by the woman.

Mass wrote: "Once there is a civil contract, even if its object relates to religious obligations, it is justiciable and within the jurisdiction of the civil court… Simply put, a valid civil obligation with religious undertones was created."

He maintains that a civil court is not infringing on religious jurisdiction by awarding damages because it is beyond the scope of a bet din to award them.

All three rabbis who testified in the case agreed that in signing, the man "freely" gave his consent to appear before the bet din to obtain the get, which in this instance was uncontested.

The woman's lawyer, Allan Stein, said this judgment is a "landmark, a precedent in the world." With interest and indemnity, he said the total the ex-husband must pay is about $76,000, plus court costs.

The judgment was hailed by advocates for the rights of agunot. Evelyn Brook of the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get said "recalcitrant husbands will now think about refusing the get." She also thinks it will benefit agunot who were divorced before 1990 when the federal divorce act was amended to require that barriers to religious remarriage be removed before a civil divorce is issued. As well, it may lend more legal weight to prenuptial agreements that state the couple will obtain a get if they divorce, she said. The defendant, who was represented by Anne France Goldwater, maintained that he had a religious obligation, not a civil one, and therefore this dispute could not be adjudicated before a civil court.

In his ruling, Mass states this case is different from Morris v. Morris in 1974 in which the Manitoba Court of Appeal held that a civil court cannot enforce a ketubah, or Jewish marriage contract, to make a spouse appear before a rabbinical court to give a get.

In this case, Mass points out, it is not necessary to rely on a Jewish document, because "an enforceable civil document exists."

He makes clear that no civil court can order the granting of a get and, in any event, it would likely be invalid because rabbinical authorities would consider it coercive.

In this case, Mass ruled, the court is not enforcing performance of a religious obligation contained in the civil divorce contract, because the get had already been given before the case came before the court.

"The issue is the assessment of the damages due to defendant's long delay in granting the get, contrary to the [aforementioned] clause in the consent. This raises no issues of enforcement of a religious obligation."

Mass awarded the woman $37,500 for being deprived for 15 years of marrying within the Orthodox Jewish community, which she considers herself a member of, even though there is no evidence she had a marriage offer during that period.

He terms this a restraint on her "freedom of religious choice." He notes that the woman was only 31 when she divorced and 46 when she received the get. Mass awarded her $10,000 for not being able to have children in those 15 years, a "nominal" sum because of the lack of evidence that she had any relationship that was ended because of her not having a get.

Mass dismissed her claims for "having been restrained from going on with her life," because the evidence showed she had an active social life, and he dismissed her claims for "loss of consortium," noting that her ex-husband had testified that he would have immediately given her a get if she had a marriage proposal.

It is unknown whether the defendant will appeal the ruling.

Unorthodox book ruffles some feathers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Award-winning investigative journalist Stephen Fried says he doesn't write for Jewish publications. "I doubt a Jewish publication would have me," said the author of a book chronicling a Philadelphia congregation's search for a new spiritual leader.

With the same straightforwardness that characterizes his book The New Rabbi, Fried, 45, said in an interview last month at the Toronto offices of his publisher Random House, that "Jewish communities sometimes are concerned that if the truth is reported... it will cause us to be targets." Later that day he spoke at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation in an event co-sponsored by the Albert & Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library of Toronto.

Indeed, The New Rabbi, which is Fried's third book and his first to have a Jewish theme, has generated controversy among some Conservative rabbis since it was published last year for its up-close, at times unflattering, take on the inner workings and politics of synagogue life.

"I believe very strongly that the flip side of the Jewish community's fear of... anything but good news is that the difficult news is communicated badly or not at all," Fried said. "But people are still making life-changing decisions based on that information."

Author interweaves three stories

Fried's book will likely be of particular interest to members of rabbinic search committees, but he said as a guest on radio shows, he has received calls from Christians who have told him the situation is the same everywhere. "These are issues that aren't theological. They're about a community that's built around theology... It's about how communities work."

The book interweaves three stories – the life and career of Rabbi Gerald Wolpe, now rabbi emeritus of Temple Har Zion in Philadelphia; the search for a rabbi to replace him (which appeared to be over at the end of the book, but which Fried is now updating as an afterword for the upcoming paperback version); and Fried's own spiritual quest and renewed connection to Judaism following the death of his father. The author has an eye and ear for detail, a knack for drawing everyday analogies and a sly sense of humour that make the book an absorbing read.

After seeing the process up close, would Fried serve on a rabbinical search committee? "It would be a nightmare. It doesn't get easier because you know more about it, but it's comforting to know you're not the only one."

Sutton Group Admiral's sales force continues spectacular growth

In the past two years, this "little company that grew" has seen its sales force swell by more than 40%, to 135+ agents and counting! Now in its 11th year, the firm continues to be a magnet for top agents looking to increase their bottom line. With maximum opportunity and minimum hassle, it's not hard to see why.

Murray Goldkind

Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing these prospective new team members.

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group

"Fee for services" concept

Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Palestinian state inevitable: Sharon

Excerpts from an interview with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that appeared in Ha'aretz April 12.

Ha'aretz: Prime Minister Sharon, we are at an astonishing historic moment. The reality around us is changing radically. From your point of view, is the new reality in the Middle East after the fall of Iraq promising or dangerous? Good or bad for Israel?

The Iraqi leadership was a horrific and murderous one. As early as 20 years ago, they understood it was impossible to acquire an Islamic [nuclear] bomb, and therefore it had to be manufactured. So the removal of Iraq as a threat is definitely a relief. However, this does not mean that all of the problems we are facing have been removed. Iran is making every effort to produce weapons of mass destruction and is engaged in making ballistic missiles. Libya is making a very great effort to acquire nuclear weapons. What is developing in these countries is dangerous and serious. In Saudi Arabia, too, there is a regime that grants sanctioned aid to terrorist organizations here.

Are you saying that what happened in Iraq has to happen, in one way or another, in Iran, Libya and Saudi Arabia?

In the matter of Iraq, the United States showed leadership at the highest level. I don't think it is realistic to think that immediately after the conclusion of one campaign, another will begin. Even a superpower has limits. When you win, you are also weakened to a certain degree.

But we face the possibility that a different period will begin here. The move carried out in Iraq generated a shock through the Middle East and it brings with it a prospect of great changes. There is an opportunity here to forge a different relationship between us and the Arab states, and between us and the Palestinians. That opportunity must not be neglected. I intend to examine these things with all seriousness.

Do you think there is a prospect of reaching a settlement in the foreseeable future?

That depends first and foremost on the Arabs. It obligates a different type of leadership – a battle against terrorism and a series of reforms. It obligates the absolute cessation of the incitement and the dismantling of all terrorist organizations. But if there will be a leadership that understands these things and will carry them out seriously, the possibility of reaching a settlement exists.

Do you consider Abu Mazen a leader with whom you will be able to reach a settlement?

Abu Mazen understands that it is impossible to vanquish Israel by means of terrorism.

One day very soon the telephone might ring, the president of the United States will be on the line. He will tell you, Arik, "I have removed an existential threat from Israel, I am fomenting a revolution throughout the region. Now the time has come for you to make your contribution. Let's have Netzarim, please."

There are some matters regarding which we will be ready to take far-reaching steps. We will be ready to carry out very painful steps. But there is one thing that I told [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush a number of times – I made no concessions in the past, and I will make no concessions now, or ever make concessions in the future, with regard to anything that is related to the security of Israel. I explained to President Bush and made it clear to him that this is the historic responsibility that I bear for the future and the fate of the Jewish people. You should know this – on this subject there will be no concessions. We will be the ones who in the end decide what is dangerous for Israel and what is not dangerous for Israel.

And what about Netzarim? [An isolated community in the Gaza Strip]

I don't want to get into a discussion of any specific place now. This is a delicate subject and there is no need to talk a lot about it. But if it turns out that we have someone to talk to, that they understand that peace is neither terrorism nor subversion against Israel, then I would definitely say that we will have to take steps that are painful for every Jew and painful for me personally.

Isn't the phrase "painful concessions" a hollow expression?

Definitely not. It comes from the depth of my soul. Look, we are talking about the cradle of the Jewish people. Our whole history is bound up with these places. Bethlehem, Shiloh, Beit El. And I know that we will have to part with some of these places. There will be a parting from places that are connected to the whole course of our history. As a Jew, this agonizes me. But I have decided to make every effort to reach a settlement. I feel that the rational necessity to reach a settlement is overcoming my feelings.

You established the settlements and you believed in the settlements and nurtured them. Are you now prepared to consider the evacuation of isolated settlements?

If we reach a situation of true peace, real peace, peace for generations, we will have to make painful concessions. Not in exchange for promises, but rather in exchange for peace.

Some people expect you to be an Israeli [Charles] de Gaulle – a national leader, a general, who at a certain point understands that reality has changed and turns his back on part of his own history and creates a dramatic historical turning point. Do you have any such aspirations?

One has to remember one thing about the comparison with de Gaulle - "Algeria" is here. It is not a few hundred kilometres away. The required measure of caution here is therefore much greater.

But do you want to be remembered as the one who spearheaded such a dramatic change?

I am determined to make a real effort to reach a real agreement. I think that anyone who saw the tremendous thing called the State of Israel in the making possibly understands things better and knows better how to reach a solution. That is why I think that this task rests with my generation, which was privileged to live through one of the most dramatic periods in the history of the Jewish people.

I am 75 years old. I have no political ambitions beyond the position I now hold. I feel that my goal and my purpose is to bring this nation to peace and security. That is why I am making tremendous efforts. I think that this is something that I have to leave behind me – to try to reach an agreement.

Have you really accepted the idea of two states for two peoples?

I believe that this is what will happen. One has to view things realistically. Eventually there will be a Palestinian state. I view things first and foremost from our perspective. I do not think that we have to rule over another people and run their lives. I do not think that we have the strength for that. It is a very heavy burden on the public and it raises ethical problems and heavy economic problems.

In the past you talked about a long-term interim agreement. Did you not believe in a permanent solution and an end to the conflict?

I think opportunities have currently been created that did not exist before. The Arab world in general and the Palestinians in particular have been shaken. There is therefore a chance to reach an agreement faster than people think.

The Israeli public chose you twice by a large majority because it wants you to repulse [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat and beat him. Have you done that?

I think that one of our successes is that we opened many people's eyes to the true nature of the Palestinian Authority and the nature of the person who heads it, making him irrelevant. When I used that phrase in the past, it shocked many of our supporters, mainly those who write and express themselves. But in the end, Arafat became irrelevant.

Do you not fear that perhaps you won the battle against Arafat and against the terror, but lost in the matter of the Palestinian state and the settlements? After all, the thing on the agenda now is the [U.S. sponsored] "road map," [for peace], which is not very comfortable for Israel.

We supported the principles what were presented in President Bush's speech of June 24, 2002. As long as the sketch matches the speech, it is acceptable to us. Regarding the latest draft that was sent to us, we have 14 or 15 reservations that I have passed on to the White House.

What are the main reservations?

The main issue is security. How terror will be handled. There is no difference of opinion in this matter but there is a difference in the wording.

The second matter is that of the implementation of the stages. Our understanding with the United States is that the will be no transition from one stage to the next without the completion of the previous stage. The determining factor is not the timetable but the execution. That is why the issue of the stages is of paramount importance to us.

Our third reservation concerns the right of return. This definitely poses a problem.

Is your willingness to recognize a Palestinian state conditional on the Palestinians backing down from their demand for the right of return?

If there is ever to be an end to the conflict the Palestinians must recognize the Jewish people's right to a homeland and the existence of an independent Jewish state in the homeland of the Jewish people. I feel that this is a condition for what is called an end to the conflict. This is not a simple thing… The end of the conflict will come only with the arrival of the recognition of the Jewish people's right to its homeland.

That has to do with the end of the process. But do you think that the compromise on the right of return has to come beforehand?

This issue must be clear right from the outset.

There are those who feel that the "road map" is worse than the Oslo accords. Some say the Americans caught you off guard, that they led you to believe the road map isn't a serious document and then presented it to you as a fait accompli. Do you not feel you have been misled?

No. Not at all. Israel is not a pawn on a chessboard that anyone can move. We live here. It will be impossible to budge Israel on the major matters that are principles of her existence.

Do you feel that the dark and violent period of the past three years is ending?

I will make every effort to make it end. I do not intend to be passive. The moment a Palestinian state forms, I plan to begin working with it. I will not wait for the telephone to ring.

The Week in Israel

April 7

• The government is distributing tons of food to its needy for Passover. Some 80 tons of vegetables and fruit, 300,000 eggs and 30 tons of meat will be distributed by the Agriculture Ministry in addition to the donations of various private organizations.

April 8

• Germany's Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer said he is deeply disturbed by the state of Israel-Europe relations. At a meeting with President Moshe Katsav, Fischer called for steps to improve relations, including visits by Israeli officials to Europe.

April 9

• An extremist Jewish group claimed responsibility for a blast that wounded 15 Palestinian students at a school in the West Bank.

• A planned general strike in Israel was called off. The Histadrut, Israel's labour federation, called off a strike after reaching an agreement with Israeli treasury officials.

April 10

• Israeli helicopters fired four missiles at a car in Gaza City, killing Islamic Jihad commander Mahmoud Zatme and wounding 12 bystanders.

• Two Palestinian gunmen infiltrated a small Golani training base close to Beka'ot in the northern Jordan Valley around dawn, killing two soldiers and wounding nine.

April 11

• Israel's state of alert against a possible ballistic missile attack from Iraq remains high, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said after a meeting with senior officers of the Israeli army. The officers agreed that intelligence indicates Iraq still has launching sites that could threaten Israel.

Palestinian Authority mourns fall of Baghdad

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Media Watch

After months of support of Iraq and promises that "Iraq would be a graveyard for U.S. soldiers" the Palestinian Authority (PA) went into mourning over the quick fall of their hero Saddam Hussein.

The PA daily Al Ayyam published a headline April 10 of the fall of Baghdad with a black frame of mourning and the official PA daily Al Hayat Al Jadida published a political cartoon saying the entire "Arab Nation" is in mourning.

The editorial page in the official daily Al Hayat Al Jadida went even further, advising the Iraqi people to act against the American "occupation" by taking "the Palestinian experience as an example."

Theories linking Kurds with Jews abound in Turkey

By YIGAL SCHLEIFER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ISTANBUL — The war in Iraq has ended and the Kurds in the country's north have emerged as one of the war's great victors, liberating themselves from Saddam Hussein's oppressive rule and declaring an independent state.

To the world's surprise, it turns out that one of the Kurds' top leaders is Jewish and, as a result, the nascent Kurdish country will forge a close alliance with Israel, giving the Jewish state another toehold in the Middle East and access to the oil riches of the Iraqi north.

A far-fetched fantasy? Perhaps, but in the last few weeks, a similar scenario has been discussed in various articles in the mainstream press in Turkey, a country watching developments in northern Iraq with great worry.

Turkey, which has a close strategic relationship with Israel, has a Kurdish minority estimated at more than 10 million people and only a few years ago ended a decade-long battle with Kurdish separatists in the country's southeast that claimed some 30,000 lives.

Turkish leaders fear that any move toward independence by Kurds in Iraq could lead to a revival of the separatist movement among Turkey's Kurds.

As a result, Turkey has been building up its military presence along the Iraqi border, ostensibly to stem a possible flood of refugees from Iraq – but also to pressure the Iraqi Kurds to stay quiet.

In the weeks leading up to the war, the Turkish press was filled with various articles reporting, mostly with suspicion, about the Iraqi Kurds' postwar plans.

A Feb. 17 article in the respected daily newspaper Hurriyet offered an interesting take on the situation: Massoud Barzani, leader of the Kurdish Democratic Party, one of two political factions that control the autonomous Kurdish area of northern Iraq, is Jewish and comes from a long line of Kurdish rabbis, the article claimed.

The article was based on information from The Folk Literature of the Kurdistani Jews, a 1982 anthology that discusses a Kurdish rabbinic family named Barzani and findings by a Turkish history teacher who discovered Ottoman documents that refer to a 19th-century Kurdish rabbi also named Barzani.

In the article, researcher Ahmet Ucar said Barzani's "Jewish roots" should lead to a different understanding of the region and its history, since the Hebrew Bible states that the Jewish "Promised Land" stretches from the Nile to the Euphrates, an area that would include Kurdish territory in northern Iraq.

Syria undermining Mideast peace: Israeli foreign minister

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ANKARA — Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, speaking on Monday after talks with Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul, accused Syria of undermining peace in the Middle East amid fears the U.S.-led war in the region could now spread to Iraq's neighbours.

"Syria is letting terrorist organizations operate in the country... Unfortunately they are not doing anything to prevent it. More than that, they are encouraging terrorist organizations to act within Syria all the time," Shalom told reporters.

Shalom, the first senior Israeli official to visit Ankara since Gul's Justice and Development party (AKP) took power after elections last November, said Syria had asserted Israel was playing an active role in the Iraq war in order to justify its harbouring of senior Iraqi government officials wanted by the United States.

"Israel has no part in the war with Iraq, everyone knows it," Shalom said. "It's propaganda that they want maybe to give to their own people or to the Arab world to explain why they let those Iraqi officials escape to their country and to shelter there."

Syria must lift the threat of Hezbollah attacks against Israel and expel leaders of terrorist organizations from Damascus, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz was quoted as saying Monday amid fast-rising tensions between Syria and the United States.

"We must monitor what it happening there. The Americans have taken out a 'yellow card' on them, and were right to do so," Mofaz said in remarks broadcast on Army Radio, employing the term a soccer referee uses to warn players who have broken the rules of the game, and who may be expelled if infractions continue.

Syria "has taken in senior Iraqi figures to its territory, [and] has also allowed terrorism to be launched in the direction of the Americans in Iraq," Mofaz said.

Overnight Monday, Hezbollah once again fired artillery shells into Israeli territory. They landed in Kiryat Shmona and did not cause injuries, Army Radio reported.

The radio also reported that Hezbollah fighters had recently moved additional artillery pieces near the Lebanon-Israel border, from which they have been directing anti-aircraft fire at border towns and villages. Shrapnel from anti-aircraft shells fell overnight also in Kiryat Shmona, it said.

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk a-Shara said Sunday if the United States decides to attack Syria, Israel will also be harmed. He rejected claims that Syria was providing shelter to senior Iraqi leaders, and said the Americans "know well that these accusations have no basis."

Shara's comments came after U.S. President George W. Bush Sunday repeated warnings to Syria that it must cooperate with Washington and not harbour Iraqi leaders who may flee across their common border.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana urged Washington on Monday to tone down its harsh statements about Syria, saying it was time to "cool down" the tense situation in the Middle East.

That same day, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Syria was not the next coalition target after the war on Iraq. "We have made it clear that there are no plans for Syria to be next on the list... but there are questions that the Syrians need to answer," Straw told reporters at a brief press conference at the British Embassy.

"What we believe is that there is an important agenda for discussion with the Syrian government," Straw said of whether Syria is harbouring former Iraqi leadership and has weapons of mass destruction.

Bush told reporters Sunday that "Syria just needs to co-operate with the United States and our coalition partners, not harbour any [Iraqi] Baathists, any military officials, any people who need to be held to account."

Former prime minister and foreign minister Shimon Peres, who was in the United States earlier this week, said Washington would no longer tolerate "two-faced policies" regarding terrorism.

"A nation can either fight terror or aid terror," he said. "They will not allow a nation to pretend it is fighting terror, while it actually aids it."

Some 10 headquarters of terrorist organizations are in Damascus, Peres said, adding that Washington's approach to Syria was likely to be "uncompromising." But, he said, "I don't think that the next step will be use of military force. I think that what America will try to do is to truly forge a coalition to tell Syria to decide where it's really headed."

After its Iraq invasion, "the American people have a power of their own even without immediate use of military force. This is the change in the situation," Peres said. "I expect that many nations will join this effort."

Asked whether Syria could face military action if it does not turn over Iraqi leaders, Bush said, "They just need to co-operate."

Syria has been on the U.S. list of countries supporting terrorism for many years and some hawks in Washington say that after Iraq, the United States should set its sights on regime change in Syria and Iran.

'Rebels' take to motorcycles in fight against cancer

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Rami Bader and Gidion Lee will ride their motorcycles across the United States, Europe and Israel to raise money for cancer research and help scientists cut off by some European countries due to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The two cousins' "Rebel with a Cause: Ride for Life" campaign is in memory of Bader's brother Gili, who died of cancer more than two years ago at the age of 46.

The majority of funds raised will go to the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), with a portion earmarked for the Cross Cancer Institute in Alberta.

The campaign begins May 20 in Edmonton and ends six weeks later in Israel, where Gili died.

Bader, who lives in Edmonton, wanted to do something to raise money for cancer research and treatment after his brother Gili died of melanoma in October 2000.

"It was tragic and heartbreaking to watch this disease disintegrate such a vital young man," said Bader. "I never really recovered from this loss."

Feeling helpless after his brother's death, Bader said he "had to do something so that his [Gili's] experience would not be in vain." While riding his motorcycle one day, Bader thought of the idea for the Ride for Life campaign.

"I thought it could be a great campaign for a great cause," he said.

Bader also wants to raise funds to provide patient support and assist families of cancer patients and victims.

While Bader originally planned on donating all funds raised from the tour to the Cross Cancer Institute, Lee suggested donating the funds to the ICRF. Part of Lee's interest in helping Israeli scientists stems from personal reasons; the pharmaceutical company that his sister works for in Israel had its funding cut by some European countries, such as Sweden, due to the current conflict with the Palestinians.

The ICRF says threats to shut out Israeli researchers from international academic exchanges and scientific studies have also come from France, England and Germany.

"I felt the timing couldn't be better to help get money for research to be done in Israel," said Lee, who lives in Toronto and is helping organize the trip. "Money for scientific research has dried up completely, because a lot of it was coming from Europe."

While the donations raised in Alberta will go to the Cross Cancer Institute, all donations raised in the rest of Canada, the United States and Israel will go to the ICRF. Bader said his goal is to raise $100,000 (Cdn) for the Cross Cancer Institute and $100,000 (US) for the ICRF.

On the tour, Lee, 69, and Bader, 44, both native Israelis, will ride through the Canadian prairies and American Mid-West before flying from Toronto to Portugal, with their motorcycles in tow. From Lisbon, Lee and Bader will ride through southern Europe to Turkey, finally arriving in Haifa via ferry from Cyprus.

In Israel, Lee and Bader will ride from Haifa to Be'er Sheva, stopping en route to visit different research centres of ICRF-funded scientists. All money raised on the tour for the ICRF will go to a fund that has been created in Gili Bader's name. Lee and Bader are covering their own costs for the trip.

Founded in 1975, the ICRF is a voluntary charitable organization that receives its total income from private donations. The ICRF funds Israeli scientists working on cancer research projects in universities and hospitals throughout Israel. It is the only U.S.-based charity solely devoted to supporting cancer research in Israel.

Lee says one of the reasons why the Ride for Life campaign is important to him, aside from the fact that he's helping raise money for Israeli scientists, is because many people he knows have been afflicted with cancer in the past few years.

"There are all kinds of sicknesses in the world, but to me this [cancer] is the worst," said Lee. "They have made very little progress in conquering it."

New Simcha Jacobovici documenatry probes...

Did ossuary contain the bones of the brother of Jesus?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Is it the greatest archeological find of all time or simply a brilliant forgery?

That's the burning question Simcha Jacobovici poses in his newest documentary, James, Brother of Jesus, which will be broadcast on the Discovery channel on Sunday, April 20, at 8 p.m.

The object of debate is a limestone ossuary, or burial box, containing an inscription in Aramaic: "Ya'akov, bar Yosef, akhui di Yeshua" ("James, son of Joseph, brother of Jesus.")

If the ossuary and the inscription are authentic, the first archeological proof of Jesus' existence will have been established.

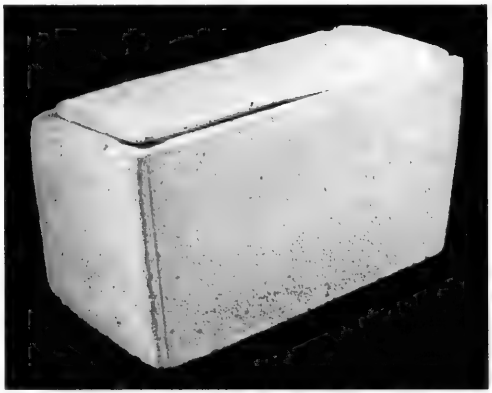
But is this ossuary the real thing?

Herschell Shanks, an American editor who broke the story of the ossuary's existence, and Andre Lemaire, a French expert in Aramaic inscriptions, have no doubt that it is the genuine article.

But Rochelle Altman, a renowned scholar, is not so sure. Her colleague, Baruch Halpern, cautions that it may be an outright forgery.

The trapezoidal ossuary, owned by an Israeli collector named Oded Golan, was exhibited at the Royal Ontario Museum last autumn.

En route to Toronto, it broke, causing a sensation. It was restored and then tested for authenticity.



This limestone burial box, believed to belong to James, has created much controversy.

In this fine investigative film, Jacobovici tries to get to the bottom of the conundrum.

Golan apparently bought the 10 by 20 by 12 inch sand-coloured ossuary in the 1970s when he was a student.

An archeological buff, Golan has amassed an enormous collection of artifacts, including 40 ossuaries. He kept the "James" ossuary in his parents' north Tel Aviv flat for many years.

James, Jesus' brother, was one of his followers during the formative years of Christianity. As one archeologist observes, James represented a "very Jewish form of Christianity."

Golan does not remember the Arab antiquity dealer in eastern Jerusalem from whom he purchased the famous ossuary. But it's clear it was found in Silwan, a Palestinian village near Jerusalem that is filled with ancient Jewish burial caves.

Currently, the ossuary is undergoing tests at the Israeli Antiquities Authority. Preliminary scientific examinations may lead a viewer to the conclusion that the ossuary, as well as the inscription, are authentic.

But judge for yourself.

In any case, James, Brother of Jesus is a compelling film.

Nowhere in Africa director surprised by Oscar win

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Caroline Link

Caroline Link, the director of Nowhere in Africa, is still in a state of shock after winning this year's Academy Award for best foreign film.

" It was a complete miracle," she said in a telephone interview last week from her home in Munich, Germany.

" I did not think I would win. I never would have expected it. I was up against tough competition."

Link, 38, and her husband, filmmaker Dominik Graf, watched the Academy Award show on television. She did not attend the ceremony in Los Angeles, her infant daughter having fallen ill.

Based on Stefanie Zweig's popular autobiographical novel about an upper middle-class German Jewish family that settles in Kenya to escape Nazi persecution, Nowhere in Africa spans a period from the late 1930s to the end of World War II.

Currently playing in Toronto, it unfolds in German and Swahili, with English subtitles.

Only the second German film to capture an Oscar, it repeats the success of The Tin Drum, which won in 1979.

Link is no stranger to critical acclaim.

Her 1998 feature, Beyond Silence, a film about a girl with deaf parents, was also nominated for an Academy Award in the best foreign movie category.

Nowhere in Africa, which sold 1.4 million tickets in Germany, a lot for that country, picked up five German Film Awards, including best picture and best director.

Germans liked it for at least two reasons, she explained.

"It is a moving family drama about the Holocaust. It reached the hearts of people, showing a new side of the Holocaust. I was not personally aware that German Jews settled all over the world when they left Germany. They took what they could get."

Link was drawn to Zweig's novel by the novelty of its approach.

"We're all pretty tired of the same dead images of the Holocaust," she observed. "The brown uniforms. The insults directed against Jews on the streets. I had to find a new language, a new angle."

Link's producer, Peter Herrmann, bought the rights to the book in 1995, the year Nowhere in Africa was published. He offered it to her in 1998.

The novel fascinated Link, who has always been attracted to " new worlds." She met with Zweig, now 70 and living in Frankfurt, before writing the screenplay.

"She trusted me to do the film, and that gave me the freedom I needed. It was an easy collaboration."

In adapting Zweig's sprawling book, Link concentrated on only a small part, realizing she could never do justice to all its complex facets.

Filming began in January 2001 and lasted three months.

It was partly shot in the remote village of Mukutani, which, she noted, was so far from Western creature comforts.

"It was the greatest adventure. We had no phone lines, and we had to build a road to get to the village. It was a big challenge, and a pretty amazing experience."

In another locale, two of the actors were robbed of all their possessions.

"It was very frightening for the whole team. Kenya is not a safe place. It's a very, very poor country."

Much to her relief, the $7 million (US) film pleased Zweig.

"She was very happy, overwhelmed and moved by it."

Link made a point of showing it to the villagers in Mukutani. A screen was set up in an open field.

"They didn't understand a word, but they loved it."

Screened at last year's Jerusalem Film Festival, Nowhere in Africa has been sold to 50 countries.

"That's what the producer tells me," she said, exulting in the information. "I can't really believe it."

Better still, she added, Nowhere in Africa reopened in theatres across Germany after winning the Academy Award.

Link, who was born in Bad Nauheim, a town near Frankfurt, was asked whether Germans and Jews can ever normalize their relationship.

A realist, she said that ties between Jews and Germans have yet to be normalized. In fact, the entire issue is treated in "a very careful way," replied Link, whose neighbours are Jewish.

Does she intend to make another film about the Holocaust?

"If a good story comes my way, why not? But there are so many other stories in my head."

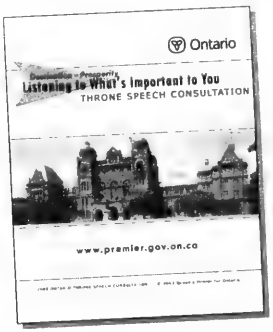
Throne Speech Consultation 2003



Premier Ernie Eves wants to hear what you have to say about Ontario's future. The results of a provincewide consultation will be reflected in the government's April 30th Throne Speech.

The Ontario Government is reaching out to all citizens, asking you – What can we do to keep Ontario strong?

Our guiding principle is that a strong economy is the foundation upon which everything else is built: equality of opportunity in education, good jobs, health care you can count on, a happy retirement. The quality of life of every Ontarian depends upon the ability of the economy to fuel job creation and the prosperity necessary to fund our social programs.

Give us your thoughts on Health Care, Education, Energy, the Economy, the Environment, Local Communities, Public Safety, or other matters, and we will listen and take action.

Warsaw Ghetto uprising recalled on History Channel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They never had a chance, being hopelessly outmanned and outgunned.

Despite the overwhelming odds, the Jewish fighters of the Warsaw ghetto resisted, putting up a heroic struggle before being brutally subdued by a force of about 2,000 heavily armed Germans.

The most stirring Jewish revolt against Nazi oppression during the Holocaust, the 1943 uprising still galvanizes Jewish pride.

Organized by an intrepid group of Zionists and Bundists in the face of opposition from Warsaw's cowed Jewish leadership, the 28-day rebellion was technically a failure. The Nazis killed virtually all the 700 Jewish defenders and razed the ghetto. But by bravely standing up to their oppressors, the Jews redeemed themselves.

On April 19, the 60th anniversary of the outbreak of the revolt, the History Channel is broadcasting From Despair to Defiance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, a documentary by David Kaufman about this sad yet stirring event. Never less than absorbing, Kaufman's film will be screened at 6:30 p.m.

It begins as flames consume the ghetto, doubles back to its construction in 1940, dwells on the preparations leading to the revolt and finally returns to the rebellion itself.

Kaufman uses graphic file footage and supplements it with revealing interviews with some of the surviving fighters.

It all adds up to a first-class documentary.

Four hundred and fifty thousand Jews were crammed into the ghetto, a place of unrelieved squalor. Residents were subjected to a starvation diet – 600 grams per person per day – and historians estimate that one-third of its inhabitants lived in sub-human conditions. Soup kitchens mitigated the effects of starvation, but disease was rampant.

The idea of resistance took root in 1942 after news of the mass murder of Jews filtered out. The German-appointed Jewish Council opposed a revolt, fallaciously assuming that the Nazis would not murder the Jewish labourers they needed for war production.

But after the first deportations and the suicide of Judenrat leader Adam Czerniakow in the summer of 1942, the last illusions crumbled.

During the first phase of the deportations, which resulted in the deaths of some 270,000 Jews, the Nazis handed out bread and marmalade to those who presented themselves voluntarily for "resettlement."

The deception worked, but soon enough, the ghetto learned that tens of thousands of Jews were being gassed in Treblinka.

Emboldened by this catastrophe, the resisters established the Jewish Fighting Organization (ZOB). Lacking weapons, ZOB distributed leaflets warning Jews of impending disasters.

In September of that fateful year, the Germans decided to carry out a final deportation. A month later, an emissary from the Polish Home Army, Jan Karski, secretly visited the ghetto. He disclosed that Polish Jewry was being wiped out.

By the end of 1942, 60,000 Jews remained in the ghetto, the majority of them slave labourers. The Nazis then took the decision to liquidate the ghetto and transfer its population to Treblinka and labour camps in Lublin.

When the last of the deportations got under way in January 1943, ZOB fighters, in vain, tried to stop them. By that juncture, ZOB had acquired small arms from the Polish underground. With these meagre weapons, ZOB pushed the Germans out of the ghetto.

Jewish fighters being led away by German troops after the Warsaw ghetto uprising.

In a turning point, SS commandant Heinrich Himmler ordered its destruction. On Monday, April 19, on the eve of Passover, a German force under the command of Gen. Juergen Stroop stormed the ghetto.

The ZOB hit back at the column of tanks, half-tracks, howitzers and infantry, inflicting casualties. The astonished Germans retreated in panic, but returned the following day, Adolf Hitler's birthday, only to be turned back once again.

On April 21, the Germans launched artillery strikes, setting fire to buildings where Jewish fighters were lodged. Two days later, the Germans torched all the buildings in the ghetto. "It was hell on earth," a fighter recalls.

The Polish underground rejected a request from the Jews for additional arms, saying they were required for a long planned general uprising (which, in fact, broke out in 1944).

With the ghetto now a smouldering ruin, Jewish fighters found refuge in basements and bunkers. At night, they hunted down German soldiers.

Using dogs and sensors, the Germans ferociously attacked the Jews, flushing out about 2,000 every day.

On May 17, they discovered the whereabouts of Mordecai Anielewicz, the ZOB's commander, at a bunker at Mila 18. He left behind a note commending the heroism of his fellow combatants.

By mid-May, the revolt had flickered out, and the surviving Jewish fighters had escaped through the city's sewers. To mark their "victory," the Nazis blew up the Great Synagogue outside the ghetto walls.

Stroop, who was executed in 1945, reported that 13,000 Jews had been killed and another 7,000 deported. He claimed his own losses were 16 killed and 185 wounded.

Only 10 of the 70 Jewish survivors lived through the rest of the war.

The Nazis had prevailed, but the Jews had retained their honour.

From Despair to Defiance distills the essence of this epic struggle.

Film's director a seasoned journalist

David Kaufman immersed himself in literature of rebellion

To Alan Mendelsohn, the series producer of the History Channel's Turning Points in History, the 60th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising seemed as good a time as any to revisit that historic event.

Casting about for talent, Mendelsohn assigned David Kaufman, a seasoned writer and director, to make a film about the 1943 revolt.

"He thought it would be a good story to retell, and I was eager to do it," Kaufman said last week.

The result is From Despair to Defiance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, which is scheduled to run on April 19.

Born in Montreal in 1948, Kaufman is an award-winning director.

After working for CBC's The Journal for eight years, he moved over to the fifth estate.

In 1999, after leaving the CBC, he produced and directed The New Klezmorim: Voices Inside the Revival of Yiddish Music, which premiered at the 2000 Toronto Jewish Film Festival and was subsequently broadcast on 13 PBS stations in the United States and on Bravo! in Canada.

Two years ago, he wrote and directed a feature on Kristallnacht titled Night of the Reich's Pogrom, which was nominated for a Gemini award.

In making From Despair to Defiance, a Barna-Alper production that cost about $200,000, Kaufman immersed himself in the literature of the rebellion.

Eugene Orenstein, a McGill University professor of Jewish studies, helped Kaufman track down some of the surviving fighters. Six, including Boroch Spiegel of Montreal, appear in the film, while three declined to be interviewed.

Special screenings have already taken place in Toronto and Montreal.

Kaufman has an indirect connection to Poland. His wife's late mother, Helen Goldberg Alboim, left Poland on the eve of World War II, and her father was the secretary of the metal workers' union in pre-war Poland.

At Holy Blossom Temple: Holy Blossom presents folklorist and musician Naomi Bell in a four-part series, Yiddish Folksongs and the Stories They Tell. Bell, a teacher, lecturer and performer, approaches Jewish folk songs as social history. Her course features songs of work and struggle, love and marriage, and customs and beliefs from the shtetl to America.

Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. Free admission. Thursdays at 11 a.m., May 1, 15, 22 and 29. 416-789-3291, ext. 238.

* * *

The Golem Returns: Following the success of their first Golem comic book, a New York-based company has just launched its second Golem comic book, featuring Mendy and the Klein family as well as the famed medieval Jewish monster from Prague.

The Golem Factory employed artist Ernie Colon, of Richie Rich and Casper fame, to draw the second instalment, Blackout.

"At The Golem, we are very enthusiastic to develop a positive, thematically Jewish commonality for our young readers," said editor Tani Pinson.

For the latest issue, inquire at your neighbourhood Jewish book store or visit the Web site www.thegolem.com.

Are your GICs Earning 7-10%?

Enjoying your retirement requires a great income.
That's where we come in.
Our unique retirement income approaches can help you make the most of your savings. An Insured Annuity, for example, provides the best of both worlds: significantly higher after-tax income for life, and the capital is guaranteed tax-free to your beneficiary.

Consider the example below that compares $200,000 invested in a GIC at 4% with an Insured Annuity for a woman aged 70. See the following chart of how an Insured Annuity can enhance your income for life.

	GIC	INSURED ANNUITY
Capital	$200,000	$200,000
Annual Income	$8,000	$19,957
Taxable Income	$8,000	$5,464
Less Tax @ 40%	$3,200	$2,186
After-Tax Income	$4,800	$17,771
Less Insurance Cost	nil	$6,393
Spendable Income	$4,800	$11,378
Pre-Tax Return	4%	9.5%
Estate Value	$200,000	$200,000
Subject to Probate	Yes	No

Audience enjoys riveting version of Mamet play

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

In the world of sales, a strong marketing pitch can entice the most skeptical of customers.

That adage can be easily applied to theatre and, in this case, to U.S. playwright David Mamet's renowned work Glengarry Glen Ross, which recently played at Harbourfront Centre's 2003 du Maurier World Stage festival.

The play's dialogue-driven script is the timeless kind that actors salivate over. But where Glengarry has to shine is in its delivery and intensity — a responsibility that weighs on the shoulders of any company bold enough to stage the Mamet masterpiece.

Chicago's legendary Steppenwolf Theatre Company accepted the challenge and gave Canadian audiences its first glimpse of the theatre group that jump-started the careers of actors John Malkovich and Gary Sinise.

While no such A-list names graced the Toronto stage, the actors in the visiting ensemble delivered a riveting performance nonetheless.

The play revolves around determined real estate salesmen in 1980s Chicago who face the thrills and spills of chasing leads in the hope of becoming salesman of the month and winning a Cadillac.

Shelly Levene, the veteran struggling to reclaim past glory, shapes the play's plot, although the smarmy Richard Roma attracts eyeballs because of his slick-talking pitches and expletive-heavy rants.

Rounding out the sales force is Dave Moss — whose distaste for upper management elicits more laughs than sympathy — and the spineless George Aaronow. John Williamson captains the ship, but he absorbs enough criticism to make most bosses cringe.

In the first act, set in a Chinese restaurant, the audience is treated to the death and rebirth of a typical salesman. Moss and Aaronow complain about their lack of quality leads, whining in a manner that undermines their faux confidence.

Under the direction of Amy Morton — a Steppenwolf regular who has brought Glengarry to audiences in North America and Europe — this comedy vibrates with an energy found in all Mamet plays.

Rick Snyder as Levene was a last-minute replacement for Mike Nussbaum, who left for Chicago because of a family emergency. Though he had to carry a script through the play's two acts, Snyder's delivery crackled wonderfully as a man desperate to regain his youthful eminence and passion for the hunt.

The electricity intensifies in Act 2, when the salesmen find their office trashed by a robbery. The lucrative Glengarry leads have been stolen. A cop interviews each salesman and they all grumble like workers in desperate need of a caffeine jolt or a blockbuster sale.

Matt Decaro, playing Dave Moss, encapsulates blue-collar profanity in a glorious two-minute monologue. After he ends his tirade towards Roma with a sneering "I never liked you," Decaro received a round of applause as he left the stage.

Although Shelly "The Machine" Levene gets the best lines in Mamet's script, Roma as the materialistic jerk invites the strongest audience reaction.

Mamet is known as the pen behind films such as Wag the Dog, State and Main, and American Buffalo, but a Mamet play is still the thing for fans of raw realism.

The power in every line, every shouted profanity, conveys the frustration and tenacity that pervades a stressful job. In Glengarry Glen Ross, Mamet creates characters both loveable and despised, enviable and pitiful, engaging and memorable.

Baseball rosters dotted with more than a few Jewish players

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The late Max Patkin, the "clown prince of baseball," had an interesting opinion as to why there weren't more Jews in baseball.

Patkin, who entertained primarily minor league audiences and whose trademark uniform and cap are displayed in the Baseball Hall of Fame, once remarked: "The reason more Jews aren't playing baseball is that they don't want to ride the buses."

Well, perhaps the observation had some substance at one time, but today the minor and major leagues' baseball rosters are dotted with more than a few Jewish players.

Los Angeles Dodgers' right fielder Shawn David Green is the most prominent Jewish player in baseball. The 30-year-old left-handed hitting outfielder is coming off a season in which he hit .285, his career average, and led his team in homers (42), RBIs (114) and runs scored (110).

The Stanford grad, who was a first-round selection of the Blue Jays in 1991, is entering the third season of his lucrative six-year pact with the Dodgers.

A member of the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Los Angeles, the 6-foot-4 slugger also stands tall in the world of charity, donating $250,000 each year to the Dodgers' Dream Foundation.

Gabe Kapler

May 23, 2002, was a memorable day for Green when he smacked four home runs and went six for six at the plate in a single game against Milwaukee. His 19 total bases set a major league record.

Outfielder Gabe Kapler, 27, started last season with Texas, and on July 31, was traded to the Colorado Rockies. He had previously played with Detroit in his four-year major league career.

In only 315 at bats in 2002, Kapler hit .279, managed only two home runs, and drove in another 34. Each spring, baseball mavens suggest his breakout season is imminent. The good news is that in trade talks, Kapler's name always surfaces. The bad news is that his potential has a definite shelf life.

The 1998 Minor League Player of the Year with Lakeland, Kapler is also a weight lifter and promoter of physical fitness. He may have given a hint of things to come when, after being acquired from Texas last year, he hit .311 in 40 games.

Bradley David Ausmus, 34, a catcher with the Houston Astros, is entering his 10th season in the majors. The son of a Jewish mother, he had the dubious distinction last year of tying a National League record by grounding into 30 double plays.

On the other hand, the defensive star, who enjoyed a league-leading .997 fielding average and won his second consecutive Rawlings Gold Glove Award, has few peers when it comes to handling pitching staffs. Not to mention that he is among the top receivers in throwing out baserunners (31 of 96).

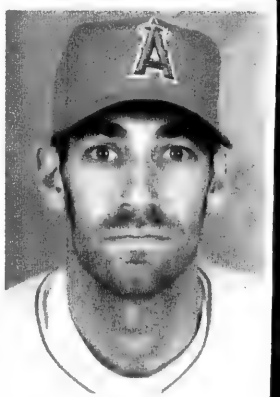
Last season, Ausmus batted .257, walloped six home runs and drove in 50.

Catcher Jesse Levis, at age 35, will start the season on the Phillies' farm at AAA Scranton-Wilkes Barre.

Levis last played in the majors in 2001 with Milwaukee, hitting .242 in only 33 at bats.

Al Levine, a relief hurler who was released by Anaheim during the winter and again in late March by St. Louis, still hopes to return to the majors. In early April he signed a minor league pact with the Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

Turning to Atlanta, the question remains: which Jason Marquis will take the mound on behalf of the Braves in 2003? Will it be the right-hander who went 6-4 with an ERA of 3.95 prior to the all-star break or the struggling 24-year-old who sank to 2-5 and an ERA of 6.97 in 10 starts in the second half?



Al Levine

Marquis, 24, who was raised in a Conservative household, attended Hebrew school and observes the major Jewish holidays. He is doubtless being counted upon by the Braves with the loss of Tom Glavine to the Mets.

Pitcher Mike Koplove, 26, came out of nowhere last season to star with Arizona. He opened the season at AAA Tuscon and fashioned an ERA of 1.17 in 23 relief appearances. Small wonder he received the call from the Diamondbacks where he went 6-1 with an ERA of 3.36 in 55 games.

Watch also for promising right-handed starter Justin Wayne, who was 3-2 with an ERA of 5.32 for the Florida Marlins. He will begin the season on the disabled list with a lower leg contusion.

I'll bet Theo Epstein, the new and youngest major league GM ever, wouldn't mind acquiring several of the aforementioned for his Boston Red Sox.

Oh yes, one more thing, there are still a number of promising draft picks out there such as Matt Siegel, Kevin Youkilis, Adam Greenberg, Marc Goldberg, Jake Epstein and Brad Rosenblat who wouldn't mind riding buses in the minors... for a while at least.

Israel's 'future history' needs us

By JODI KOVITZ

As 20-something Canadian Jews, most of us are linked to Israel in some significant capacity. We are Israeli citizens. Our family and friends reside there. We attended Tel Aviv University or the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. We grew up attending Hebrew day schools. We went on Birthright. We participated in the March of the Living.

Aside from our personal sentiments toward the country and its beauty, Israel's continued existence plays an integral role in the future of the Jewish people. To me, current events in Israel and the re-emergence of anti-Semitism pose very real threats to our future. What is our role in this crisis? Can we do anything?

I recently witnessed an incident at York University that both shocked and inspired me. A poster hung in a central hall by a student-led Palestinian organization bore a large yellow Magen David resembling those worn during the Holocaust. It also contained Hebrew letters that did not actually form Hebrew words, and English messages claiming that Jews as a religious group participate in ethnic cleansing and war crimes.

The poster's blatant anti-Semitic message, and the university's non-reaction, shook me to the core. But one young woman's action inspired me.

Brooke Elsner took it upon herself to challenge the Palestinian group demanding that they take down the poster. When they refused, she called the police to report the incident as a hate crime. She then contacted members of the university's administration, who cared more about crowd control than conflict resolution or discrimination policy. The poster was eventually taken down.

Brooke was successful that day. She stopped the communication of a false and misleading message about the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. She stood up to an anti-Semitic action. I commend her for her bravery. Her message was clear and strong: we must come together in voice and action to fight anti-Semitism and support Israel's struggle. These problems will not go away on their own.

Brooke's personal message to me was: "What angered me most was the yellow Magen David, the sign clearly intended to mimic how the Jews were identified during the Holocaust. Disgusted, all I could think about was how my grandparents' families were forced to suffer in ghettos and concentration camps. Their memory was my guiding light that day."

Two 20-somethings in Montreal, Elan Kunin and Lisa Rubin, have recently recorded a song, Future History. The first verse of their beautiful song is a call to action: "Children in the street/ Soldiers to be/ Selflessly live their lives for you, and me./ Though they're far away/ They know they're not alone/ I'm ready to give all I am for my home."

As 20-something Jewish Canadians, we may wonder what our role is in supporting Israel at the present time. Is it enough to speak out against anti-Semitism? Do we have a duty to visit Israel, particularly now?

These are disturbing questions for all of us, and I plan to explore them in my next column. I welcome your input at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Pesach is the educational holiday, par excellence. It is living, historical proof of two important principles in education. First, it illustrates the efficacy of experiential learning; and second, it reinforces the family's primary role in the education of its children.

The seder is a classic example of the early adaptation of an outside model to suit our pedagogic needs. We took the experience of those first families in Egypt who lived through Pesach shel Mitzrayim (the first Pesach as described in Exodus), blended it with what our rabbis knew of the classic Greek dinner/discussion (see Plato's Symposium) and founded a formula for Pesach shel dorot that has lasted for millennia in every land we ever settled in.

The seder is a pageant that doesn't just tell a tale. It causes us to live that tale as if we too were among those saved from slavery. Every one of our senses is bombarded by the message, so that every kind of learner (i.e., the four sons) can find a way to integrate the story and its message. We even eat the symbols so that our bodies will absorb the meaning. Education at its best!

While we learn about Pesach in school and we pray on Pesach in the synagogue, the family in its own home is the focus of this holiday. How many children over the ages have made every effort to get home for Pesach? The cleaning that starts after Purim, the new clothes, the shopping, the kashering – all of these activities before the 15th of Nisan are home-based and involve the entire family.

Pesach itself, with the sedarim and the special dishes, is a holiday that reinforces family ties and the central role that parents play in the education of their children by creating the right kind of home. We have abdicated responsibility for most formal education to schools, but Pesach reminds us each year of the great power the home has for teaching both values and behaviour.

Since that first pass over our homes in Egypt, Passover has become our constant teacher of who we really are, where we come from and what is expected of us.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

To our readers

Pesach is here once again and we are pleased to present our seventh annual literary supplement. This year, as in the past, we received many wonderful submissions from what appears to be a growing number of talented Canadian Jewish writers. The amount made our decisions on what to publish more difficult and yet more exciting. We hope that the writers whose pieces we could not accommodate in this section will perhaps be inspired by this collection of work and continue their literary pursuits.

In the coming pages, you will find a mix of poems on Jewish themes with a fresh twist. Also included are stories, both amusing and solemn, and essays on two literary greats, Chaim Potok and A.B. Yehoshua. So after all your hard work preparing for the holiday, sit down and relax and, in the true spirit of this Festival of Freedom and of Spring, enjoy.

Shlomo's Wound

by Ronald Ruskin

Shlomo, my little brother, was a big nudnik. When I returned from summer camp, he stuck to me like glue. He was five and I was 12. We shared the same bedroom. Bubba had arthritis so my job was to watch over him.

"Reuben. What are we going to do today?"

"I'm in bed." I pointed to my body. "I'm sleeping."

"But why? Why are you sleeping?"

"Birds aren't flying. It is five a.m."

"Because why?" Shlomo asked.

Shlomo was too young to tell time. I was his clock.

* * *

Before the sky lightened, Shlomo was awake. He fidgeted in bed and asked questions. What makes noises? Who's in the basement? Can I put the TV on? Where does the sun go?

Shlomo worried about TV. When it was on, it made a pop, got bright, then dark. A white dot grew in the centre of the screen. Faces went up, down, or side to side.

"Reuben. Why does the face wiggle?"

"It needs to be fixed."

"When it wiggles will it come back? Does the face go into the wire? Does the wire go into the phone?"

Who could keep up with Shlomo?

He had come out into the world backwards, Bubba said. From the start, he was smart but mixed up. For him, answers were questions. Questions were answers. He refused meals unless he started with desert. Ice cream he loved. When he talked, his words wiggled sideways like a TV.

He never kept still. He asked everyone questions.

Passghetti was his main food, strollybears were his favorite fruit, white ice cream was dessert, Boblaws was our supermarket. For fun, Shlomo ran backwards up the street.

* * *

Shlomo had coal eyes and raven hair. By the end of August, his skin turned nut-brown from sun. My father said he was a wild Indian.

A Schwarzekind, Bubba called him.

Each morning he awakened me: "Reuben, I want food."

I rolled into my pillow. "The birds are sleeping."

"Reuben. I want French toast."

"Please. Let me sleep."

"I'll cook myself —"

"Shlomo! Don't cook."

I flew from bed to the kitchen. I sliced challah, broke an egg, tzaclapped it with milk, soaked bread in a bowl, and put the bread on a hot skillet with butter.

Nobody was up. Between Bubba, mother and father, our house shook with wild snores. If a plane crashed on our driveway, who heard? If the Russians dropped an H-bomb on Bathurst Street, my family would sleep through the blast. One morning, Shlomo made a big fire, baking bread in the stove, but who knew? You could not leave him alone.

I got famished watching him.

"Here. French toast, okay."

"Put strollybears on my plate."

After breakfast, we went to Cedarvale Ravine behind our house.

* * *

Before school started, we hunted bees and ladybugs and put them in baby bottles. I put holes in the top so the insects breathed. We caught worms, slugs, butterflies, pollywogs and grasshoppers.

"Kill them all," Shlomo said.

"No. We catch them and set them free."

"I want to squish them."

"Why?"

"I want to kill."

"Shlomo. We don't kill bugs."

"Bugs kill bugs. If bugs were us and we were bugs, bugs would kill us," Shlomo said.

"Who told you that?"

"I've seen bug wars," Shlomo said.

"Shlomo, we don't kill anyone." That evening saw a TV program on murder. All death-row murderers died in the electric chair.

After that, Shlomo stopped talking about killing.

* * *

By the end of summer, I was too busy with Shlomo to join my friends. Shlomo and I played tag, caught insects, and schlepped to watch baseball at the ravine. My friends Sam, Lorne and Ziggy had a regular game there.

"Reuben! C'mon. Join us."

"I have to watch Shlomo."

"Tell him to zetz and geeb a kik."

"Shlomo. Sit."

"I want to play," Shlomo said.

"Shlomo, give me a break. Watch me."

"I want to play."

Shlomo sat on the grass. I played. A minute later, he was nudging me. "Reuben. Let's catch grasshoppers."

* * *

What do I remember?

It was a hazy summer Sunday afternoon. In the fields, sea gulls flew and grasshoppers jumped. I wore a shirt Bubba bought me. Sweating from the heat, I rolled up my sleeves. Sam and Lorne asked me to hit flies to them. I thought I was Mickey Mantle and watched how far I hit the ball. Ziggy had a new Louisville Slugger.

"It's magic. Try it. Touch the ball – it flies."

"Reuben," Shlomo said. "Let's catch snakes."

"Shlomo. Look, I'm hitting." I threw the hardball up in the air with one hand, pulled the bat back with both hands, then drove the ball deep to centre field.

"Let me hit, too," Shlomo said.

"No," I said. "Watch me."

"Let me hit. Please."

We argued. Shlomo grew quiet. I looked across the field, waving Lorne, Sam and Ziggy farther back.

"Way back," I said. "This will be over your heads."

Sweat dripped from my hands. I threw the ball up and gripped the bat. As I connected with all my force, there was a sound as if the ball became larger and softer. I did not understand until Sam yelled from the field.

"Reuben!"

'His eyes might close forever'

I dropped the bat. When I turned around, Shlomo stood, his lips parted, his dark eyes stared at me, his mouth wide open. I saw darkness. He tried to breathe. Nothing came out. I lifted him in my arms.

"Shlomo? Say something?"

He stared at me.

"Shlomo?"

Seconds later, he screamed. It was an awful wail that lasted forever. Under his dark hair was a tear, a hole above his forehead. Blood poured over his face. I took my shirt off and pressed it to his head, lifting him through the field, running for help.

An old couple took us in their car. I saw their fear.

My shirt was soaked with blood. Shlomo lay in my arms sobbing. A few streets later, a police car took us to the downtown children's hospital. When I phoned home, Bubba answered. No one else was home.

* * *

"Nu? Vas vilst du?"

"Shlomo had an accident," I said.

"Nu? Where are you?"

"The hospital."

"The hospital? Gevalt. Vas es ge shen?"

"I hit Shlomo with a bat. In the head."

"In the kop you hit him?" When bad things happened she repeated everything.

"You hit your bruter mit a bat? A bat you hit with? A bat, Reuben?"

"By mistake."

"By mistake? A mistake it was?" Bubba was a worrier. In crises, though, she had nerves like Stalin. "Reuben. Watch Shlomo. Make sure doctors know what they do. Don't let them touch his head. You hear?"

Bubba didn't trust doctors. Bubba didn't trust lawyers. Bubba didn't trust strangers. She called Feter Herschel, my uncle, our family doctor. She told him to come to the children's hospital.

It was life or death, Bubba said.

* * *

The doctors examined Shlomo. I pressed Shlomo's hand and he was quiet as a Greek statue.

"I am sorry, Shlomo."

Not once did he move.

They put bandages on his head. Every now and then, a new doctor came in, looked me over, lifted the head bandage, frowned at the blood, and shook his head.

I figured Shlomo was fading. Soon I would be on death row waiting for the hot-seat.

"Can you talk, Shlomo? Tell them it was a mistake."

He looked at the surgical light. He shook his head.

The head doctor asked questions. Did my brother talk? How old was he? Did he have pain in his head or vomit? Was he unconscious?

"He screamed all the way to the hospital. Now he is quiet. He hasn't said anything."

"Is he always so calm?"

The doctors ordered him to move his toes and fingers. They checked his reflexes. They checked his eyes. They shook their heads. They gave him X-rays. Where was the pain? Shlomo didn't talk. He lay still. He stared at the ceiling.

"I'm afraid it's serious," the head doctor said.

"Why?" I asked.

"He's not communicating."

I bent over my brother. "Shlomo. Go talk."

Nothing happened.

"I'm sorry, Shlomo. Honest. You want me to die too?"

Shlomo nodded.

"Me? But I just took my eyes off you one second."

I cried all the way to X-ray. I asked doctors if he had any blood left or if his brains were ruined.

"He is under observation," the head doctor said.

They read his EKG and stared at me like I was Al Capone. For two hours, Shlomo did not talk. I held his hand and checked my watch waiting for my parents and Feter Herschel. Any moment I worried Shlomo's eyes might close forever. Then I would go to death row.

It was the worst day of my life.

* * *

Finally, Shlomo mumbled two words.

"What?" I asked.

He mumbled again.

"What?"

It sounded like ice cream.

A doctor held up two fingers. "How many?"

"Two scoops. White ice cream. With strolly-bears."

* * *

My family arrived.

The doctors gave Shlomo a needle. They stitched up his head. They sent him for more X-rays.

He ate vanilla ice cream and strawberries for supper. He ate vanilla ice cream and strawberries for breakfast and lunch too. He stayed in hospital one week eating dessert.

After the accident, everyone visited Shlomo. He was a big celebrity. "So, Reuben," they joked, "you decapitated the little pisher." Cousin Yitz pinched my cheek. "Next time, use a goalie stick." Sy Shwartz, our neighbour said, "You did good, Reuben. You changed him. He's calmer."

In those days, my family members swore by a good beating. Growing up a Jew, Yitz said, you took and you gave. I was a nervous wreck.

My mother washed my shirt so the blood was gone. I never wore it again. I took my allowance and bought Shlomo a ukulele and a plastic bat.

Shlomo forgave me. But I never felt relief.

I went to the library and read books on neurology and psychology. I read about concussions, skull fractures, epilepsy, brain hemorrhage, tumors and comas. I figured I was a psychopath. I read about Freud and unconscious guilt.

So many things could go wrong with your brain. Being a Jew, you naturally thought the worst.

For years to come, I worried each night.

Shlomo stopped eating vanilla ice cream. He stopped asking questions and walking backwards. He grew up.

But I worried I had ruined his mind.

Sabbath Liturgy

by Philip Amsel

To our parents

Today, I went to shul,
And asked myself,
As we davened,

Are we left only
With the memories
Of our achievements?

Our call for salvation is
The recurrent symbol
For our failures.

Success and failure,
However, are played out
In a minor key

Because life
Is contingent, while
God's love is eternal!

It is the love
Which we can depend on,
And which saves.

Blessing

by Philip Amsel

you were like a god to me,
you were the trees, the weather;
your liberalism shone in your gestures,
I hid under your shawl too long.

now that you are gone,
the shadow of your eagle presence still covers my hands
as I bless the wine tonight.

Middle East Report 1

by Lainie Cohen

News splattered in rapid-fire sound bites:
Suicide bomber. Retaliatory air raid.

I mute the warnings. The pull of family stronger than fear.

You're brave, says my nephew in army fatigues, a machine gun slung over his shoulder casually as my son's knapsack.

Violence at night with mosquito attacks, their persistent drone in my ear, louder than traffic on the too-near highway.

We shop at the Arab market in Akko, bargain for plums, buy nectarines too hard to eat.

Teenagers at the Dolphin Disco become the headline news.

Middle East Report 2

by Lainie Cohen

My brother escapes
the report of Katyusha rockets and machine gun retort by burying his head under the blanket.

Get up, his wife says. Let's work in the garden or go for a walk.
She turns off the radio, cancels the paper.
He pulls the blanket higher.

His wife hums. Digging for weeds, sweeping the floor, she hums away thoughts of their son with his green beret, his tank and mortar shells.

In the chader ochel on the list of names is the son of her former classmate.
Move over, his wife says.
I need the blanket.

The Unveiling

by Lainie Cohen

I cup it in my palm a small stone, not pretty or special nothing more than a pebble really not flat and smooth and right for skipping
In the shallows she stood and cocked her wrist, her stone skittering across the surface in ever-widening circles

My father's side is grassy green ringed with red impatiens, hers ridged with dry dirt
I step around it, stare at the canvas bound by ropes, half-listen to the prayers my brothers intone.
My nephew reads a poem in Hebrew,
my youngest an elegy of his own.
We stand in the sun, my family, her friends and place pebbles on her stone.

Candy Revenge

by Elliot Stutz

My bar mitzvah took place at the Beth Sputnik Synagogue on Glenpudding Avenue, not 20 minutes away from my home. It was to be a grand affair in great style, with much pomp and other such phrases. A bar mitzvah is the seminal event in the life of every Jewish boy, and I was no exception. The Torah reading had to be learned more than half a year prior to the momentous Shabbat. As the grandson of my Zaideh, who is a bar mitzvah teacher, I had to perform well, or people would talk.

The Beth Sputnik Synagogue is the largest Orthodox synagogue in the city of Torthonton, which is, as most Ambearidans will tell you, the capital city of Cagaga (actually, Occotrall is the real capital of Cagaga, but being a much smaller city, Ambearidans have never heard of it). In recent years, Beth Sputnik had been plagued by its long ongoing feud between the Men's Auxiliary and the Sisterhood Club. The origin of the feud is vague, but the most reliable theory, cited by Ruby Rogglesberg, president of the Sisterhood, is that the upper mezzanine hall, inaugurated in the year 3063 and donated by the Bershlitzer family in memory of their deceased poodle, Farfel (as inscribed on the plaque in 22 different places around the hall, for example: The Upper Mezzanine Hall is donated in Loving Memory of Farfel. May his soul be eternally tied to the source of Everlasting Life) was intended to be used as a fundraising base for the Sisterhood, but was in fact used exclusively by the Men's Auxiliary for poker nights and euchre tournaments. Also, Max Wherhaftig, the vice president of the Auxiliary, and the secret owner of the largest Tiggy Toddler collection in Cagaga if not in all of North Ambearida, had stashed his entire Tiggy Toddler Companion collection in the empty cabinets of the upper mezzanine. Max then locked the cabinets and refused to divulge the location of the key, which he had actually duct-taped under the cholent pot of the shul's meat kitchen. The Sisterhood reacted to this outrage at first by using direct political methods at the shul board meetings, but then by resorting to unconventional tactics, when it became clear that the all-male board would not budge. These tactics included spiking the kiddush kugel with mace, and replacing the creamer in the Auxiliary fridge with low-fat creamer, considered by all as the nastier of the two moves.

The Auxiliary was not going to take these attacks sitting down, "or at least not lying down," promised Schlemiel Vandersbergergatinski, the Treasurer, as he heaved his prodigious weight into a sitting position at a particularly heated Auxiliary meeting (he had suffered terribly from the creamer incident). The Auxiliary responded in turn, with an array of measures, such as the confiscation of contraband feminist crossword puzzles from the women's powder room, and the exposure at the board meeting of an insidious plot to have the next shul gala dinner sabotaged with unkosher margarine in the main dish, mock lobster. The plot was of course a fabrication, protested Pushky Devushky, culinary chair of the sisterhood, "when we all know that Schlemiel and Max eat real lobster at home."

"I smell something fishy," he said, removing a pickled herring from underneath his skullcap

In any case, the smouldering feud between the two clubs was gradually becoming dirtier and dirtier, with the last astonishing retaliation the moonlit theft of Rose Shlepstien's ticket to the Sisterhood movie night, by her own husband, Herb. Poor Rose was humiliated when she arrived at the theatre for the showing of My Long Boring Norweffian Anniversary Party only to find that her ticket was missing. The next morning, the photocopied, blown up ticket had been plastered all over the Sisterhood office, with the phrase "Oh Sister, Where Art Thou?" written in lipstick underneath the movie title.

This last atrocity was so embarrassingly public, and yet so subtly conniving that the Sisterhood decided to go underground. For months they were silent, maintaining a serene exterior, while furious planning was going on beneath the surface: Unused basement bathrooms were converted into communication centers and loose floor boards in the women's sections became weapons caches. The back room at Soak-a-Bloke Inc., a kid's Toy store on Backthirst Street that sold water guns (like the "Mega-Shvitzer") and water games (like the "Slip and Crash" waterslide) and was run by Ruby Rogglesberg herself, was transformed into a research laboratory, where startling scientific progress was being made in unspeakable directions.

The men of the Auxiliary were taken in by the false quiet, and confidently proclaimed victory. Only Vishnik Krumplefrumple, the oldest member of the board (and the only individual who had personally witnessed the launching of the Rapuskian shuttle Sputnik, after which the shul had been named), was uneasy. "I smell something fishy," he said, removing a pickled herring from underneath his skullcap, "and it isn't herring!"

That is how matters stood at the onset of my bar mitzvah service, that fateful morning of Justinberry the 6th, 3068, which was afterward to be known as Black and Blue Sabbath.

'Cagagian criminal code stipulates the candy be soft'

It began quite harmlessly, with the commencement of the Shacharit (morning) service. I myself was nervous, as the cheat notes that I had written and hidden under my wristwatch had begun to smudge due to sweat. Soon Shacharit was over and the Torah service had begun. I was to chant the sixth and seventh sections of the weekly Torah portion.

In the men's section, Schlemiel was trying to steal herring from Vishnik. In the women's section, located in a balcony surrounding the men's section, unusually large baskets of candy were being passed around by Pushky and Rose. It was customary that at the end of the bar mitzvah boy's reading, the women would shower the boy with candies. This would typically cause the kids in shul to scramble around the floor for half a minute, collecting their booty. Cagagian criminal code stipulates that the candies be soft, sealed in plastic and manufactured sometime in the last 20 years. This was unfortunately not the only law to be violated that morning.

The first whizzing candy cut through the air beside my left ear

As I rose from my seat and proceeded to the altar to do my thing, I sensed a barely perceptible tingle of energy from above. A bead of sweat dropped from Rose's forehead and landed behind me. I began the reading well, considering the smudges on my notes, and my voice had not yet cracked. The sixth aliyah over, I looked to my father, who was beaming at me from his seat. "Go get 'em, tiger," he mouthed, with a smile, punching the air with his fist. I felt confident, happy. This was my moment. I launched into the seventh aliyah with gusto, not noticing the quiet rustling noises in the balcony.

Many things were going on in the balcony at that moment. They had been rehearsed several times, but this was the real thing. Handbags were being unzipped, floorboards removed, hats taken off, and hand-made parts assembled. I came to the last sentence in my reading and triumphantly chanted the benediction which signified its end, and unbeknownst to me, the end of many months of planning.

I heard the first whizzing candy cut through the air beside my left ear. Instinctively, I pulled my tallis (prayer shawl) over my head. I heard cries of joy around me. Joy, was it? No, it sounded more like pain. Suddenly, I felt a sharp jolt of pain in my right thigh – I felt as if I had been hit by a hard stone. Swerving to the left with my proverbial quickness, I narrowly missed being hit in the tuchus by another stinging projectile. All around me people were running madly into each other while clutching injured limbs and screaming like little children. I ducked for cover under the altar and then took a peek at the attack from above. The sight was truly shocking. Led by Ruby Rogglesberg, the women "snipers" were shooting extremely hard candies at their male counterparts using what looked to be modified water guns!

"Ha ha!" screamed Rose at Herb, as she nailed her husband between the eyes with a stale gumdrop.

"Don't you ever go through my stuff again!"

"Eat fructose, borsht-belly!" wailed Rita, Schlemiel's wife, gunning him down.

"Take that, Krumplefrumple!" screamed my own grandmother (to my dismay), as she peppered the old geezer with hard-as-steel Jawbreakers from a plastic sub-machine gun, settling an ancient grudge from the Old Country.

"Ladies," bellowed Max Wherhaftig, from behind the Holy Ark, "please cease this senseless violence!"

"Not until you let us use the mezzanine hall," answered Ruby Rogglesberg, in a cool stern voice.

"Never!" shrieked Max, brandishing a Tiggy Toddler BB gun from his vest pocket, and running in the direction of the exit. Ruby had anticipated this craven escape and signalled to Rose and Pushky. The latter two aimed fire hoses at the shul president and let loose. The high-powered crossfire sent Max sprawling, and he lay on the floor babbling about Tiggy Toddlers until he was removed by the police who arrived later on, just after the media.

That evening, in the hospital ward, in a bed beside my father's, and two down from my grandfather's, we ruminated together over some old Eshlick Toffee.

"I can't believe they caught us with our backs turned!" exclaimed my grandfather, who had suffered only minor injuries and was to be released by Monday. "Such a thing would never have happened in the Old Country."

"Shlurbble brupp, dupp!" said my father, talking through a tube. He had not fared as well.

"Hey, this toffee's not half bad," said Schlemiel to no one in particular, from across the room.

"Women," sighed Max, "you can't live with 'em, but k'naina hora, they make good food."

The other conscious men on the ward muttered their agreement. Both the war and my bar mitzvah were over. The Sisterhood had won. I was a man.

Wisdom

by Daniel Farb

When my grandparents were my age,
they were slaves to monsters.

Now they are slaves to pain from the past and present.

They get monthly cheques from Germany, in sympathy and regret.
Money…
To heal?

I see my mother and uncle trying to help them with little success.
Helplessness
creeps up my spine and threatens to take hold.

When I see them,
when I examine their tired,
loving faces,
I know they've been through the most horrible hell in history, and now they suffer again
with arthritis, depression,
and disease
after incurable disease.
So the doctors give them pill after pill.

Zaidy Ziggy, who has somehow managed to retain his humour through all his pain, told my brothers and I
that he eats thirty pills for breakfast every day.

Bubbie Ruth,
whose love for me
I have never doubted, seems so tired,
so concerned and scared.
In and out of hospitals ever since I can remember,
I'm scared for her too.

Still,
through an ignorance
that sought to crush them, through diseases that seek to destroy them,
they live.

They live
so my brothers, cousins, parents, aunts and uncles can learn from them, so the wisdom they have can help us live our lives with wisdom.

And I know the wisdom they share is authentic because extraordinary people have extraordinary problems.

Footsteps crunching through the snow… shhh… don't wake the sun!

A hundred thousand snowflakes sparkle and dance to the wind under the streetlamp's watchful eye. I marvel at the profound performance I am privy to.

It is so bitter cold, but thoughts of you, Yocheved, make me smile, and warm me.

I clutch my tallis and tfillin bag, and I feel like the only man on Earth, as I hasten the white darkness to do the Will of my Creator, and I smile.

My American Cousin

by Igal Hecht

Shalom my American Cousin.
I say cousin,
When before,
Long ago,
We were brothers.

Remember those times?

I was small,
Frail and Weak.
And you defended me.
You flexed your tanned muscles,
Exposing the surgically enhanced soul
Underneath the face of duplicity
That held up a million-dollar smile.

I gave you pleasure,
A sense of self worth.
I couldn't survive without you,
And I could do no wrong
In your Indigo eyes.

Shalom my American cousin.
How times have changed.

I grew,
Developed.
I am now able to hold my own ground.
To carve out an identity
From scattered ashes.

This seems to perplex you.
Your self worth diminished.
You detest my defiant nature,
Uncompromising,
All in the name of survival,
While you worship the golden calf.

Remember when I was young,
You used to visit at any given time.
Shower me with gifts
Whisper the gospels from the Holy city of Babylon,
Where towers once stood.

Now, on my own two feet,
Your pearls scorn.
You no longer visit,
You no longer see me
To be a member of Your home.

Maybe if I return
To my child-like status,
Deflate my weight
Hunger for substance once again,
The kind which defines you
And your offspring.
That hollowness,
Emptiness,
Conformity,
Maybe then you'd be my sibling?

Shalom my American cousin.
I watched you on TV,
As you waved David's shield
You flashed your million-dollar smile,
From twenty thousand miles away.

Bubby

by Myra Shuster

A racket of tweeting budgies greets me from behind the glass cage at the entrance to Snowdon Seniors' Residence. The magnet-board on the reception desk reads tantalizingly: "Lunch today: roast turkey, mashed potatoes, peas, carrots, strawberry jello and mocha cake." Javex bleach and the pungent smell of burnt gravy fill the air. Lunch has just been served. I wait to take the elevator to my grandmother's room on the sixth floor. As the doors open, a woman hunched into a backwards letter C, dowager's hump forming the upper curve, inadvertently hooks her walker under my boot.

"'S'cuse me dear," she rasps, and shakes the metal skeleton loose from under my foot, clanking out an uneven rhythm as she makes her way down the hall.

The doors open to the sixth floor. Melding with the Chantilly lavender powder of Mrs. Hathaway in #604, and the nutmeg, ylang-ylang of Mr. Mendelbaum's Old Spice after shave, in #608, is the sour smell of pee lingering in places overlooked by mops and sponges for too long, and in diapers due for changing. By the time I reach Bubby at the end of the hallway in #610, I'm straining not to inhale.

I knock on the door hard. No reply. I turn the knob and enter, catching sight of my grandmother, an unmoving fixture in her black leatherette rocker. The nurse has placed a yellowed crocheted shawl over her hunched shoulders. The heat wafts up from the cranky radiators and beads of sweat are forming on my upper lip. Bubby stares into mid-air.

"Bubby?" I call out loudly from the doorway. No reply. (I'm always afraid I'll find her speechless, like she was during her breakdown.) I wade through the stagnant air and bend to sit on the foot stool near her so she can see my face.

"Hi Bubby, it's Marla. I came to see you. How are you?"

She lifts her head in slow motion and her face melts into a smile.

"Oy, maydeleh, sheyna punem, sveetie. You came to see me!"

I lean to kiss the soft, loose skin on her cheek. She gropes to find my hand and holds it tight.

"So how have you been, Bubby?" I say loudly.

"So and so, not so goot, you know? I'm no goot no more," she says, shaking her head. "My shoulder is killing me. My stohmik's rotten. I hed enough a'ready," she pauses.

"My nurse is vunderful. But ven she's not here, I can vait hours 'til dey come to help me get dressed. I'm no goot no more."

She looks down again, and disappears into herself. She seems to have forgotten I'm here. (Bubby, come back, don't leave me now. Remember me, your little maydeleh in red?) Suddenly, moved by a mysterious internal prompt, she looks up.

"Nu, how're da cheeldren?" she asks, her face lighting up.

"They're fine. They keep me on my toes. The teachers all say nice things about Justin – he's smart, sensitive, a good leader. At home though I have to keep my eye on him. You remember, eh, Bubby, how it was with your three boys and Mommy? I don't know how you managed."

"Shooor I remember. Little toivils. T'anks God I had your mameh to help me. Don't vorry mameleh, your boy vill straighten out... And da leetle vun, how's she doing?"

"She's adorable. Now she takes tap dancing lessons, Bubby. Every day it's another show. We buy pretend tickets. We come to the pretend theatre, we get dressed up pretend, we clap our hands. She takes a bow. It's beautiful. The same thing every day."

Bubby's laughing now, her belly heaving in and out under her red sweater, blue eyes tearing. I'm afraid something might burst inside her.

Our repertoire of subjects of conversation complete, we're quiet again. The silences make me begin to feel desperate, because they lasted so long when she was sick.

The green carpeting by her bed still shows the blood stains from her last fall. She woke early one morning and tried to pull her nightie over her head. Lost her balance and smashed her head on the corner of the TV table. I can't help studying the strange weave they make, a little splotch in the centre seeping into three bigger ones on all sides. Like a map of the spoils of war. Or of Svisloch, the little disputed town she lived in. Originally part of Russia, then overtaken by Poland, then occupied by Germany. She learnt Russian, Polish and German all before the age of eight. (Is it not knowing whether to put the subject or the object first that made her retreat into silence so many times in her life? Or never knowing whether she herself was the subject or the object in a destiny carved out by forces beyond her?)

When I recorded her oral history on video years ago, she described the circumstances that led to her exile to Canada:

"I vas only 17, but I loved him. He was a Bundist, and he esked me to carry some propagandeh in my underverr to da next town. So I did. Den, ve found out dey vere looking for us. My parents verr scared. So dey sent me to Canadeh. I vent on da same boat as David Lewis."

The family she left behind looks down at me from a brown gilt-framed photo on the wall behind her. Her mother wears a Mona Lisa smile, long black hair parted down the middle, pulled tightly in a bun at the nape of her neck. A neat and proper woman, Bubby told me, who loved to read and made sure the outhouse "shmect vunderful." Father, full, dark moustache, long- fitted waistcoat, arm around his wife's waist as if to pull her closer. Little sister smiling for the camera, long ringlet curls pulled playfully up in white bows, like cocker spaniel ears. Little brother in white shirt and black knickers, brows knitted as if to ask, with uncanny foresight, "Why?"

The photo is the only remnant of Bubby's family. They were all gassed to death in Hitler's crematoria. Along with the other Jews of Svisloch.

(Was it this news that sent her plummeting? Was the manic-depressive diagnosis just lurking in the wings, waiting for a trigger? Who was she before all this? Did the electroshock therapy zap the self out of her, or help her find the self she'd lost? I've asked myself these questions for as long as I can remember.)

"Bubby, you have Bingo today?"

"Oy, I almost forgot. Vot time is it?" her lips drawn in tight, the crease in her forehead deepening as she squints at her large-faced watch.

"A quarter to one. Don't worry, I'll take you down on time. You need some pennies?"

"No, I got plenty."

I stand up and place myself behind the rocker to give her my customary goodbye back rub. I dig my thumbs into the stubborn knots of her shoulders. I massage the top of her right arm, an arthritic rock since my grandfather lost his balance on the ice years ago, fell down on her and broke her arm.

"Oy, oy, maydeleh, it's goot, it's goot," she says, letting out short breathy grunts, and shifting her shoulders a little left and a little right to direct me to the sore places. Then abruptly, "Okay, stop, it's enough. Enough."

Does she mean "Enough I don't deserve to feel this good," or "Enough I don't want anymore"? I'll never know. I've never known what she's really thinking.

The answers to my questions lie suspended in time, lost long ago in transit, somewhere between here and a devastated little town named Svisloch.

The Mirror

by Ricki Lerner

In the mirror they stare and what do they see?
Not their image today,
but the faces of their youth
when they first met, fifty years ago, in the springtime of their lives.

Love matured and soon they stood under the canopy:
"Dodi Li V'ani Lo" –
"My beloved is mine, and I am his."

Their love grew as years passed:
raising three children,
running a growing business,
tending aging parents,
keeping Jewish holidays,
helping synagogue and community, their lives flew like leaves in an autumn storm.

Now they gaze at their reflection and see their eyes sparkling, like diamonds on velvet;
they see their love,
strengthened through fifty years, their shared lives reflected in the mirror.

Rosh Hashanah

by Ricki Lerner

A new year!
May it bring new chances,
new hopes for peace and harmony;
may we see an end to conflict and reach out to each other with love and honour.

In our synagogues we chant the prayers of our ancestors.
Singing well-known melodies, whispering fervent pleas to the Almighty,
I stand in awe,
tears flooding my eyes.
For I remember Rosh Hashanah of long ago:
Baba and mother in the crowded shul,
urging us to stop squirming,
handing us apples, pears and candy;
Zaida and father
engrossed in heartfelt prayer, rapidly muttering and suddenly shouting ancient supplications to the Almighty; my sister, brother and I dressed in new attire, anxiously anticipating the family Yom Tov feast.
Walking down the streets of Winnipeg
we stop by each synagogue, greeting everyone with "A Good Year!"
Then – Baba's delicious, mouthwatering honey cake;
aunts, uncles and cousins overflow the room…

So I pray and chant and once again dedicate myself to the Holy One,
Blessed be He.

Amen.

Child support, spousal support and your taxes: knowing the rules can save you money

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

I thank my friend Howard Halpern for assisting me in developing the following important slice of information for this tax season. Howard Halpern, C.A., C.P.A., C.F.P., is a Tax and Financial Advisor whose professional designations include Chartered Accountant (Canada), Certified Public Accountant (USA), and Certified Financial Planner. For the past 20 years he has managed a full-service tax, accounting and management consulting firm, providing a wide range of critical advisory services to both individuals and businesses. Howard can be reached by telephone at 905.709.4357, via e-mail at hhcacpa@rogers.com, or on the web at www.howardhalpern.com.

Most of Howard's news is a good review of existing law. But some of it is important new information that is crucial to potential recipients of spousal support who have spent thousands of dollars in legal fees, without any tax relief, trying to collect this support. This situation appears to have now changed, retroactively, creating a bonanza for many, particularly women in need.

Spousal support payments, alimony and maintenance

Effective January 1, 1997, the terms "alimony" and "maintenance" were replaced by the term "support amount". Amounts that were tax deductible before 1997 under the old rules will continue to be tax deductible under the new rules. A payment to a third party can also qualify as a support amount provided it meets certain criteria. Such a payment is tax deductible by the payer of such support, and will be included in the income of the recipient (either the current or former spouse or common-law partner), whether it is paid directly to that person or to a third party on that person's behalf.

With the extension of the definition of spouse to include a common-law partner, the distinction between "alimony" and "maintenance" for income tax purposes has essentially disappeared in cases where separation occurred after 1992. The tax rules recognize as "maintenance" post-1992 Court-ordered payments in relationships where there is no marriage under the new common-law rules.

A payment to a third party may also qualify as alimony or maintenance if it meets certain criteria. A payment which is deductible by a payer under these provisions will be included in the income of the recipient spouse or former spouse whether it is paid directly to that spouse or to a third party on the spouse's behalf.

The CCRA (formerly known as Revenue Canada) issues a very informative pamphlet called Support Payments (P102) which provides a detailed account of the rules on divorce and separation.

Deductibility of support payments

There are very specific rules as to when support payments are deductible. Before 1997, all payments meeting certain criteria for either marriage breakdown, or support of a child in the absence of a marriage, were deductible. For 1997 and later years, such payments are deductible only to the extent that they do not constitute child support payments.

There are very detailed rules applicable to a marriage breakdown occurring before 1993 or after 1992. Generally speaking, for these time periods you can only deduct payments made pursuant to an order, decree, judgment or written separation agreement. In addition, the payments must be allowances payable on a specific periodic basis (i.e. paid weekly, monthly, or yearly, not on a lump sum, one-time, or occasional basis). If you pay additional amounts which are not pursuant to the above, you will not be allowed a deduction for these additional amounts. A payment which is deductible by you will be included in the income of the recipient.

If, as a spousal support payer, you file for a deduction, please remember that the recipient will now be paying taxes on the money she receives from you. So if you want to avoid broiges (friction), you would do well to consult with her before doing so.

Child support payments after April 30, 1997

Effective May 1, 1997, a new system of taxation was implemented. Under this system, there is a distinction between payments earmarked for child support and those designated to support a former spouse or common-law partner. Child support payments are not taxable to the recipient, nor are they deductible to the payer; but support payments to a former spouse or common-law partner will continue to be taxable to the recipient and deductible to the payer subject to certain criteria.

The new rules apply automatically to payments required under agreements or orders made after April 30, 1997. There is also a general presumption that payments are child support payments unless otherwise identified (as spousal support or something else, such as a property payment), and new system agreements which provide for taxable/deductible payments, as opposed to child support payments, must be registered with CCRA using prescribed forms. If the new rules do not apply to you, you do not have to register an order or agreement with CCRA if it was made before May 1, 1997. (There are also complex transitional rules that govern the implementation of the new system; you should check with the CCRA or with a qualified professional if unsure how to apply them).

Alimony and maintenance payments

In general, any payments which are deductible to one spouse or common-law partner and not denied as deductible child support payments, are taxable to the recipient spouse or common-law partner. Similarly, payments to third parties which are deductible to one spouse or common-law partner are taxable to the other as if they had been received directly by the spouse or common-law partner for whose benefit they are paid.

Lump sum payments

If you make a lump sum payment in settlement of any right to your spouse or common-law partner, even though it was a payment in respect of a periodic allowance in the future, you will not be able to deduct the lump sum payment.

For instance, say the payer calculates that a single $100,000 equals two years of monthly payments of about $4,000. That single payment, if made, does not qualify for a deduction. If a lump sum payment is paid in more than one installment, it is still not deductible as it is still considered a lump sum payment.

To ensure the payments are periodic, the payer should make sure that the order or written agreement requires that the amounts be paid at regular intervals and should have cancelled cheques or receipts to prove that they were actually paid in this manner. In addition, for such payments to be deductible they must be fixed at predetermined amounts.

Deductibility of legal fees

CCRA is very specific as to when legal fees are considered deductible for tax purposes. Prior to October 10, 2002, legal fees incurred in establishing the rights to alimony or maintenance (more recently, support payments for a spouse or common-law partner) were considered by CCRA not to be tax deductible. However, with respect to child support and other payments, the pre-October 10, 2002 rules (and continuing under the new policy) provide that legal fees incurred to obtain or enforce an established right to obtain such payments are deductible. The right may arise from a written agreement, a Court Order or legislation such as the Family Law Act.

Legal costs of obtaining child support

In Interpretation Bulletin IT-99R5, the CCRA took the position that legal fees to obtain child support under the Divorce Act were not deductible because they were spent on creating a right rather than on enforcing the pre-existing legal right to insist than a parent support his or her child. However, subsequent technical opinions revealed that CCRA reversed its position and now accepts that legal costs in respect of a child support order issued under the Divorce Act are generally deductible. Strangely, its view is that this change in position is effective only with respect to payments made after December 5, 2000. This means that a recipient of child support cannot deduct legal fees incurred to obtain a child support order before December 5, 2000.

Legal fees to defend against a legal motion or suit to reduce the support amount are deductible. However, it is less clear what happens when one defends against a motion to dispute the basic right to taxable alimony.

Request for revision of prior year tax returns

Fortunately, under rules enacted December 17, 1991, CCRA permits you to request revision of a previously filed tax return for 1985 and later years. CCRA is given discretion to reassess a previously filed tax return at your request in order to give effect to a reduction in your tax liability or to a late refund request. CCRA must be satisfied that the request for adjustment would have been processed if it had been made by you within the normal reassessment period. Guidelines are available to clarify such circumstances. Accordingly, you may wish to visit a Chartered Accountant who can assist you with such revisions.

Summary of recent changes

Prior to October 10, 2002, legal fees incurred to establish the right to support payments for a spouse or common-law partner were considered by Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) not to be deductible on the grounds that they were a personal, or capital, expense. On October 10, 2002, in draft Income Tax Technical News No. 24, the CCRA reversed its position, thenceforth permitting the deduction of legal costs to obtain spousal support under the Divorce Act, or under applicable provincial legislation in a separation agreement.

In addition, CCRA will now accept that legal costs for seeking to obtain an increase in spousal support — or to make child support non-taxable under the Federal Child Support Guidelines — are also deductible. This change in position is effective for future assessments or reassessments but will not apply retroactively unless a notice of objection was filed and is still outstanding, or can still be filed. Such a notice can only be filed within one year after a Notice of Assessment has been issued. Therefore, if such costs were incurred in a previous year for which a notice of objection can still be filed, you should file that notice while you still can.

I appreciate that this is a lot of technical information to digest, but if it affects you or any of your friends or relatives, you could save yourself (or them) a lot of money. You may wish to consider some of these issues before filing your 2002 tax return.

On behalf of myself, my family and the firm of Beard Winter LLP, I wish you a Happy and Healthy Passover.

The Vet's Shard

by Elizabeth Shields

Iroquois Falls is not a particularly good place to come from if you are seeking a high-class Jewish education. True, it has a street called Synagogue Street, though no one can tell you why. Perhaps because when the Abitibi-Price paper mill was built around 1913, the place became a company town with a mixture of nationalities and religions.

That's how my Pa ended up in that northern Ontario town by the Abitibi River close to where the railway line ends. You go where the jobs are. And that's how I, blessed with a name like Zuriel Stein, was born in the falls.

I studied veterinary medicine, though my father would have preferred "real medicine," he said, or at least pharmacy. So now I have a flourishing practice in a Toronto suburb, Epping Mills, and a lovely wife and grown-up daughter.

Life, though, had been getting somewhat humdrum of late. Spraying dogs and declawing cats loses its charm over the years. I was beginning to dream up some new excitement: hearing aids for dogs, chemo for cats.

Until the day Themis Eropoulos brought in his rabbit, a two-inch tear in its right ear. Zeus had been in a fight, he explained. Handsome white buck, I thought, with short plush fur and distinctive markings, especially the fierce-looking, Brezhnev-thick eyebrows.

We chatted as I stitched the ear. It turned out that Mr. E. lived just two streets down from my home and practice. A solidly built man, about five foot nine, perhaps in his early forties, with dark hair, mustache, wide, friendly-looking face. He looked like a man you could trust.

So my ears twitched like Zeus' good black ear when I learned his owner was an archeologist, and even better, he travelled often to the Middle East.

"Wonderful! May I show you a piece of broken stone I found behind a rock when my wife Emelia and I were on a gour of the Sinai Peninsula? I wondered if it might be of value." This I said as casually as I could muster, for I secretly wondered if it could possibly be a piece of the tablets Moses smashed. I felt an internal blushing.

Growing up in the falls with only two other Jewish families, we celebrated the standard festivals, but mostly through the stomach. As a child, I liked the story of Moses having a temper tantrum and dropping the tablets. What became of them?

'My ears twitched like Zeus' good black ear when I learned his owner was an archeologist'

My stone was rounded at the top, some three inches down one side and two inches on the other because of its diagonal break. It was dark grey, rough-hewn, granite-like, and the marking of a few letters of an alphabet were barely visible. True, it didn't look to me like Hebrew or even Greek script.

While Zeus rested in a cage from the trauma of having three stitches in his ear, I took his owner into my family's living room.

Themis picked up my prized souvenir with a disinterested air, I thought. No doubt people were always giving him bits of broken jugs and limestone pieces. He examined the piece carefully, licking his finger to run it over the rough stone, and examined the lettering closely.

At last he said, "Your shard is rounded at the top like old Jewish tombstones or boundary markets in the ancient Near East, but the granite does not look ancient to me. The script is very odd indeed – not Phoenician, not Aramaic, not Hebrew nor Greek."

I held my breath.

"I am not a walking Antiques Roadshow, but, in my opinion, your shard, Dr. Rock Stone – yes, I can translate your name, Zuriel: my rock is God – is of no value."

I did not believe him. I reversed my first impressions of Mr. Themis Eropoulos.

I didn't mention that my daughter Luna had just graduated from the University of Toronto with a degree in biblical archeology. I may be balding and bepaunched, but Luna's looks come from her mother's side – sleek dark hair (not an uncontrolled fuzz like mine) and a pale complexion.

I told her about Themis and that I had decided to go on a treasure hunt for the broken pieces.

"Dad, darling," Luna teased, "you're going to have to read the book of Exodus, that's for sure, and check out the Jewish library. You sent me to Hebrew school, remember, to make up for your being born in Iroquois Falls."

I couldn't sleep that night.

"Emelia." I nudged my wife. "Em, are you awake, agape mou? This rather nice Greek guy, Themis Eros-something came to my office today with his injured rabbit. He lives close by. And he's an archaeologist, so I showed him our souvenir. He said at once it's of no value. Em, are you listening?" I leaned over her turned-away back. "I'd like you to meet him, give him the once-over."

"This moment, dear?" She rolled onto her back, eyes closed.

Three days later, on a Saturday night devoid of hockey on television, Themis sat in our living room drinking from a miniature cup, savouring the four sips of Greek coffee before the grounds hit the tongue, and smiling at Emelia. Luna sat with brow furrowed in concentration on a low ottoman beside her mother.

"I came to manhood in Thessaloniki, after the war of course." He seemed to want to point it out.

Emelia gazed at him meaningfully.

"My family is also from Salonica. We came here before the war."

'From paper mills to Epping Mills'

Neither spoke further. Themis broke the silence. He had a wisp of sticky baklava on his mustache.

"And you," he smiled at Luna, "what do you do?"

She told him her area of study.

"So! Many surprises. My vet has a Greek wife and a daughter in my field. I am curator in the Near Eastern and Asian civilizations department at the Royal Ontario Museum."

Luna raised the topic of my souvenir. "Professor, why are you so sure my father's shard is of no value?"

"You think I deceive you?" He sounded huffy. "I could tell you why. But perhaps it is good you do research for your own sources, if I may suggest."

I felt stupid and embarrassed.

Next Sunday, I set off alone to the Toronto Jewish Public Library.

I drove along Sheppard to Bathurst and turned north. What a metropolis! How great to have access to such a library as this. One giant step for the millworker's son: from pulp and paper mills to Epping Mills.

I hear my mother.

"Why so far? Don't we have dogs in Iroquois Falls? No cats, eh? No horses, no cows?"

"Be fair, Mama. Remember. I came to the most famous horse farm in Ontario. Mr. Epping himself hired me."

I turned to her. The passenger seat was empty.

Obviously my mother's name was not Mrs. Durrell. No animal hairs on her carpet. I had only one family, no other animals.

* * *

I went to the front desk and said I was looking for information on what had happened to the tablets Moses smashed.

"Midrashim you want, or Torah?"

"Oh, everything." I waved my arms from side to side as if to encompass the whole library. Midrash. Mishmash. I felt ignorant.

The librarian went to her computer, scrolling page after page of Hebrew script. She had 140 references. Then she called the executive director, a rabbi, at home. He referred to the story about their being two arks, aronot she called them, with perhaps one set of tablets in each.

"Er, two sets?" I asked.

"Ken, yes, smashed and whole. First lot and second lot."

Two other staff members, both Russians, also became engrossed in the research, poring over volumes of commentaries. They told each other to fetch Midrashim, Tanchumah, Talmud Berakot, Tosfot Sotah, Yomah and sefer Bamidbar. It all sounded strange, and I wondered if I really belonged.

While three heads were busy searching, I crept to the section with a Jewish encyclopedia and searched out the mystery words they'd just tossed over my head. So sefer Bamidbar was the book of Numbers. A midrash was a literary and fanciful way rabbis sought to understand and interpret the Torah, the Bible stories, or so I think I grasped. Enough for today.

Mr. Themis Eropoulos turned up again on Friday afternoon at 4 p.m. I like to close by that time on Fridays. He wanted me to remove the stickers from his rabbit's ear though I am sure I told him the stitches would dissolve on their own. I noticed he stroked the rabbit very affectionately. I love to watch the interactions between pets and their caregivers. He looked up at me.

'Midrash. Mishmash. I felt ignorant'

"Pets like to be touched, don't they, Mr. Stein? Just like people." This last he said rather wistfully.

Seems a sensitive guy, I thought. I invited him to eat with us.

"Please stay for dinner. You might feel awkward with our Sabbath customs, though."

"I don't think so." He smiled.

"Oh? How come?"

"How comes?" He still made the odd mistake in English. "It's a long story. I accept."

That night, Emelia served avgolemono soup – my favourite. I loved the lemony egg taste. Themis beamed. The atmosphere was warm.

After dessert, the guest and my ladies pumped me about my research findings. They all leaned forward in anticipation.

My shard. So many theories about the broken pieces.

One theory said all the fragments plus the unbroken replacement tablets were deposited in the Ark together.

Another had the broken tablets, shivrei in Hebrew, carried around by the Israelites in a new ark whenever they went to war.

I found all these theories confusing, but I liked the following midrash best.

"Just listen to this!" I said. "The story went that Moses dropped the tablets because the letters supporting them flew up to Heaven. That way, if the Israelites did not know what was written on them, they could not be blamed and 'utterly destroyed,' according to Exodus, for sacrificing to the Golden Calf."

I paused for breath.

"Therefore," I trumpeted, "the shard could not have had Hebrew letters on it nor could a fragment have been lying around for me to pick up!"

My family was impressed.

I smiled and nooded at Themis, an apology in the nod. He squeezed my arm.

"Congratulations, Zuriel, if I may. I figured straightaway that what you found was left by the film crew – vintage 1956! Besides, the Bible tells us the tablets were not rounded but square, six-by-six handbreaths, or palms of a hand."

Amazingly, I felt expanded, alive, not deflated. Themis had made me seek out my own heritage, advance my Jewishness. I secretly thanked Zeus for his beneficent intervention.

Now I ask you, could any of this have happened in Iroquois Falls?

Passover Greetings

Yahrzeit

by Rachelle K. Lerner

The roll of names
bewilders
with its length.

The black ink blossoms
white petals.

And the fairest flowers are most frail after the towers.

Marked by memory, tattooed by a grim procession, those martyred by delusion

And the big empty words
mock prayer.
And we turn from sights too large to bear.

At the frail edges,
we pick at life.

Dark ones,
burn bright.

Tikkun Olam

by Pearl Greenberg

Come with me
Come stretch the soul
On the hearth
Of our spiritual home.

The embers are burning low,
But the glow still warms the heart
And fires the imagination
To behold a better world.

Where Tikkun Olam,
And "do unto others"
And "love thy neighbour"
And "swords into ploughshares"
And "oneness"
are palpable.
And consciousness
Has grown to embrace it all.

Come with me
And we will share
A leap of faith
And take giant steps forward
To a better world.

Cataclysm

by Rachelle K. Lerner

Below the hurl and hiss of the rising tide against the cliff's lethal ridges
a moaning as if labour to birth.

Do we care enough to believe?
What girth to give this mystery?
Dare we call —
What words for prayers?

(Master of the Universe)

Whirling gulls shriek into the storm's blasts
Hurt our ears,
uninvited witnesses to this wilderness.

black sky breaks and crackles, shuddering booms that shakes us.

(And the prophets drown.)

In this ruined heath heart lacks words,
order and vision.

And revelation?

echoes, scarcely traced, an ancient world's nearly forgotten commands.

Tanya

by Peter Medvinsky

To the sacred memory of Tanya Marcus and all known and unknown martyrs and heroes of the Holocaust

The man who entered my compartment on that train
Crossing the winter-gripped Ukraine
Looked twice my age, but strong and tough;
The kind whose war-time youth was rough;
He said "Hello," then paused a bit
And took his seat.

The train was crawling; we were looking outside;
Another town was in sight;
A park, a church, a monument
To a Resistance fighter hanged…
"They honour heroes," I said,
And turned my head.

The man looked grim, a muscle was twitching on his face:
"Young man, I fought in those days;
Killed murderers, was stabbed; was shot;
Had friends: a brave, daring lot;
The most courageous of them all
Was a young girl.

I first met Tanya in the fall of '41;
Kiev had just been overrun;
I was a soldier, had to hide;
The partisans were hard to find;
Tanya and her Resistance friends
Saved me from death.

I wish I had," the man continued, "the words
To tell you what a girl she was;
Her gentle beauty to describe;
Her magnetism; her love of life…
And no photos of her
Survived the war.

Then came the day all Jews were ordered to report;
Most obeyed, Tanya did not;
I saw that eerie march of death:
Graybeards, cripples, women, babies...
The laughing Nazis machine-gunned them,
Every one.

I did not see Tanya smile ever since that day;
'For us is left only one way,'
She said and soon began the hunt;
Forged documents; a small handgun…
A one-girl army she became
After that day.

When Tanya struck, her blows stunned the Nazi gang;
The ones she killed were of high rank;
Gestapo dogs were running wild;
They searched for many days and nights;
Even SS-men from Berlin
Were flown in.

She was betrayed. We tried to save her, but we failed.
We later learned that in the jail
They tortured her beyond belief;
Death came to her as a relief.
She was just twenty. Not a word
They got from her.

After the war I met some high-ups and, in vain,
Urged them to honour Tanya's name;
They made it as plain as they could:
'Jewish last names don't sound good;'
This is the world that we live in –
Cruel and mean."

The man got off the train and vanished in the night;
But not before leaving behind,
With me: his last look, long and hard;
The memories that I must guard;
The fire that has not ceased burning
In my heart.

Forgive me

by Alvin Abram

Angry words flew from the old man's lips – sharp, bitter words of recrimination and hurt. He was a Holocaust survivor. He had lived through a terrible ordeal. Why did his only son not understand his pain? "You're a Jew!" he shouted. "Doesn't that mean anything to you?"

"Enough!" his son shouted back. "Leave it alone."

"Leave it alone?" The old man's voice trembled with passion. "Never! I brought you up as my father would have brought me up. Six million died so you could live. Don't you care?"

"You care enough for the two of us," his son answered. "I've had this crap up to my ears. I don't want your guilt. You live with ghosts and want me to inherit them. I want my own life."

"I was a child when the war came. A child. You have no idea what it's like to be in a concentration camp."

"Yes! I've been hearing about it since the day I was born. I don't want to hear any more."

The old man glowered at his son. "If you don't want to hear any more, then leave. Leave this house. Maybe if you went to Israel, you would discover who you are, discover your roots."

"I am not a tree," his son cried in exasperation. "I was not planted. I don't know who I am. I only know who you are, and your life has no room for anything but your grief."

They glared at each other, neither prepared to give an inch. "I have no feelings for you – no love, only pity," the son added and he climbed the stairs to his room.

"Love," the old man called after him. "What do you know of love? I lost the family I loved. What did you lose? I'll tell you what you lost – my respect."

His son's bedroom door slammed.

As he always did when he was troubled, the old man went to his synagogue to sit alone and ask why had he survived while others more worthy had died. When he returned home, his son was gone. His clothes and some photographs – gone. He had left no message.

'I have no feelings for you – no love, only pity'

Aaron lived away from his community and joined several groups with different ideologies, trying to find himself in their teachings. In the end, he saw nothing but confusion, no peace of mind, no comfort of heart, and worse, no understanding of who he was. Years passed, troubled years in which he avoided his father. He was not alone in his confusion and like many others he searched for an answer to his life. He decided to go to India.

* * *

Aaron's father also searched. Many nights, the old man stood in Aaron's room and wept. He asked God how he had failed as a father. He searched his thoughts, wanting desperately to make peace with himself. But God did not answer.

* * *

Aaron journeyed to New Delhi and joined a cult. He learned words that spoke of other ways and scoffed at his earlier way of life. He gave up material things; he beggared himself, wanting desperately to feel that what he was doing was right. But he didn't know what it was he sought. After a year he left the cult and became an English tutor for children of the wealthy. He built a new life. Time became his friend, for the more time passed, the more he hoped he could forget.

* * *

But time became the father's enemy. His health declined. He had found the answers to his questions but they had come slowly. Friends were going to Israel and he asked if they would take him. They did. At the Wailing Wall, he leaned his sick body against the stones and prayed. He felt God's presence for the first time in a long time. He grieved for his son and hoped one day his son would understand as he himself now understood.

* * *

One day, Aaron reached for the telephone and dialed the number of one of his father's closest friends.

"Aaron!" The man said in surprise. "Is that you?"

"Yes. It's been a long time. How are you?"

'God did not answer'

"I am fine. Where are you calling from? Are you in the city?"

"No, I'm calling from India."

"Is that where you went? It was unfortunate about you and your father. He missed you."

"Things happen," Aaron said.

The man's voice saddened. "Yes, things happen."

"How… how is my father?"

There was a long pause, but when he finally spoke, it was very softly. "He's dead, Aaron. It happened last year in Israel. He had a heart attack and never recovered."

Aaron was silent.

"I'm sorry, Aaron. No one knew where to contact you. All your father's things and property are being taken care of by his lawyer."

"What was my father doing in Israel? He hated flying."

"He wasn't well. He wanted to go to Israel at least once before he died. Some friends took him. He made it to the Wall, then he died." Again there was a long pause. "I am sorry," he said again.

Aaron felt great emptiness in him. "Where is he buried?"

"Outside Jerusalem. They thought he would want that, to be buried in a land he cherished. He changed after you left, Aaron. Time changes us all. He loved you, you know. He just didn't know how to tell you. There was a lot of pain in him and he didn't know how to live with it."

"Thank you," Aaron said. He replaced the receiver in its cradle and stared at it, for a long, long time. There was much sadness in him, but no tears. He could not change what had happened. He went to his dresser and removed the single snapshot of his father that he had carried with him all these years. He looked at the tired, old face with the grieving eyes, then went to the telephone and dialed the airport.

Aaron stood on the hill looking down at the Western Wall, the Temple Wall, a wall that had witnessed thousands of years of tyranny, of slavery and abuse. He came to the wall, because it was the last place his father had been. He was tempted to touch it, but could not take that first step toward the entrance. He just watched the people below.

"Can I help you?" a fragile voice asked. Aaron turned. An old man stood beside him, smiling.

"You look lost," the old man said, "Can I help you?"

"No, thank you, rabbi. I'm all right."

The old man chuckled. "I am not a rabbi. I'm a Jew performing a mitzvah. I have been blessed. I survived the Holocaust. I met a good woman, had children and they have blessed me with grandchildren. What more could I ask but to repay God for his kindness?"

Aaron looked at the old man curiously. "And what is it you do that is a mitzvah?"

"Most come here for one of two reasons. Some to communicate with God; others to leave a message for someone – a thought left unsaid, a regret never uttered, a confirmation of affection. What better way than with a piece of paper and a pencil? You may ask, why a pencil? Because ink fades over time and lead lasts forever. Sometimes it takes a while for the message to reach the sender. I have been doing this for many years. I sense, young man, that what you need is a paper and pencil."

Aaron looked at the old man's outstretched hand and saw he held a small sheet of white paper and the stub of a pencil.

"If you are wondering about the size of the pencil, it need only be big enough to put down what you feel." He looked at Aaron with eyes of compassion and gestured that he take what he offered.

"It's too late," Aaron said. "The receiver is dead."

"The answer is already waiting for you. It begs for a question so you can understand the answer. I know."

Aaron took the old man's gift, entered the sacred area, and moved into a vacated spot. He stared at the stones, trying to find the words he wanted to write. Finally he scribbled his short message on the paper. He rolled the paper until it was no larger than a cigarette and tucked it high above his head in a crack in the stone. With a heavy heart, he returned to the entrance. The old man was no longer there.

Aaron finally visited his father's grave. He had deliberately put off going there. He walked slowly on the path into the cemetery, reluctant to close the distance between the many years that had divided him from his father. What words could he speak to heal the pain that had been inflicted? It was too late for reconciliation, too late for apology. What compelled him to come? Nothing would change.

He followed the instructions given him by the groundskeeper and stopped behind his father's stone. There were so many things he wished he had said, for he now understood what haunted his father. It was the loss of those he loved, and the knowledge that he could never tell them of his love. And who was he? He was Aaron Shapiro, loved by an old man whose pain prevented him from declaring his love – a love he now knew existed. Would the harsh words he said when he left haunt him as his father's memory had haunted him? He thought of the note he'd left at the Wall:

To my father:
Forgive me. I love you.
Aaron

He moved to the front of the monument and read his father's full name, date of birth and death. He read the words inscribed beneath and fell to his knees and wept. Etched in the stone was a quotation:

Those who want to be forgiven
Must learn to forgive.

The Blue Lights Hung on Ben Yehuda Street

by David Levine

They strung up lights downtown.
Just like that.

It's okay to come out now,
See? There are lights.
The thief is dead and hanged,
in incandescent blue,
in the town square.

The night spins over itself in a carousel of pre-ripped jeans and best friends and curfews and futures.
It's okay to come out now.

A hundred blue fuses burn slowly down around our spinning selves.
It's okay to come out now.
The fuses are lit.

And Once Again on Shavuot

by Rose Romberg

You made heaven and earth
You looked down and saw it was barren.
You pondered…
You created Man in Your own image.

Man promised to serve You with integrity and to keep Your land holy.

You were pleased and You blessed – Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and all their issue…

You bequeathed to them
a venue and called it
Eretz Yisrael.
Your people laboured long and hard.

The fruits borne by Man's enterprise turned desert and swamp into a land of Milk and Honey.

You looked down.
It pleasured You.
Once again You blessed
Your people, and behold!

The State of Israel was reborn.
Your fold stood proud!
Now, once again Israel is surrounded, and from the four corners of the world enemies spew venom of hate in monstrous scale, and once again our "Promised Land"
lies in danger.

Now, on the threshold of Shavuot
Your people will gather in their Temples, united;
as one, in prayer for a Revelation from Your mountain-top to mirror, as in days of yore, at Sinai, on Shavuot.

S Poem

by Mark Shainblum

It was already full of garbage
The Last Steinberg's Bag

Hanging on the knob waiting for disposal waiting for an end

I emptied it transferred its cargo to another less worthy less rare

Which didn't carry the weight of Van Horne childhoods

Of wonder in the mundane

Of an ugly, blocky little
"S" in a field of red and blue which told me I was here

Aries

by Mark Shainblum

Once he was buried under a geologic layer of shame and guilt and pain and horror and history

but now he is rising shaking the dust and dirt of the ages from his coat nodding to the east to that part of Poland but no longer owned by it.

The ram is lifting his head sniffing the air
twin shofars resting their sharpness for the first time.

I greet him warily
like a stranger I have known my whole life.

March of the Living

by Mark Shainblum

Let it go she said as I caressed the glossy book from Toronto from United Israel Appeal

As we both looked at the young girl wrapped in blue and white armoured in Shield of David walking up those tracks to that gate.

Let it go, she said
not unkindly meaning well but with a hint of exasperation

Remembering, perhaps the column I'd written just the week before.

Let it go, she said
not understanding.

It's not mine to let go.

I'm its.

And it won't.

Between Two Annes

by Henry Srebrnik

MacArthur, MacDonald, MacKendrick,
MacKinnon, MacLennan, MacPhee,
These are some of the names in my classes this term.
I teach on a small island
Famous mostly for Anne,
The orphan girl
Who lived in a house with Green Gables.
It's a quiet, peaceful place,
Far from the world's troubles
And those of the Jews.

But when I drive to work
On a bitterly cold Canadian winter morning
I see smoke belching from a tall chimney
At a power plant a few miles away.
And, unlike my students,
I think of another Anne,
Who died,
Far too young,
Far from here.

Passover Greetings

The Pishka

by Lainie Cohen

"It's not fair," I said, glaring at my brother. I stamped my foot. "I'm three years older than you are."

Peter stuck his tongue out at me. "No, you're not. Only two years and eight months."

Every night I faced the same losing battle. Peter refused to go to bed unless I went, too. Reluctantly, I followed him into our room, climbed into my bed and waited for Mom to kiss me goodnight.

"Kiss Bobbie, too," I said, holding up my stuffed elephant.

Mom whispered in my ear, her breath like a tickle. "Lainie, just lie here and wait until Peter falls asleep. Then you can come into the kitchen."

As soon as Mom closed the door behind her, Peter tried to talk to me.

"Go to sleep," I said. "You're tired."

"No, I'm not. You are."

I ignored him.

It was hard to make anything out in the dark, even the wooden night table that separated our twin beds, especially once I took my glasses off, but I could tell that Peter was squirming from the rustle of his sheets. I lay on my back and stared at the ceiling. Moonlight snuck through the slats of the blinds and danced overhead. Shadows spun and jumped and darted about like birds on a telephone wire. My eyes grew heavy.

The next night, I was even more determined to stay awake.

This time I didn't stare at the ceiling. While listening for Peter to fall asleep, I told myself a story about a girl trying to save her kingdom from a fierce dragon. Soon the creature was dying with sputtering snorts that seemed to come from Peter's side of the room. I waited a few more minutes to make sure it was safe. Then I slipped on my slippers and tiptoed out, leaving the door open a crack so the handle wouldn't click.

The door at the far end of the hallway looked as unwelcoming as a closed drawbridge. I knew that just beyond, the castle with all its treasures was waiting. But the path hid untold dangers for nighttime travellers, for there was just a sliver of moon that night and no stars at all. I crept forward. The wind cackled with gusty guffaws and branches quaked. Leaves darted by my feet like frightened field mice. I leapt from the shoreline to a rock almost hidden in the stream. I paused to catch my breath.

Phew! Safe past my baby brother's room. Yet the door ahead was still quite a distance. Would I make it?

"Damn it, not again," a deep voice roared.

I plunged into the murky water, heedless of the weeds tugging at my feet.

Moments later I stood in the doorway of the kitchen, gawking at what lay within – a room transfixed, no longer just a place to eat with the smell of food or the tabletop spread with my notebooks for school – but a strange world hazed in smoke. My parents weren't in their usual seats across from each other at the table. Instead, my father sat in the far corner with his back to the dining room wall and my mother was in my spot. In front of them were two tall glasses of dark liquid, a dish of nuts, a bowl of chocolates and an ashtray with a cigarette stub and my father's pipe. In their hands they held fans of cards. And beside the ashtray stood the pishka.

The pishka was a small tin box, blue and white, the colours of Israel's flag. I knew all about Israel, much more than Peter did. Israel was eight years old, as old as I was. People living there grew oranges and a funny fruit called a boxer that looked like a flat brown banana. Our Hebrew teacher handed it out on Tu b'Shvat. I didn't like it much. But I did like to colour in the maps he gave us and I knew how to sing Hatikvah by heart. Every Friday night before dinner, Peter and I dropped coins into the slot at the top of the pishka. Plink, plink. You could tell how full the box was getting by how far the coins fell. After dinner, it would be replaced on the top shelf of the broom closet, the one right behind the kitchen door where my mother's apron hung. Sometimes at night, I imagined that apron shaking its straps like an army officer warning the broom and dustpan not to get out of line. I knew all about the army. During long car rides, my parents often sang army tunes.

Mom smiled at me, inviting me closer.

"Hey, I could use some luck over here," Dad said, leaning back in his chair.

I snuggled onto his lap and squinted at his cards: a run of four spades, three queens, two jacks and a lonely king. Dad stretched for his pipe, dangled it unlit in his mouth. I reached for a chocolate and nibbled the caramel sweetness.

Mom threw out a card. Dad ignored it and took the top card from the deck. He offered me his drink. The bubbles fizzed in my mouth. I took a second sip. Dad discarded his card, an unwanted nine. Mom picked it up and spread out her cards with a flourish.

"Gin," she said.

"Damn, that's the fourth in a row."

Dad shifted his weight, jostling me from my secure position. I held onto the table to steady myself. Held my breath too.

Plink! A coin in the pishka. And it wasn't even Friday night. •

Tea for Two

by April Shour Laufer

Her husband of 49 years was dead. "He was just here," she said to everyone who came to see her. "Then I turned and I screamed. And there was no one to help... And I couldn't move him."

The family listened as she told the story over and over again in the days that followed. The first three days during the shivah they thought that she was in shock; whenever she told the story she would start to shake as if there was an earthquake happening inside of her. It was as if she couldn't quite accept what had happened.

Friends came and said, "I'm sorry for your loss." She looked at them with red-rimmed eyes, and said in a quiet voice, "I thought it would be me first."

The days of shivah were busy with friends and family who filled the time with fond remembering and reminiscing. The nights, alone in their bedroom, her mind was filled with wondering and with undefined fears.

"What was there to live for?" she said out loud.

The children answered. Dutifully. Hopefully. "You have the grandchildren."

She said nothing.

"It will be okay," they said.

The week of shivah ended and then the shloshim passed. The house had taken on a quiet that she still did not recognize. She spent her days sitting at the kitchen table. The place mats were out like always, the newspaper on the table waiting to be read. She would sit there, staring at the empty chair opposite her, staring at the chair where Abie used to sit.

She didn't hear the phone when it first rang. By the third ring she got up slowly from the table and answered it. It was her youngest son.

"What were you doing, Ma?" he asked.

"Just sitting," she answered.

"Did you eat something?" he asked.

"I'm not hungry," she said.

"Ma, you have to eat. Do you want me to come over? We could go out for a bite?"

"No, no. Aren't you at work?"

"That's okay, Ma, I don't mind coming."

"No, no," she insisted. "You work."

"Ma," he pleaded.

"I'm okay," she said.

There was a pause on the phone line.

"You'll come for Shabbos?" he asked.

"Okay," she said.

She meant to say that would be nice but somehow she ended up sighing instead. It was just so hard without Abie. Nice? Nice was when Abie was here, nice was sitting next to him at the Shabbos table. That was nice.

"Yes, I'll come."

"You should eat something, Ma," he said.

"I will. When I'm hungry."

"Okay, Ma, I gotta go. I'll speak to you later?"

"Bye," she said with a sigh.

She put the phone back on the receiver. She meant to take something from the fridge to eat but she really didn't feel like eating. She couldn't think of anything that she wanted to do. She sat down at the kitchen table, again. The phone rang. She didn't know how to do things without Abie. The phone rang again. How could she say yes to her friends when they invited her out? The phone kept ringing. She didn't feel like talking. Instead, she decided to count the number of times the phone would ring before the person gave up. Seven, eight, nine, 10, 11. Silence.

It was probably one of her girlfriends. Shivah felt like yesterday but it was already 11 weeks since it had passed. Her friends told her it was time to get out of the house. They wanted her to visit, they wanted to take her out for coffee. As she sat at the kitchen table staring at Abie's empty chair her eyes started to close. Almost 50 years, she thought, a good man, I was lucky. A tiredness seemed to envelop her. She thought of going to lie down in her bedroom or maybe on the couch but the effort of getting up from the table seemed too much. She just sat there, letting her sleepiness wash over her.

When she opened her eyes she saw her Abie sitting in his chair. He was wearing the sweater she had given him last year. He looked so nice, peaceful, content. She gave him a shy smile.

Suddenly she felt animated. It was so nice to see him.

He was neatly shaved, just like the way he was every Friday afternoon before Shabbos started. He would finish shaving and dress to go to shul while she finished the Shabbos preparations. As he walked out the door she would run her hand over his smooth face and they would wish each other a "gut Shabbos." As she looked at him across the table she didn't move from her chair but she could feel the touch of his skin against her fingertips. She could smell his cologne.

'It's too hot for me'

Seeing him now as he sat in his spot opposite her at the kitchen table she was overwhelmed by how handsome he looked. They had been bashert, she had never any doubt. She remembered that day that they had first met. There had been something so endearing about him, some shyness that she found so charming.

"Abie," she said looking at him, "I miss you."

She paused. She was feeling such longing for him.

"I wish we had another day together. Just one more day," she said and fought back her tears. "Of course," she continued with a sniffle, "isn't that what everyone wants? One more day." She reached for a tissue in her pocket. "Forty-nine years, Abie. Forty-nine years." She thought about that for a moment and then added, as if she was agreeing with him, "I know we were lucky, Abie. But still…"

She thought of all the things that they had gone through together. "Yes," she said nodding her head, "it was a lot of years." She recalled the many occasions and events that had filled their lives. As she went through the list of events she felt relieved to find that most of their married life they had been happy. "We were pretty happy," she smiled at this thought. "I'm not saying we were perfect but most of the time it was, okay?" She had ended the statement as a question. "You were a good husband, Abie." She choked on the words hating to use the past tense. "Abie," she gave a sob.

It was Abie who was her strength. It was Abie who took things in his stride. When she would worry and fret about how the kids were doing in school he would say, "They'll figure it out." And when they didn't marry right after university and she wondered if she would ever become a bubbie, he told her, "When they find the right one." As a husband, he had the patience of Job. He never criticized her and never demanded things of her. Sometimes, it's true, it made her crazy when he didn't react, but his calm was the thing that always made things alright.

"You put up with all my mishugas," she said shaking her head in amazement. "And," she added, a little defensively, "I put up with yours. Okay, maybe, I was a little worse than you. Not so much mind you. A little. Anyway never mind." When she was anxious and nervous Abie always found the right words that would take the edge off of things. "Of course," she said, as if she could read his thoughts. "Of course, things worked out. Except… except that you're not here," she choked on her sigh.

"You know," she said, "I don't know how to do things without you." Looking at him plaintively she asked, "How do I go on?" And she sat there for several long minutes just staring at him. She was grateful for the years that they had had together but it was just so hard now without him.

"I think I'll make some tea." She went to the sink and filled the kettle. Then she found herself opening the pantry. She got some crackers and then she went into the fridge and took some cheese. She put the items on a plate in the middle of the table.

When the kettle finished boiling she poured herself a mug of tea. Abie's favourite mug was sitting on the shelf and she decided she would use it. She sat down with the steaming mug. "It's too hot for me," she explained. "I can't drink it so hot. Not like you, Abie. This is the way you like it."

She wrapped her fingers around the mug of tea. Lifting up the mug so that her elbows rested on the table she blew very gently across the top of the tea in a back and forth motion, feeling the steam rise to her nostrils. "Really, Abie. I always thought I would be the one to go first. It's so hard," and as she said the last words her voice cracked and tears spilled forth. She put the untouched tea down on the table. "I can't help it, Abie. What am I supposed to do?" She went to retrieve a tissue from the Kleenex box on the counter and then sat down again. "I know, Abie. I know. You do what you can." She looked down at Abie's mug sitting on the table in front of her. "Life goes on."

She pulled the plate of crackers towards her and started to nibble on one. "Such memories, Abie. Such memories." The memory of his smile, the memory of how he could make her laugh. She nibbled a little more of the crackers and then pushed the plate away. "I miss you," she said closing her eyes and sighing. She heard the phone ringing. When she opened her eyes, he was gone.

She was sniffling a little when she picked it up. "Yes?" she answered as if someone had interrupted her.

"Faygie?"

"Yes, it's me."

"Faygie, it's Eva. I called, but you didn't pick up so I called back," explained her friend. "Were you resting? I didn't mean to disturb you."

"No. No. I wasn't doing anything. Just," she looked over at Abie's empty chair. There was no mug on the kitchen table, no plate of crackers. "I was just sitting," she said.

"How about going out for coffee?" her friend asked. "It will get you out of the house for a bit. We don't have to be out for long. A little fresh air."

"Okay," she replied, finding it strange that she had agreed so easily and then added, "It will be nice to get out."

With a note of surprise and excitement in her voice, her friend replied, "I'll be there in about 15 minutes."

She was still standing next to the phone when it rang again. She picked it up automatically. "Hello?"

A male voice started, "Hello. I'm calling from Inquiry Research and we are conducting a market survey. Could I please speak to the male or female head of household who has been primarily responsible for financial investments for the household during the past 12 months?"

She hesitated for a few seconds. She said, "he's not here."

"When might I reach him?" the person asked.

"I'm afraid that's not possible," she said.

"Oh well, thanks for your time," and the person hung up.

She looked longingly at Abie's chair and went to the hall to get her coat.

Song

by Malca Litovitz

Let everything that has breath praise the Lord. Halleluyah.
Psalm 150

Praise Him with our dancing feet, our arms lifting heavy weights and our hearts rising to greet what is good in our lives but what is still painful – the lover always departing in Matisse's painting, her head held in her hand
every morning,
her notebook open.

Praise Him in the old stones on the cobblestone path in the large stadium full of singers and guitars.

Praise Him in the crowded café where a blond strokes her hair as a big song pours through in a language you don't understand but whose feeling is clear –

Praise Him in the stillness which descends if I continue to etch these black words onto these blue lines the way the bird pauses on a black wire in a Leonard Cohen song.

Sabbath Longing

by Malca Litovitz

Poem takes my hand, leads me to my tree, midnight blue this morning.
I love its colours
when you open the door.
The sun bathes the tree in light;
brown leaves tremble with joy.

I would want you waiting for me,
valentine unwrapped.
As night falls, sadness with it.
Darkening sky brings your absence.
Candles welcome the Sabbath Queen words lighting a path to where you are.

Time Capsule

by Myra Shuster

I envision a time-capsule as salt-encrusted, wave-washed and thrust on shore,
or buried, sphagnum-muddied, deep as bones to be unearthed unexpectedly centuries later.

My newborn daughter's will be a circular box, lined in pink satin.
Stored far from groping little hands and the sullying dust, spills, and tensions of daily life, until she's twelve.
The age of womanhood, says Judaism, which deemed optional, my presence and hers,
at her naming ceremony; Beth Zion Synagogue, June 29, 1998.

The purple velvet Torah scroll, revered, weighty, was hoisted high, hoity-toity
in a patriarch parade.
Leading, the rabbi teetered a little,
bearing it unsteadily, like a pregnancy, past baby and me, playing peek-a-boo unwittingly from behind the mechitzah wall.

Hey fellahs, I bore this girl – she's mine, isn't she the point here? I screamed silently into the spectacle.

Baby-naming, "take two"
Women and your daughters, you're invited:
under the moon and the stars, lilac in full bloom,
June 29, 1999, Sierra's Receiving of Wisdom Ceremony.
Through poetry, pictures, letters or fabric, bring your wisdom for my daughter, to be kept in a time capsule until her 12th birthday, 2010.

Bread

by Anita Lerek

Excerpts from the diary of Leah Mandell, 13 years old.

The Warsaw Ghetto, Poland, Friday, April 11, 1941, 5 p.m.

Dear diary, Tatoosh doesn't know about you. He'll be very angry if he finds out. It's dangerous to write, he says. If they ever discovered my diary, he says that the Germans would tear it up, and probably give me a good beating. I need to tell someone what I see or else I'll go crazy. Zvi is always at his political meetings. Tatoosh and Mamoosha are very quiet, yet burning mad. I get on their nerves a lot these days, they say.

Since Tatoosh's home class was at six this morning, I had to wait to have breakfast afterwards. As usual it was a hard wait. He gives a weekly Hebrew literature class at home to a few of the older children in the apartment block. Very secret, no books, easier to run away if the police come.

This time, he covered the Passover holiday, starting today. Tatoosh went on and on in a dead voice about how the blood on the houses of the Jews was a sign for the angel of death to pass over the houses of our people as it slew the Egyptian first-borns. For a moment, he got excited when he compared matzah as a symbol of our escape from Egypt, the result of having no time to let the bread rise, to matzah as a reminder of our bitter slavery.

"And that's why every year at Passover, we do without bread and live on matzah for eight days."

Moshe said, "You mean even this year we have to give up bread? We'll die. Why should we care about Passover when we're starving and locked in the ghetto?"

Being big for my age, it wouldn't be so bad for me not to eat bread for a while. But Tatoosh was the opposite. So skinny – his dark face like a raven, all nose and deep eyes. He answered, "I love Passover," and ended the class early.

After the kids left, I looked at Tatoosh, his small frame lost in the green armchair that he'd dragged in from the street and fixed up. I felt like crying. With his huge pants and layers of shapeless sweaters to protect against the cold, he looked like a lost version of his old self. Ever since they closed his school in Lodz, and we fled here a few months ago, he's had nothing to do but give a few classes in our apartment in return for free bread ration cards from the Jewish council. So these days – no one knows this, dear diary – Professor Tatoosh, Lodz's greatest Jewish writer, keeps house, or just sits at his tiny work desk, and stares at his books – not opening a single one – and watches smoke pass through his thin, yellow fingers.

Mamoosha works very hard at the fur factory for Mr. Ruvenstein. Before the war, she worked as a bookkeeper at Tatoosh's school whenever she felt like it. Now she works all the time, and we see her only in the cold and in the dark.

Last night, in the corner of the bedroom we all share, I heard her whispering to Tatoosh something about Mr. Ruvenstein finding out something about her and treating her differently, I couldn't hear what. Then Tatoosh put his arms around her, calling her his "precious child."

"Tatoosh, let's eat," I told him, "and then go pick up the holiday matzah at the square." Standing, we each gobbled down two pieces of dry bread with margarine. I rushed out, closely followed by Tatoosh. We left five slices behind.

We headed for the Judenrat (Jewish administrative council) offices at Mirowski Square to pick up our matzah ration. Though only seven in the morning, Pawia Street was jam-packed with people, most of whom I didn't know. At their normal place on the corner, I saw the band of beggar boys, shoeless, with their blanket coverings, each one yelling, moaning, singing louder than the next to get our attention. Bread was the only thing that would shut them up. One boy's eyes hooked on to mine. For a moment I thought it was my friend, Leon. No, impossible. I had left him behind in Lodz. Was he still alive?

Feeling guilty, I hurried Tatoosh along. Guilty for not being hungry, guilty for having no extra to give anyone, and guilty for feeling so good today. Spring was here, the sun, shining, and smiles were cracking open the dry faces of people on the street.

"Tatoosh, look, look up. The cranes are returning home."

Caw, caw, caw, caw. I heard the magical cry that Tatoosh taught me to listen for every spring, no matter where I was. And here, even in the prison of the ghetto, I was not disappointed. The Nazis couldn't wall up the skies. Way, way up above the corpses and the gates and the bullet holes flew the army of cranes, dominating the sky.

"Take me away," I screamed, stretching out my arms in a wild dance.

Suddenly, I heard the familiar German words, so close to my own Yiddish, yet a race apart. Then came the sound of speeding trucks grinding to a halt, a shot ringing out into the air, and the path clearing before black-uniformed German police grabbing an arm here, a leg there, a neck, a coat, any human part that stuck out. Once they'd filled the backs of the trucks with loads of men, they fired off.

"Tatoosh, where are they taking all those people?"

"To German work camps outside the city."

"When will they come back?"

"Probably in a few days, if they're lucky."

Tatoosh and I joined a crowd of people in front of the Judenrat offices – thousands, Tatoosh said. We were all pushing to get to the front where a fat man with a big red nose sat, surrounded by Jewish police with cool, yellow law and order armbands. The well- fed man – an influential member of the Judenrat, Tatoosh said – was distributing tiny white packages of matzah. At the edges, the police were clubbing people back into line.

Again suddenly a path opened up, people froze, and several young Jewish men, some Zvi's age, were pulled out of the holiday crowd by our own police.

"Tatoosh, how can they take them away at the beginning of our holiday?"

"They do whatever they want."

Saturday, April 12, 1941, 7 a.m.

Today is not a happy day for me, dear diary. Yesterday, after waiting hours for our matzah, we got home late in the afternoon to find that, as usual, Zvi wasn't there. He hadn't slept at home the night before. He was with his Zionist friends, we hoped. But Tatoosh and I didn't have much time to worry because we had to finish all the cleaning for Passover. Tatoosh retreated to his desk, lit up a stub, and sat so deeply in thought I could almost hear him. I followed him, and asked, "Tatoosh, do you think we could skip Passover this year? We're slaves again – so what's the point? I know Zvi doesn't care."

Bread

He pushed himself out of his chair – I almost thought he would collapse – and balancing himself against the straw broom, he began to make sweeping motions in the kitchen. I bobbed up and down, holding the dustpan, an old newspaper. In dead silence, we continued our cleaning, getting rid of all forms of bread.

"Tatoosh, where is the bread we didn't finish at breakfast? Mamoosha has to lock it away or else she'll be furious," I said.

Suddenly there was a knock at the door. Tatoosh answered, "I'm coming, one minute. I'm in the bath." According to our plan, I ran into the bedroom, and dove under my parents' bed. After a pause, I heard the door open. It was only Mamoosha with Zvi.

As I moved out of my hiding spot, I brushed against something soft. I was terrified it was a mouse. No, it was only the bread we'd left behind. Tatoosh must have hidden it there. I wondered why.

I came out clutching the pieces of bread. Mamoosha spotted me and grabbed the bread away. She wrapped up the five slices of old rye bread in a newspaper and placed them in a bedroom cupboard, which she then taped up.

Mamoosha is so serious about the bread, the tradition, much more than Tatoosh, even though he is the son of the rabbi of Gora. Tatoosh and Mamoosha are so different. It's almost as if they come from different worlds. They fight a lot – about religion, going to synagogue, everything. He only likes the pure ideas of our religion; she, the practical, the customs. But Passover, they both love. For me, I don't care. I'll do anything to make them stop fighting.

Whenever she gets mad at me for something – and that's often, I'm not really sure why – Tatoosh always takes her side, and whispers to me quietly, "Shhhh, hold your tongue, don't upset your Mamoosha. You know she's been through a lot." And he never lets me forget that she was raised in an orphanage. Maybe that's why he calls her his "child."

I finally talked to Zvi. I described the kidnapping of the young men that I'd seen earlier at the square. "Zvi, be careful. You can't be as free as before."

"Oh, don't worry about me, Leah. The movement takes good care of me. We have a plan. I'd be with my friends now if not for Mamoosha forcing me to come home for Passover dinner."

"I would die if anything happened to you," I said.

He laughed and chased me back into the kitchen up to the dinner table, which was now covered with a brilliant white tablecloth, and with a very special meal of potato soup, potatoes, eggs, parsley, and some pieces of stewed beef. It made me feel sick.

Tatoosh placed the small package of matzah in an old dish. The dry lines on his face moved slowly as he said, "I believe that if all we eat daily for the next week is a plateful of soup, some potatoes, turnips, margarine and a few sheets of matzah, we will end up as corpses on the street. I refuse to let this happen to my family. And it's especially tragic for you, my child." He stared at Mamoosha.

She moved closer to him, and coaxed him along to the table, guiding his hands to help her light the Shabbat candles, while she said the blessing. Mamoosha's blond hair glistened in the flickering light. Then the four of us sat down, just looking at one another, so grateful to be together. The Haggadah rested on the table, not yet opened.

Then the knock came. Mamoosha had forgotten to lock the door when she had returned. Two Jewish policemen walked right in, short and muscular, wooden clubs in their hands.

"Oh, excuse us," blurted one of them, who did not look much older than Zvi. "Is this the home of Zvi Mandell?" he asked, staring right at Zvi.

Tatoosh rose and started to shake his fist limply. Mamoosha wrapped her arms around the younger policeman as if to pin him down. "Please," she begged. "Can't you wait until the end of Passover? You're Jewish boys. You must understand."

He replied, "We have orders for Zvi to join the labour batallion, and go immediately to a work camp nearby. He should be home before the end of the holiday week. Now let go of me." He gave Mamoosha a kick with his wooden tipped shoes, hurtling her against the table. A dish shattered, scattering matzah all over the floor. The policemen firmly hooked Zvi's elbows on either side, and dragged him out and down the stairs. Zvi was wordless. Mamoosha threw his heavy boots down the stairs after him.

After they left, Tatoosh tottered from the kitchen to the bedroom and… to the taped cupboard. Suddenly he pulled the tape off, and removed the wrapped bread. He then placed it on the table full of food, as yet untouched, and beckoned, "Come my child, come Leah, let us sit down and eat our seder meal." And he then lowered his head almost to table level and, like a preying bird, pierced the bread and gobbled down one slice, scrap by scrap. He left four behind.

Then he got up and walked, straighter than ever before, to his work space in the front room. He cleared the desk, sat down, and for the first time in months, smoked lines and lines of forbidden words into existence. I read over his shoulder.

"My beloved child-wife is a convert to Judaism trapped in a Jewish hell. My son has been kidnapped for slave labour. Obsessing on these things will kill me.

"I shall rise above my personal life to be the diarist of Warsaw's Jews. My people are everything, I am nothing. I will be the raven, a set of eyes, only eyes, to guide my people through the Nazi darkness and thereafter. This Passover, we are back in Egypt. With all my strength and clarity, I shall record Jewish servitude and heroism – for our rescuers, for posterity, and for God, wherever he may be." •

In memory of Yitzhak Katzenelson, the Warsaw Ghetto diarist, who died with his son, Zvi, in Auschwitz. His writings survived him.

On Chaim Potok

by Bill Gladstone

Many readers consider Chaim Potok, the New York-born, rabbinically trained author who died last July, as being categorically unlike most other notable Jewish scribes of his generation because his books open a unique window into the Orthodox world.

While acclaimed American writers such as Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud and Philip Roth tended to write about the pressures of assimilation as the children of immigrant Jews who adapted to American society, Potok examined the closed religious Jewish world in which he was raised, revealing the various chasms, fissures and shibboleths that differentiate the chassidic community, for instance, from other Orthodox communities.

His highly readable first novel, The Chosen, tells the story of a friendship between Danny Saunders and Reuben Malter, two boys from different streams of Judaism in 1940s Brooklyn. The book became a bestseller soon after it appeared in 1967 and remains his best- known work.

Numerous other novels followed, including The Promise (1969), My Name Is Asher Lev (1972), In the Beginning (1975), The Book of Lights (1981), Davita's Harp (1985), The Gift of Asher Lev (1990) and I Am The Clay (1992). He also wrote several nonfiction titles.

"My books are as Jewish as [James] Joyce's books are Irish," he once told an interviewer.

The novels deal with Jewish characters caught up in the conundrums they face when their own traditions and wisdom come up against the accrued knowledge of the wider secular society of which they are a part.

Potok's characters dive into various modern secular philosophical realms – such as Freudian psychoanalysis, biblical high criticism, Marxist-Leninist theory and the visual arts establishment – that challenge and contradict their own and their family's traditional Jewish tenets. Dramatic conflict is the inevitable result. In Potok's expert hands, it always makes for gripping and thoughtful reading.

Potok was raised in an Orthodox environment but aligned himself with the Conservative movement. An admirer of Ernest Hemingway, James Joyce and Evelyn Waugh, he studied English at Yeshiva University, then enrolled at the Conservative-oriented Jewish Theological Seminary. He graduated as a rabbi in 1954 with no thought of ever practising as a rabbi.

"I went to the seminary to get a good western-oriented Jewish education," he once explained. "I wanted disciplined acquisition of Jewish texts, just as I wanted disciplined acquisition of secular texts. I was going to write about the conflict of these two cultures, and I wanted to get it right."

For Potok, literature presented a means by which remote and closed spheres of humanity could be illuminated.

"Literature presents you with alternative mappings of the human experience. You see that the experiences of other people and other cultures are as rich, coherent and troubled as your own experiences. They are as beset with suffering as yours. Literature is a kind of legitimate voyeurism through the keyhole of language where you really come to know other people's lives – their anguish, their loves, their passions."

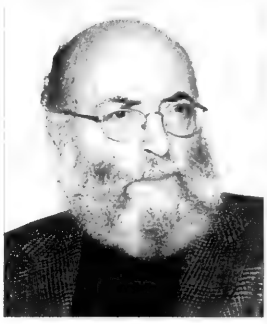
Under the auspices of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library and the Koffler Centre of the Arts, three southern Ontario scholars met last month in an attempt to assess Potok's literary legacy at a public forum held in the Leah Posluns Theatre in north Toronto.

A Retrospective on the Life and Literary Contribution of Chaim Potok was chaired by Judy Stoffman, publication editor for the Toronto Star. The healthy audience turnout made it obvious that Potok has left an indelible mark on the reading public as well as on the panel's three contributors.



Chaim Potok

Pierre Dube, professor of French literature at the University of Waterloo, said he was fascinated as a Christian to read Potok's works "and to learn what it means to be a Jew. To read about tradition, the Torah, explanations of Mishnah and Gemarah, and being introduced to gematriah – all this was fascinating. I never understood why the Jews were called the 'people of the Book' until I read The Chosen."

Drawing parallels between the closed chassidic society and the old-fashioned Mennonite community around Kitchener-Waterloo, Dube noted that while The Chosen was particular in its narrative focus, it has attracted a universal reading audience.

"As a non-Jew, I found a tremendous amount in Chaim Potok that spoke to me as a Christian," he said. "It is a profoundly Jewish novel – nevertheless it can be applied more widely than [to] the life of the Orthodox Jews in Williamsburg, New York."

Sara Horowitz, associate professor of English and humanities at York University, began her discussion by recounting her long involvement with the Potok family. She lived in the same community for several years in Philadelphia, served as a consultant on a board of the Jewish Publication Society when Potok did, and became an academic advisor and then friend to his daughter.

He excelled at the 'novel of ideas'

"I was riveted by it when I first read it as an adolescent," Horowitz said of The Chosen. "It told a good story, and it was the first time I had read a piece of American literature that seemed in some way to be about my life. Even though the two main characters were boys, nonetheless it was my life, my struggles, my issues that had wriggled their way into American literature. It made me feel that the stuff of my life was real."

Potok "was a family man as well as a man of letters," Horowitz said as she presented a brief biographical sketch. "He was well-versed, amazingly well-versed, in Jewish texts as well as in literature. In many ways I think he was a singularity in the North American literary scene, if not globally."

The Chosen "was something entirely new in American letters," Horowitz said. "It was the first major book published by a mainstream publisher that portrayed Orthodox Jewish life in the United States from the inside out.

"He broke it down into nuances, different ways of being Orthodox, something the larger American public was not aware of."

According to Horowitz, American women writers Cynthia Ozick, Allegra Goodman and Pearl Abraham followed in Potok's footsteps by writing about Jewish Orthodox life from the inside. (At least one notable male author, Nathan Englander, has also done so, albeit in a deeply satirical vein.)

Horowitz said Potok excelled at writing the "novel of ideas," and that while Jewish reviewers often found his books to be parochial and old-fashioned, they "resonated" with the wider community.

"Potok knew that when you write about something that you know, it becomes universal."

University of Toronto English professor Henry Auster said Potok's ideas are "compelling and interesting," but castigated the writer for "the plainness of his style" and said that he "teaches rather than delights."

Auster quoted Franz Kafka's familiar dictum to the effect that literature should be an ice-axe that breaks the frozen sea inside of us, and said that Potok's books make us happy but do not live up to that dictum.

"I see him as what Saul Bellow calls an explainer – an explainer and a chronicler of his times. The explanations centre around the Jewish experience and the Jewish tradition, in a strictly religious context. What is impressive and bold about him is the way he confronts the religious ideas in which he's been trained with the ideas of the modern world."

Rabbi Irwin Witty, director of the Albert & Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library, introduced and later thanked the panellists. The evening was presented as part of a series of literary events hosted by the library. •

The Song of Nature

By Batsheva Pomerantz
Israel Press Service

The Song of Songs, written by King Solomon, is read in many communities on the Sabbath that falls during Passover. This biblical holy scroll is appropriate for Passover, also known as the Festival of Spring (Chag Ha'Aviv), as its figurative language makes abundant reference to the flora, fauna and landscape of the land of Israel, especially during the season of renewal.

Symbolically, Solomon's Hebrew name, Shlomo, is from shalem ("complete") and shalom ("peace"). His reign was in fact one of the most peaceful and materially abundant periods in Jewish history. Author of two other biblical books, the philosophical Kohelet and Mishlei, a collection of parables, King Solomon was considered the wisest among men and was praised by leaders of the ancient world.

In the poetical eight-chapter Song of Songs, King Solomon portrays a love story between a young shepherd and a wealthy maiden, who is also a shepherdess. The story is interpreted as an allegory for the love between God and the people of Israel, unlike in the other biblical books, where the relationship is based on fear of God rather than love. The couple experiences the different stages of courtship, including endearment and rejection, which the Sages interpret as the stages that the people of Israel go through in their relationship with God. The relationship began during the first Passover – when the people of Israel were freed from slavery – and the making of a covenant with God is compared to a betrothal.

The love story is embellished with rich imagery, interpreted as symbols of the foundations of Jewish history. The tall cedars of Lebanon were used together with cypresses to build the couple's house, symbolic of the Temple. "As the lily among thorns, so is my beloved among the daughters" (the lily is Israel, chosen among the nations). And in fact, certain types of lilies can indeed be found in Israel growing among thorns.

The Song of Songs paints the land of Israel green, with reference to 23 types of flora. Prof. Yehuda Feliks, botanist and author of Plant World of the Bible, divides these into nine aromatic plants, three flowers, six fruit trees, two forest trees and three field plants.

Of the nine aromatic plants, only three were grown in Israel. Among them are saffron, balsam and henna, used as a dye in Yemenite pre-nuptial celebrations. Six of the aromatic plants were part of the 11 spices used for the incense (k'toret) offered daily by the Kohanim in the Temple. The blossoms and fruit of the vines, pomegranate trees, lilies and apple trees also produce pleasant smells.

Four of the fruit trees are from the seven species with which the Land of Israel is blessed: the vine, the fig, the pomegranate and the date palm (termed "honey" in the Bible). The charoset, eaten at the Seder, symbolizes the mortar used by the enslaved Hebrews. One of its many recipes includes figs, nuts, dates, pomegranates and apples – the fruit of trees mentioned in the Song of Songs. The "nut garden" (ginat egoz) is like a boustan, a Mediterranean-style orchard.

The images and similes also extend to the animal kingdom, including the black crow and white dove, both sent by Noah to look for dry land after his sojourn in the Ark. Only the dove returned, becoming the symbol of hope, peace and faithfulness. In the Song of Songs, the dove is used repeatedly as a term of endearment for the maiden. The songbirds, including the turtle-dove, build their nests, a sign of the renewal of spring.

Bodies of water appear in different forms: rivers, springs, wells and riverbeds. "Many waters cannot quench the love," writes King Solomon near the end of his book.

King Solomon's love for the beauty of the land of Israel is evident in the Song of Songs, as it is for his descendants who annually enjoy the renewal of spring, and await the opportunity to view its panoramic vistas and foliage: "For the autumn has passed and the rain is over and gone. The flowers are seen in the country, the season of the songbird arrived, and the sound of the turtle-dove is heard in our land."

Passover Greetings

The soul of A.B. Yehoshua

by Rahel Musleah

Like many Israelis who travel to India to clear their heads after three grueling years of army duty, noted Israeli author A.B. Yehoshua made a similar journey – a literary passage to India. In his book, Open Heart, India acts as an electric shock to spark a dramatic conflict inside the hero's soul.

"I needed a holiday from Israeli reality," says Yehoshua, who has written six novels, several plays and collections of short stories and essays. "I was exhausted from thinking about the big problems. India represents a break from the technological, efficient elements that dominate and direct us."

A.B. Yehoshua

Over breakfast at a hotel coffee shop in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Israeli reality seems as far away as the exotic Mediterranean is from the collegiate Charles River. But the "big problems" are never too distant, for Yehoshua exudes "Israeliness" from every pore of his being. A fifth-generation Jerusalemite who now lives in Haifa, he talks about everything from political ideology to "Israeli traffic" with a mixture of affection, fierceness and an accepting shrug of the shoulders. His hooded, deep-set eyes straddle a slightly flattened bulbous nose that testifies to his Sephardi heritage; his longish, wavy grey hair imparts a vague hippie-like air.

There is an intensity about Yehoshua that is most obvious when he speaks to an audience, gesticulating broadly across his stocky body and nearly jumping off the platform sometimes to emphasize the points he makes with unapologetic directness. In quieter conversation, that intensity is toned down a little, tempered with humour, but the strength of his convictions remains just as powerful. He reiterates, for instance, his controversial view that in the Diaspora, Judaism can become "a kind of hobby," that only in Israel can one be a "total Jew." Hard as it may be to imagine, he makes his points without superciliousness or arrogance.

"In Israel we turn on the news and this is Shas and this is a bomb and this is terrorism and the Cave of Machpelah and all the daily existential problems," he says. "Judaism is not just a fine book that you can turn the pages and say, 'Ho, this is a good sentence, a bright idea.' In Israel it's real life. As an Israeli, I live Judaism 24 hours a day."

He has been honing this stance a long time. "To be an Israeli is not only a question of citizenship but of identity," he wrote in 1990 years ago in Israel, a coffee-table book with photographs by Frederic Brenner (Harper & Row). "It expresses the Jewish totality… Discovering one's Jewish identity in exile is a matter of plotting the border that separates Jew from non-Jew: how is the Jew to preserve what is important to him in an alien culture that surrounds him like a sea? The questions that preoccupy the total Jew, the Israeli, are questions of meaning."

Even further back, in a collection of essays from 1981 called Between Right and Right (Doubleday), he wrote: "In Israel, every detail of life is tested against Jewish values, beliefs, conduct and dreams… Does the way in which an Israeli prison is being run comply with Jewish values? Much of our spiritual heritage operated only in theory, and what is gripping as well as painful about Israeli reality is that it exposes the theory to life."

Only in Israel, Yehoshua posits, is "normalcy" possible for Jews. Being different in the Diaspora is a "neurotic solution" to setting ourselves apart as a chosen people. "Normalcy is a question of structure," he explains. "To be normal is to be responsible for your behaviour, for your life. Living among other nations, the Jewish people cannot do that. That is the abnormality of the Diaspora, and is considered that way by Jews themselves, always longing for Jerusalem. Redemption is being responsible for all the components of your life."

But it is Yehoshua's extraordinary fiction that has vaulted him into the top echelon of Israeli intellectual life and given him the authority to make provocative and engaging statements. Yehoshua "deserves the mantle of the greatest living Israeli writer of fiction both from the point of view of experimenting with form and creating ambitious large works that try to mirror Israeli society as it develops," says Alan Mintz, the first Chana Kekst Professor of Hebrew Literature at the Jewish Theological Seminary. "His work has continued to develop and has undertaken new challenges in a way that is unique among major Israeli writers."

Born in 1936, Yehoshua grew up in Jerusalem and graduated from the Hebrew University with degrees in philosophy and Hebrew literature. Along with writers such as Amos Oz, he revolted against the socialist realism of the previous literary generation and focused on understanding how human beings worked rather than on depicting positive social heroes. Deeply influenced by Faulkner, Kafka and S.Y. Agnon, he incorporated many modernist techniques into his writing. He began his career with allegorical, existentialist short stories removed from time and place, gradually achieved a balance between exploring the universal predicaments of modern man and the particular dilemmas of Israeli life, and then moved to more internal psychological portrayals.

Yehoshua's first story was published in 1959, at the end of his military service, and was followed by a collection, The Death of the Old Man, in 1962, and a second collection, Facing the Forests, in 1968. He then turned to plays, writing three in succession, all of which have been staged and performed in Israeli theatres and abroad, and wrote a novella called At the Beginning of Summer 1970. He made a striking transition at the age of 40, when his first novel, The Lover, was published, and followed it with five more: A Late Divorce, Five Seasons, Mr. Mani, Open Heart and A Voyage to the End of Millennium (published in English in 2001). He has received numerous literary awards and has been a professor of comparative literature at Haifa University since 1972.

The mysterious initials of his name – A.B., or Aleph Bet in Hebrew – are fitting for a man of letters. They stand for Abraham, his given name, and "Bully," a random nickname that has stuck since childhood and by which he is almost universally known. He stresses that "Bully" does not have the English connotation of meanness, explaining that he inserted it into his nom de plume to differentiate between Abraham and Yehoshua, both of which sound like first names.

One of the most characteristic elements of Yehoshua's fiction is his sensitive probing of the human psyche, influenced profoundly by his wife, a clinical psychologist and psychoanalyst. "If you adopt the premises of psychology, you have a language and a culture," he says. "But it's dangerous to be too aware of psychology when you write because you have to feel your characters not only through your mind but also through your belly."

He always bears two critical skills in mind: empathy for his characters and objectivity. "It must be an empathy that will not bring you to self-mercy," he notes. That is a vital distinction, for his novels are peopled with characters who are lonely, neurotic, anxious, frustrated and sleepless, part of dysfunctional families where marital upset and generational conflict are common. Many of his later works explore gender motifs.

In Open Heart, which was published in 2001 in paperback by Harcourt Brace, the hero, Dr. Benjamin Rubin, struggles with spirituality and rebirth, and love, death and obsession. As Benjy vies for a staff position in one of Israel's top hospitals, the administrator, Lazar, summons him for an urgent personal mission: to bring Lazar's sick daughter safely home from India. Lazar and his wife, Dori, accompany Benjy to India. There, Benjy not only becomes obsessed with the holy rivers of India, but with the middle-aged, pampered Dori Lazar. When they return to Israel, Benjy begins an odyssey of self-discovery, facing his ambitions and desires – in essence, confronting his soul.

"While Open Heart lacks the hum and buzz of current events that has been present in Yehoshua's previous works," Mintz wrote in a review in The New York Times, "the novel seems, ironically enough, to be in closer touch with the tenor of Israeli life today. Despite recent atrocities, the peace process and the country's growing prosperity have made Israeli society more like our own – a society that is increasingly preoccupied by questions of individual fulfillment rather than ideology."

Yehoshua's novels also mirror the general trend in Israeli literature to include the previously disenfranchised voices of Arabs and Sephardim – groups that "were not part of the master Zionist narrative," Mintz explains. He was the first to explore the feelings of an Arab character; the monologue of a young Arab boy in The Lover represented a breakthrough in Israeli literature. He focused on the Sephardi contribution to Jewish history in his fourth novel, Mr. Mani, developed the encounter between East and West in Open Heart and delves into it deeply in A Voyage to the End of Millennium.

Over the years, Yehoshua has carried out his political views through ardent activism. Aside from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, he pinpoints three rifts that threaten Israeli society: the religious-nationalist conflict; the schism between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Israelis; and the breach between Israel and the Diaspora. To mend these "black holes," he urges new and creative structures to encourage dialogue.

Yehoshua's most recent novel, A Voyage to the End of Millennium, deals with similar sources of conflict – 1,000 years ago. It examines the clash between the powerful Sephardi communities of Spain and North Africa and the small, insignificant Ashkenazi communities of France and Germany over the question of bigamy – which was permitted by Sephardi Jews at that time. Though it is his first novel that has "nothing to do with the land of Israel," it has plenty of contemporary relevance.

Child's Concerns

by Karen Eini

Last night, as I tucked you in safely for the night,
You asked me once again, "Ema why do they fight?"
"Is our shelter ready?, Is it going to be Ok?"
"What are we going to do? Where will we stay?"
What's going to happen? Are we going to die?
Ema, please tell me, Please tell me why!?"
I kissed your sweet face, as you lay in your bed,
And tried to clear the worries from your nine year old head.
I thought about the mother,
Far away in Iraq
Who was explaining to her child,
About the danger of attack.
And as our countries prepare for war,
Getting ready for the fight,
It is the mothers of the world, with whom I unite.
Tonight as we hold our children, close to our heart,
Let us pray together, that this war will never start.

Yehoshua believes in the possibility of change

Yehoshua dedicated the book to his father, an orientalist who wrote 12 books on the history of Jerusalem. His death some 20 years ago was, perhaps, the spark that ignited Yehoshua's renewed interest in his Sephardi roots, which "were always in a drawer in my person," he says.

"My father was very nostalgic," he reminisces. "He wouldn't recall the tie he was wearing in the morning but he could remember what was on the plate of his grandmother at the beginning of the century. Until recently, I distanced myself from the sweet ways of nostalgia. But perhaps now is the time to turn to it. I smell it. I feel it."

As an aside, he notes that his wife wrote her doctoral thesis on how nostalgia helps creativity.

Although he has not incorporated real events from his life into his novels, he has woven bits and pieces of himself into his characters. Glimmers of his personality filter through his writing; as his characters struggle with insomnia, for him, too, "sleep is always a mission – often an impossible one." He is self-critical, impatient, often tense and admittedly obsessive about things like punctuality, but also sees himself as loving. He laughs when asked if he has any hobbies. "I don't have any," he says, then adds, "Driving helps me relax. I think only about the road."

His wife characterizes him as a spiritual person. "I hope so," Yehoshua says. "Even though I don't believe in God, I am concerned with the way human beings use the word God."

He also believes in the possibility of change, both on a national and a personal level. "I never use the terms 'Jewish destiny' or 'Jewish fate' because fate is your character, and you can change your character," he says. "But it is a slow, step-by-step process. You increase your liberty by obeying Socrates' statement that the only goal in man's life is knowing himself better. That is never finished."

His novels are peopled with lonely, neurotic, anxious, frustrated and sleepless characters

Do his books help readers know Yehoshua? "When you read a novel, you can understand the soul of a writer," he answers. "You may not find autobiography, but you will find my tone and way of thinking." That is why, he adds, writers take offence at criticism. "It's not just saying you've done a bad job. It's saying your personality is lousy. I remember all the names and details of bad criticism – which is maybe 15 per cent of all the criticism. The good ones I forget immediately."

Yehoshua spends about three years on each novel. His skill and success have raised expectations of his work to a burdensome pitch.

"The more you are known, the more you are under fire," he says. Open Heart was a bestseller in Israel, selling 84,000 copies, but Yehoshua is still struggling with what that means.

"Was it because it was good or too superficial?" he asks.

The bestseller list was established in Israel a few years ago, and has redirected some critics to focus on sales figures instead of on literary achievement.

After that novel, Yehoshua says, he needed a rest. "It's important for my next work not to rush, not to jump immediately on new material, but to think, to visit, to hear others, to read. When you write, you don't read. I have to examine my way. After each book you have to understand exactly what you've done. I always try to produce something new. I don't repeat myself." •

The Warsaw Ghetto, 60 years ago

April 19 marked the 60th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, a desperate revolt by the Jews of Warsaw in the face of the Nazis' genocidal designs. The revolt has come to symbolize the refusal of Jews to go quietly to their deaths and its close conjunction to Yom Hazikaron and Israel Independence Day has come to symbolize the rebirth of the Jewish people in Israel.

Within a year of the Nazi invasion of Poland in September 1939, Nazi authorities issued a decree creating a Jewish ghetto in Warsaw.

Established as part of the Nazi plan to destroy European Jewry, the ghetto intially comprised 340 hectares (840 acres) in central Warsaw. Its gates were closed on November 16, 1940, consigning its Jewish prisoners to a hellish existence.

In all, as many as 500,000 Jews lived in the ghetto at one time or another. Most were Warsaw residents and Jews from surrounding towns, but Jews from Germany and Czechoslovakia were deported there as well.

Life in the ghetto was horrific. Some 78,000 died of starvation and disease and most of the others were deported to death camps or to forced labour camps.

When the uprising broke out on April 19, 1943, after Pesach began, there may have been 41,000 Jews still living there, though the estimate of Jurgen Stroop, the SS general who destroyed the ghetto, put the number closer to 61,000.

Remarkably, some of the ghetto's survivors still live among us, though only a handful of participants in the uprising itself are still alive.

The CJN will feature some of the survivors' stories begining in this week's issue and continuing next week.Please see pages 8, 9, and 26.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Holocaust Memorial

FREDERICTON — An annual Holocaust memorial observance for the local Jewish community will take place this year on Sunday, April 27, 7:30 p.m. at Fredericton's Sgoolai Israel Synagogue. Philip Riteman, a Holocaust survivor who now lives in Halifax, will speak about his experiences during his five years as a prisoner in the Auschwitz-Birkenau and Dachau concentration camps.

ISRAEL

Digging King David

JERUSALEM — Excavations in Israel at Tel Rehov, near Beit Shean, have reinforced historical evidence for the existence of King David's kingdom. Signs of an urban society dating back to the 10th century BCE affirm the existence of a united monarchy under kings David and Solomon, Hebrew University says. The biblical account of the kings' reigns has been debated over the last decade, with some saying the accounts have a weak historical base.

Second Netanya Seder

NETANYA — Some 34 Israelis injured in a suicide bombing last year at a seder in a Netanya hotel went to a seder there again last week. They were invited by the Park Hotel's management, which raised funds to host them for four days. Twenty-nine people died in the attack in the hotel dining room, where 250 guests gathered for Pesach. Last week, four Hamas terrorists who planned the attack received 29 consecutive life sentences.

Palestinian Poll

JERUSALEM — Seventy-one per cent of Palestinians support a joint cessation of violence with Israel, a new poll says. But until there is one, 57 per cent back attacks against Israeli civilians inside Israel. The survey, by the Palestinian Centre for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah and Hebrew University researchers found 70 per cent of Palestinians think a Palestinian government headed by Prime Minister Abu Mazen would be able to renew talks with Israel. But only 39 per cent believe it could enforce a ceasefire on all Palestinian factions.

WORLD

Shooting Called Terror

LOS ANGELES — The FBI is calling the shooting deaths of two Israeli-Americans at Los Angeles International Airport last July an act of terrorism. But the Egyptian-born killer had no links to Islamic extremists, the FBI's final report on the case says. Standing in the El Al passenger line last July 4, Hesham Mohamed Hadayet opened fire with a .45-calibre handgun, killing Ya'acov Aminov, 46, and Victoria Hen, 25. He was killed by an El Al security guard. Israel and U.S. Jewish groups quickly called the attack terrorism, but after waffling for months, the FBI has also concluded Hadayet methodically planned the killings to express anger over Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

Restitution Deadline

VIENNA — Austria is urging people and the heirs of people who incurred material losses as a result of persecution or having to flee persecution by the Nazi regime in Austria during World War II to apply in writing by May 28 for compensation from the country's $210-million (US) General Settlement Fund for Victims of National Socialism (GSF), established in 2001. To be considered, applications must arrive at an Austrian embassy or consulate or at the GSF offices in Vienna by the deadline. Details and applications can be found at the GSF's Web site, www.nationalfonds.org/aef/english/, or from the Austrian embassy in Ottawa at www.austro.org/e/Restitution/restitution_frames.html.

Papon Too Sick for Jail

PARIS — Maurice Papon is still too sick to return to prison, three independent medical experts have concluded. The former senior official in Vichy France was convicted for crimes against humanity and released last year because of poor health. The medical experts were named by a court near Papon's home east of Paris after he refused to attend a hearing in January. As the senior Vichy official in southwest France, Papon ordered the deportation of more than 1,500 French Jews to Auschwitz. He was later a cabinet official in postwar French governments.

Nazi Suspects Named

JERUSALEM — Operation: Last Chance, an effort to create a list of Latvian Holocaust perpetrators has found 37 suspects, the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem says. The centre and the Targum Shlishi Foundation of Miami are offering rewards for the conviction and punishment of Baltic Nazi war criminals. Several names are being investigated by the centre prior to their submission to Latvian prosecutors.

11 Tonnes of Pesach Food Sent to Cuba

OTTAWA — For the 42nd straight year, the Jews of Cuba were able to celebrate Pesach thanks to the help of the Canadian Jewish community.

A ship with 11 tonnes of kosher food – including 106 cases of kosher wine, 116 cases of matzah and 110 cases of gefilte fish – arrived last week in Havana in time for the first seder.

It was sent by Canadian Jewish Congress using donations collected during the year by synagogues across Canada, and with the help of steep discounts from suppliers. CJC has been sending kosher food to Cuban Jews since 1961, when the U.S. embargo against the Caribbean nation stopped kosher imports from the United States.

"We're pretty well it for the Cuban community. There is no other community that sends them anything like this," the CJC's Bruce Kurta told the Ottawa Citizen.

Last year, CJC shipped 10 tonnes of kosher-for-Pesach supplies to Cuba's 1,500 Jews.

Toronto-born officer killed in IDF operation

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"He never told me about the dangerous things he did," said Gerry Males, mourning the sudden death of her 24-year-old grandson, Daniel Mandel, a Toronto-born Israeli army lieutenant who was killed in the West Bank last week, the day before Passover.

He was a hero, making the world safe for Jews

"He loved life," she said. "He was a hero, making the world safe for Jews."

A dual Israeli Canadian citizen, Mandel was shot in the line of duty on Tuesday, April 15 in Nablus during a raid on a building where three suspected Palestinian terrorists had taken refuge.

They were variously described as members of Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist group, and of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a faction of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement.

According to a report in Ha'aretz, an Israeli force surrounded the dwelling and demanded the surrender of the Palestinians.

Two of the suspects surrendered. A third, Mazen Sharitah, emerged from the building firing a pistol, killing Mandel and wounding two other soldiers. Sharitah was later killed.

Mandel, a resident of the West Bank settlement of Alon Shevut, south of Jerusalem, joined the army four years ago.

He was the son of former Torontonians David and Cheryl Mandel.

The Mandels and their other children, Nicole, Jonah, Gabriel and Shlomo, made aliyah in the summer of 1987, several months before the outbreak of the first Palestinian uprising.

David is a psychiatrist and Cheryl is manager of the Judaica Center in Gush Etzion.

Born and raised in Toronto, Mandel attended Bialik Hebrew Day School. After he finished an Israeli army officer's training course, he was apparently asked to stay on for another year.

His Toronto cousin, Deena Mandel, described him as a kind, caring, generous person, an "exceptional kid" and a "wonderful young man with a lot of promise."

Daniel Mandel

He enjoyed music, played several instruments and had recently purchased a bagpipe in Ireland.

The Mandels lived in the Casa Loma area, were members of Beth Sholom and moved to Israel after David Mandel became more observant.

Miriam Goldstein, a family friend in Toronto who has known the Mandels for 25 years, said that Mandel was "a beautiful, bright, funny boy, a prince, a mensch, a boy who could have done anything."

She said he felt a responsibility to protect his family and his people.

"He died defending Israel, but this is a kid who had such a reverence for life, who probably wouldn't kill a spider. He left behind so many people who loved and respected him. He was a special boy."

The CJN called the Mandel residence in Israel, but there was no answer.

In a story in the Israeli magazine Amit two years ago, shortly after the current intifadah broke out, Cheryl Mandel said the stress of the intifadah had affected her outlook.

"Now, I feel anxious, worried, not at all optimistic and despondent," she was quoted as saying. "I feel I'm beginning to look my age because of the tension caused by the past months of Arab violence."

Daunting, but epic novel

In an ongoing effort to counter the campaign being waged in some European and North American quarters to isolate Israeli authors and writers, The CJN in this space, in the last issue of each month, features a work by an Israeli writer.

Past Continuous by Yaakov Shabtai is a monumental work. Originally published in 1977 and translated into English by Dalya Bilu, it has recently been re-released by Tusk Ivories of the Overland Press. It is also a daunting work that recalls the style, the detail and the elegance of both Marcel Proust and James Joyce.

Shortly after its appearance in 1977 and subsequent translation into English, the novel was resoundingly acclaimed by Israeli and foreign literary critics. Shabtai's death from heart disease at the young age of 47, merely four years later, ensured the novel's enduring status as a work of significance.

The story centres on the intertwined lives of three friends, Goldman, Caesar and Israel. None is a particularly inspiring or appealing figure; all manifest various existential and social "pathologies." Indeed, the novel opens with the announcement of Goldman's suicide.

The three friends are the children of the generation that founded the country. The aimlessness and seeming lack of any sense of purpose in their lives, one cannot avoid concluding, was intended by the author to be a metaphor for the state of young adults in Israel at that time.

Shabtai has constructed an elaborate multi-level, multi-dimensional matrix of emotional, psychological and chronological detail that reveals itself later in the story as an elaborate connecting of character dots, so to speak.

The novel does not move forward in a narrative sense. Rather, it unfolds like a constant lifting of veils on myriad cross-referenced points in the lives of the characters in the novel. Those characters include members of the wider, extended families and friends of the three central male characters. Through the painstaking chronicling of key events in their lives, Shabtai builds a Rube Goldberg-like literary design where each component is interdependent on the other.

Past Continuous requires commitment from the reader. The book demands focus and concentration. It is the exposition of a long memory, committed to paper in one gargantuan chapter, with few paragraph breaks and frequent marathon sentences that meld together the way human thoughts do, in nuances, subtly, without distinct breaks or differentiations.

But one need not be deterred by the daunting style and format of the novel. As Alan Mintz, professor of Hebrew literature at the University of Maryland, wrote about the book soon after it appeared in English, "The astonishing fact is that Past Continuous puts the reader into a kind of hypnotic trance in which any resistance to the telling of the tale disappears. The secret, I think, lies in Shabtai's extraordinary – and extraordinarily long – sentences. They manage at the same time both to sweep the reader forward and to immerse him in the dense texture of human time."

Shabtai was the author of many plays, novels, short stories and children's books. In 1999, the municipality of Tel Aviv named a street after him. It was a poignant and fitting tribute to an artist who so ably captured the beautiful colours and discordant contradictions of that city.

As we approach Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, it would be remiss of me not to bring readers' attention to an important mini-publication last fall by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University titled Facing Past and Future: Teaching and Portraying the Holocaust a Generation Later.

The booklet contains two essays, one each by Sara Horowitz and Mark Webber, both associate professors at York. Martin Lockshin, the centre's director, contributes a foreword.

Since September 2000, we have witnessed an alarming increase in anti Semitism, some manifestations of which have included various reiterations of Holocaust denial.

The publication of the Horowitz and Webber essays thus responds to urgent contemporary needs – both societal and Jewish.

Horowitz analyses three Holocaust films in World of Their Parents: the Second Generation Films the Holocaust. She describes how these films depict artistic, emotional and intellectual dilemmas faced by the children of survivors in trying to understand the experiences of their parents.

In Racism, Antisemitism and the Holocaust: Learning from the Past – Teaching for the Future, Webber artfully and substantively debunks the argument that anti-Semitism should not be part of the anti-racism curriculum.

The essays are timely contributions.

AUTHORS' PARTY: Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad recently hosted an authors' party, in honour of a group of students who had written their own books. With advice over the the past few months from Grade 5 teacher Mrs. Fleischmann who has co-authored a children's novel, the young authors brainstormed for ideas, wrote drafts, proofread, edited, designed the final format and drew illustrations for their books. The books were collected to be put on display in the school library.

"Successful weight loss relies as much on the mind as the body."
– Women's Day Magazine

When diets fail...

Local hypnosis centres prove that losing weight for good is a mind game

Wendy Rayner of Newmarket was overweight almost all of her life.

She tried all sorts of diets and gimmicks. "I was on and off Weight Watchers for 30 years. For as long as I can remember, dieting was a significant part of my life. I was always embarrassed about my size," Rayner laments.

For most of us, losing weight can seem like an endless battle. Despite our sincerest efforts to stick to a diet, our subconscious acts like the bad guy seducing us into eating half a chocolate cake or a package of cookies. But with hypnosis, the struggle can be resolved — and we can begin to see genuine weight loss results.

Dr. Patrick Porter, Executive Director of Positive Changes, says that "with hypnosis, we increase the ability to absorb suggestion." Ineffective, destructive behaviour is replaced effortlessly by healthier behaviour and people start to lose weight, stop smoking or reduce stress — and finally see the resolution of life-long battles.

For Wendy Rayner the results were immediate and long lasting. Since starting her hypnosis program in 2001, she shed 45 pounds and has easily maintained her trim figure for 2 years. "I melted off 45 pounds of fat. I dropped from an uncomfortable size 16 to a petite size 4!" smiles Rayner.

Many other local people have experienced similar results. Marina Carrott of Toronto now weighs what she did on her wedding day, 19 years ago. "I never felt as if I was on a diet — a good thing because my hobby is cooking. My second favourite thing to do is trying out new restaurants, and I never felt deprived," says Carrott.

Porter explains, "Marina's experience with dieting is not uncommon. The reality is that our ingrained habits are stronger than will power. With hypnosis we helped Marina to reprogram her subconscious with the positive habits of a naturally thin person. Once Marina took back control, her weight loss could happen automatically."

Israel plays matchmaker for Toronto couple

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Every romance has its own unique love story, but this one is a veritable globetrotting odyssey.

To be exact, it spans 8,500 kilometres, from the Holy Land to the northernmost point of Alaska.

Darren Strong, 28, and Shayna Allen, 30, will be tying the knot on July 13 this year in Sydney, Nova Scotia.

The Toronto residents met on a Birthright Israel trip in July 2001. To say the planets aligned for this chance meeting is an understatement.

"Darren was supposed to go on a June trip," Allen recalls, explaining that the date of her husband-to-be's final chiropractic exam suddenly switched because of a change of venue.

Had the dates worked out differently, Strong would have been prohibited from participating, as he was 26 at the time, the oldest age permitted.

Allen, director of the Jewish Student Federation at York University, was not originally scheduled to staff this trip, but plans changed because she was scheduled to march at a friend's wedding.

When asked if meeting a special someone on the free, 10-day excursion to Israel had been even a remote thought, Strong and Allen answer today with a resounding "no."

Strong said he was seeking out his Jewish identity.

"At that time, I was definitely looking into exploring Judaism and learning more about being Jewish," Strong said.

Allen loves Israel, but she went on this trip because, essentially, it was part of her job.

Their attraction was ignited even before the plane took off.

"A lot of Birthrighters want to get to see Israel, but they don't want to explore their Judaism," Allen said.

"When we were at the airport leaving for Israel, an older man asked Darren to put on tfillin and he did. When I saw that, I thought, I'd like to know this guy."

They spent their first night in Israel talking instead of sleeping.

"We hit it off like a friendship right from the very beginning," Allen said.

The bond grew as the trip continued and both Strong and Allen believe Israel itself was somewhat of a matchmaker for them.

"Love and relationships happen in the strangest and most amazing places," Allen said.

"Daren fell in love with Israel and I absolutely adore it. If you're in a place with another person who shares that kind of love, then this can happen."

Despite their connection, neither thought they'd be getting married when the trip wrapped up.

"I was in a state where I wanted to be single," Strong says.

"But as soon as I got back from Israel, I wanted to figure out a way to go back to Israel and Shayna was my only contact for being a part of Jewish community events."

"I was really intrigued," Allen says. "But I didn't want to lay any pressure or make things confusing for him."

By September, they started dating.

Within months, their courtship blossomed.

Normally, the famous words "the rest is history" would conclude this story, but the journey continued north. Allen is originally from New Waterford, Nova Scotia, a town of 7,000 near Sydney.

The couple has decided to hold their wedding at the Temple Sons of Israel, Sydney's only synagogue, which has not hosted a wedding in 16 years.

"They fight for a minyan every week and [having our wedding] is a way of bringing back life into the synagogue," Allen says.

Strong agrees. "I like the idea of having it out there. We're maintaining our Jewish traditions out east."

Strong and Allen could have decided to live in Toronto after the wedding, but that would be too simple.

Instead, the couple will be moving to Barrow, Alaska, the northernmost tip of Alaska on the Beaufort Sea.

"It all started as curiosity," Strong says.

Because he is certified to work as a chiropractor in the United States, Strong always considered the possibility of moving there.

He was looking on the Internet for job opportunities in the United States and started to correspond with a doctor who works in Alaska. He soon found himself interested in a job opportunity.

"It will be a great experience to travel and work," he says.

What about the Jews of Alaska, the so-called "frozen-chosen?"

"We did a lot of research about this town of 4,500 people and we found a Jewish community in Nome, Alaska, on the Bering Strait, which separates Alaska from Russia," Strong says.

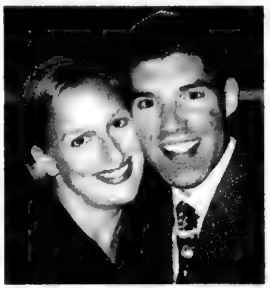
Allen says there are 5,000 Jews in Alaska, not quite enough for her to direct a Jewish student federation, but that's OK.

"I have a degree in recreation management… and I'm hoping to get back into working with children in the community," Allen says.

Like the TV show Northern Exposure, which featured the fictional Jewish character Joel Fleischmann as a doctor in Alaska, Strong, who is moving to Barrow at the end of April, will take on a similar role in a chiropractic clinic.

"Right now, our first goal is to [stay] for a year," says Allen, who will be joining Strong in August. "Then maybe two."

Just be sure to bundle up!



Shayna Allen and Darren Strong.

Youth group being launched at Miles Nadal JCC

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The secular Zionist youth group, Hashomer Hatzair, is launching its second Toronto "ken" (branch) this Sunday, Apr. 27.

The new group will be based at the Miles Nadal JCC at Bloor and Spadina and will serve junior high and high school students.

Two months ago, Frances Enchin, the JCC's manager of cultural arts and adult Jewish education, approached Ora Merin, the Israeli shlichah at Hashomer Hatzair, about the possibility of the youth group setting up shop downtown as well as in its north Toronto location.

Merin was delighted by the request. Unbeknownst to Enchin, Hashomer Hatzair had submitted a grant application last year to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for funding to open a downtown branch.

"Many of our chanichim [participants] come from downtown," Merin told The CJN. "We don't expect them to do both programs, but we hope, at least at the beginning, that they will strengthen the new group."

Also, she noted, the existing Friday evening programs are not always convenient for participants or their parents.

The new group will be youth-led, as is the existing one. All the leaders are already involved with the existing group, which has 120 members, said Merin.

Enchin said she doesn't recall a Jewish teen program, other than the weekly high school program, at the JCC in the 15 years she's been involved there, first as a volunteer and a parent, and for the past eight years as staff. The high school discussion group is a different type of program, she said. "This is not intended to replace it."

Downtown Jewish teenagers are "a pretty diverse group," said Enchin, adding that most don't go to schools with large Jewish populations.

"I felt it was important to get something going," said Enchin, who has been discussing the issue informally with fellow parents for a long time. "I thought this was a good time because the building is going to be a sparkling, new, attractive place." The JCC was temporarily closed recently to eliminate mould in parts of the building. It is still undergoing renovations.

Hashomer Hatzair is part of an international youth movement established in eastern Europe in 1913. Along with weekly activities during the school year, the organization runs Camp Shomria in the summer.

"It's informal education dealing with Zionism and Israel," said Merin. "There are lots of games, lots of triggers to thinking, indoor and outdoor activities."

The group's philosophies are "really motivating and exciting," said Naomi Rose, the JCC's executive director. "They energize young people – engaging them in social justice and community work while promoting a strong commitment to Israel and strengthening Jewish identity."

The first meeting will be held this Sunday at 3:30 p.m. For further information, contact Frances Enchin at 416-924-6211 or Ora Merin at 416-736-1339.

Brampton preparing for another Spring Sprint

BRAMPTON, Ont. — On May 4, about 1,000 people from across Southern Ontario will head to scenic Professor's Lake to participate in the David Bloom Memorial Spring Sprint, raising funds for the Brain Tumour Foundation of Canada (BTFC).

The sprint is held in honour of David Bloom, who died in April 2001 of an astrocytoma – an inoperable cancerous brain tumour – at age 19. He was diagnosed with the condition when he was 17.

"We have raised more than $250,000 since the first sprint two years ago, and we're not going to stop until a cure is found," said sprint chair Lawrie Bloom, David's father.

To date, more than $60,000 in corporate sponsorship has already been raised for this year's sprint.

"David was an inspiration to everyone he met. We're using his legacy to help others survive," said Bloom.

"We are making a difference, and I think that's why we've seen such overwhelming community support."

A singer, actor, dancer, straight-A student and a song leader at Brampton's Har Tikvah synagogue, David touched thousands of people in his hometown and across the country with his presence, charisma, enthusiasm and zest for life, said Bloom.

From shows at Paramount Canada's Wonderland to the Charlottetown Festival's Somewhere in the World, David always wowed the crowds to standing ovations, he said.

This year, Brampton will join 11 communities across Canada in holding a spring sprint. Brampton Mayor Susan Fennell will start the sprint while MOJO Radio personalities Humble and Fred will be the MCs.

There will be live entertainment, a huge silent auction, a barbecue and free pre-sprint refreshments for everyone attending the event.

The event will begin at 9:30 a.m. with live entertainment and free refreshments. The sprint starts at 10:15 a.m. with participants walking, running or wheeling the 3 km route around Professor's Lake. The festivities will continue until about 12:30 p.m.

Pre-registration is encouraged by obtaining a pledge-form package from the BTFC at 1-800-265-5106 or by visiting www.springsprint.com. All participants obtaining $35 or more in pledges will receive a 2003 Spring Sprint T-shirt.

History's straight line

The photo set into this editorial is of the sculpture by Nathan Rapoport that memorializes Mordechai Anielewicz, one of the leaders of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. The sculpture stands beside a destroyed water tower at the crest of a small promontory in Kibbutz Yad Mordechai just south of Ashkelon in Israel.

The water tower is a reminder of the courage of the young men and women who defended the kibbutz against the onslaught of attacking Egyptian soldiers in Israel's War of Independence in 1948. Besieged and cut off from supplies and reinforcements, the kibbutz ultimately fell to the Egyptians. But it was recaptured some weeks later.

Five years earlier, as Jews around the world, even in war-ravaged Europe, were celebrating Pesach, their co-religionists in the Warsaw Ghetto defended their lives and their dignity against the onslaught of the Nazi soldiers who had resumed their assault against the ghetto. These Jews too ultimately fell in battle.

The statue and the water tower remind us so very starkly and so very movingly that there is a straight line of courage and of Jewish history joining those two epochal events.

When we light a memorial candle next week, on the evening of the 27th of Nisan, to commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, let us recall that line, the people and the events that are tied to it and our own place alongside.

Good luck Mr. Charest

Politics in Canada appears to be changing. Next week, on April 29, Jean Charest will be sworn in as the new premier of Quebec, and his Liberal party, having won a commanding majority of 75 of the 125 seats in the National Assembly, will form that province's new government.

Unequivocally, Quebecers voted for change.

Before the election campaign, Charest was not expected by the experts and the pundits to do well. During the campaign, he set those expectations on their head. Now, Charest has earned the right to steer the governance of his province according to policies and priorities of his choosing, which will be different from those of the preceding Parti Québécois government.

One of those guideposts, we hope, will be the affirmation of the notion that to serve Quebec and Canada's best interests simultaneously, is inherently compatible.

We extend congratulations to Charest and his team. May he govern with wisdom and compassion. May Quebec, indeed all of Canada, prosper under and during his stewardship.

Communities should relocate

I read with interest the article about Pinchas Gerber, who is a resident of Ginot Shomron in the West Bank ("Visiting Israeli seeks funds for Shomron," CJN, April 3). Gerber was visiting Toronto recently to raise money for his community. The article claims that the central government is cutting allocations by three to six per cent because of the economic crisis in Israel.

I have a solution for the economic ills these West Bank communities are facing. Why don't they relocate into Israel proper, within pre-1967 borders? This way, the government will not have to spend money and resources on securing settlements, expropriating Palestinian lands and creating bypass roads. The funding for such projects can be better used to ensure the economic and social well-being of Israelis, while at the same time moving towards accommodation with the Palestinians.

Should Jews support Iraq war?

Before the Iraq war, the March 20 issue of CJN ran a "news in brief" item with the headline "Rabbis seek U.S. lawmaker's resignation." The article reported that six Virginia rabbis asked that Rep. James Moran resign because he had suggested the Jewish community was behind the George W. Bush administration's push for a war against Iraq. But such a connection between the Jewish community and the war in Iraq has been deplored by other Jews as well.

B'nai Brith Canada supports the war, as does the editorial in the March 27 issue of CJN. Such messages confirm Moran's assumptions of how the Jewish community feels. However, Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and most Jews with whom I have broached the subject do not support the United States' actions and would like the pro-war public statements by Jewish organizations to stop.

Carleton University responds

I would like to clarify Carleton University's policies on public advocacy and free speech, in response to your article "Carleton Jewish students denied protest rights" (CJN, April 3).

Under current arrangements, a public space in the University Centre called Baker's Lounge is maintained and managed by the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA). Student clubs and organizations apply to CUSA for permission to set up booths and displays. CUSA in turn seeks assurances that the materials on display are consistent with the association's standards.

The university administration, as distinct from CUSA, has a parallel responsibility to preserve the legality and orderliness of the events on campus, including those in Baker's Lounge, and – like CUSA– to ensure to the extent possible that individuals are allowed to exercise rights of free expression. To achieve this, we have so far prevented opposition groups, when security is an issue, from interfering with the expression of potentially controversial points of view. As an alternative, we have encouraged groups with opposing points of view to present their own displays under the same guarantees, but at another time.

I have concluded from a review of the events referred to in your article that the administration of this policy prevented Ann Silverstone and her colleagues from demonstrating against the Palestinian display. I have also concluded that the same policy facilitated a presentation last week – officers from University Safety were present – by the Israel Advocacy Committee. Additionally, the Israel Advocacy Committee made a presentation in February and, as I understand it, university security officers disbanded a group of Palestinians activists when security was requested by Jewish students.

I believe that, in collaboration with the executive of CUSA, the university administration should reconsider the nature and timing of the displays in Baker's Lounge and decide if Baker's Lounge is an appropriate place for political and religious advocacy. It is in a main university thoroughfare and such advocates tend to interfere with normal business and conversation.

Universities as institutions of learning and ideas must ensure that free expression occurs within a very wide ambit. At the same time, we have to give attention to well-being and safety.

We must visit Israel

The Jewish Theological Seminary sent a mission to Israel this winter. We were elated at the opportunity to visit the Holy Land and signed up immediately. Although the security situation had worsened in the five years since our last trip, neither of us thought twice about our decision to take part in the five-day solidarity mission sponsored and subsidized by the Israeli government.

We viewed our participation as a responsibility to the Jews of Israel who face terrorism every day, and an opportunity to have fun, visit family and friends, and tour the biblical sites we have studied all our lives. During the short but intense trip, we gathered a lifetime's worth of memories, from interacting with victims of various Jerusalem terror attacks, to davening on the beach at Tel Aviv, to meeting with leaders of the Conservative movement.

We were disappointed by the sight of the weak crowd on Ben Yehuda Street, but our spirits remained high nonetheless; after all, we were in Israel.

As we walked to "the pit" (a vendors' market on Ben Yehuda popular with teenagers), we passed Sbarro, another Ben Yehuda favourite that we visited in '98, the same one that was bombed on Aug. 9, 2001. The sight of the renovated pizzeria reminded us of the delicacy of the situation and our great privilege of being in Jerusalem again. When we reached "the pit," we were greeted, alas, with a scant showing of two vendor tables. We were stricken with disbelief. How could this possibly be? These merchants are out here trying to make a living despite the possible danger of terror, and no one is here to support them! Well, we were there. And we will be there again.

'The last wish of my life has been fulfilled'

It fell to someone very young to bear the responsibility of leading the Warsaw Ghetto resistance against the Nazis.

Mordechai Anielewicz was born in 1919. After finishing his high school in Warsaw, he joined Hashomer Hatzair, the left-leaning, secular Zionist movement that preached a return to the Land and self-reliance.

The 23-year-old Anielewicz was away from Warsaw during the summer of 1942. But he returned and quickly reorganized and reinvigorated the Zydowska Organizacja Bojowa, or ZOB, the fighting forces of the desperate but determined Jews who were still in the ghetto. In November, Anielewicz was appointed the commander of ZOB.

On April 19, 1943, the Nazis began the final deportation of the few remaining Jews in the ghetto, eventually burning down the ghetto block by block.

It was then that the Jews of the ghetto made their last stand.

The following is the young commanders's final correspondence, to Antek Zuckerman, a leader of the underground in Warsaw.

It is now clear to me that what took place exceeded all expectations. In our opposition to the Germans, we did more than our strength allowed – but now our forces are waning. We are on the brink of extinction. We forced the Germans to retreat twice – but they returned stronger than before.

One of our groups held out for 40 minutes; and another fought for about six hours. The mine which was laid in the area of the brush factory exploded as planned. Then we attacked the Germans and they suffered heavy casualties.

Our losses were generally low. That is an accomplishment too. Z. fell next to his machine gun.

I feel that great things are happening and that this action which we have dared to take is of enormous value.

We have no choice but to go over to partisan methods of fighting as of today. Tonight, six fighting groups are going out. They have two tasks: to reconnoitre the area and to capture weapons. Remember, "short-range weapons" are of no use to us. We employ them very rarely. We need many rifles, hand grenades, machine guns and explosives.

I cannot describe the conditions in which the Jews of the ghetto are now "living." Only a few exceptional individuals will be able to survive such suffering. The others will sooner or later die. Their fate is certain, even though thousands are trying to hide in cracks and rat holes. It is impossible to light a candle, for lack of air.

Greetings to you who are outside. Perhaps a miracle will occur and we shall see each other again one of these days. It is extremely doubtful.

The last wish of my life has been fulfilled. Jewish self-defence has become a fact. Jewish resistance and revenge have become a reality. I am happy to have been one of the first Jewish fighters in the ghetto.

From where will rescue come?

Mordechai Anielewicz

Surprise in the southeast

My recent lecture tour in the United States took me to a part of the country that, despite my fairly extensive travels, I had never visited. My journey featured a lecture in Greensboro, N.C., which my friend and I reached after a five-hour drive from Washington, D.C.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

When we arrived, we were directed to a lovely hotel that bore the name of O. Henry, the popular writer of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, who was born in Greensboro.

It seemed like a coincidence, because it happens that, since my younger years, I have fancied the short stories of Sidney Porter, known better by his pen name, O. Henry. If you, dear reader, have never known the pleasure of his charming tales, I suggest you visit the nearest library and take home a copy. A delightful afternoon or evening awaits you when you spend a few hours relishing the short stories that this no-longer-familiar American writer has left behind.

History buffs will be quick to tell you that another important feature this area is known for is the battle of Guilford Court House, in which the Revolutionary forces led by Gen. Nathaniel Greene faced the troops of British Gen. Earl Cornwallis. Fought near Greensboro on March 15, 1781, the battle was the largest, most hotly contested action of the Revolutionary War's southern campaign. The serious loss of British manpower suffered at Guilford Courthouse foreshadowed Cornwallis' final defeat at Yorktown seven months later.

It should also be noted that North Carolina was among the first of the original American colonies to explicitly welcome Jewish settlers – a remarkable aspect of history that should not be forgotten.

Greensboro's modern Jewish community makes up in spirit what it lacks in numbers. Its Reform and Conservative congregations are alive and well. It is remarkable that they support a Jewish boarding school, which is located on a spacious campus in the northwestern part of the city, designed for various community uses.

Already in use on the campus is the impressive new building of Temple Emanuel, which also still maintains its outgrown historic synagogue downtown on Greene Street, where it held some services until quite recently. One of the ideas afoot for keeping it alive and in use is to develop it into a Jewish museum.

My latest visit to the U.S. South impressed upon me once again the richness and variety of that are part of the American nation. Unfortunately, many of its citizens are not fully aware of the great treasure that is theirs. To be sure, many Canadian citizens may also suffer from a like deficiency, but that provides little consolation in either case.

More than two sides to every story

A slew of events in the past few weeks has left me teetering on the edge in terms of my position on war and the age-old conflict in the Middle East, and my Jewish identity has been on shaky ground.

War, hatred, the things human beings are capable of doing to one another in the name of sovereignty, religion and God have never been easy to understand in the first place. But now it seems like even more shades of grey have been thrown into the equation.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Last week, a friend of mine coaxed me to go see a series of films put on by the Palestinian-Canadian Student Society as part of an event they were holding in conjunction with a local anti-racism group from Calgary.

My friend reasoned that I might be able to meet some of the people with whom we had been trying, albeit unsuccessfully, to form a roundtable discussion group. The group would bring Jewish and Muslim students together to talk about issues that concerned them and to listen to what they had to say.

I thought one tactic to renew the interest and get the ball rolling again would be to attend one of their events.

So I resolutely made my way to a small downtown art gallery where the event was being held, not quite sure what to expect or whom I would meet.

The first movie I watched was called Jerusalem 1948: A Day for You, a Day Against You, which looked at the creation of Israel in 1948 from the point of view of Palestinians who fled Deir Yaseen and other Jerusalem-area villages.

The second film was called Children of Abraham, about a project called Compassionate Listening, where American Jews visited Palestinians and told their stories to one another.

It was this second film that touched me the most. One of the project's participants quite tellingly said, "We don't have all the answers, and just because we listen to each other doesn't necessarily mean we agree with each other – or that we have to. But if we aren't even going to listen to each other, how will we be able to get those pieces of the puzzle and try to make them fit?"

After the films were over, I wasn't quite sure what to think. I made my way over to the president of the Palestinian students' society on campus who, like me, is just a young student.

I wanted to ask him when we would be able to have our own compassionate listening project.

But the atmosphere was so thick with unspoken sentiments I couldn't quite put my finger on, and his inability to make direct eye contact with me so unsettling, that I thought it unwise to push it at the time and simply made tentative plans to meet once final exams were over.

Who knows if it's ever going to happen.

Since then, I've been looking at other things that have happened from a slightly different point of view.

In an Arab film studies class I'm taking as an option, we are regularly shown films about the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian conflict, including a Palestinian film that was banned from the Academy Awards this year because, as my professor said, it "identified itself with being Palestinian and the Oscar committee did not recognize Palestine as a country."

As I sat and tried to take it all in, as my predominantly Middle Eastern classmates began a class discussion and one student jovially asked me if I was Lebanese or Spanish. As I shook my head no, without further elaboration, I wondered to myself how many of them would attend a Jewish film studies class, and how many of them would go to a Jewish film series.

And I try very hard not to judge, to cast my emotions aside in favour of being objective and just getting at the truth.

On the other hand, I just saw the Holocaust drama The Pianist last week and that was enough to throw my attempts to remain unemotional completely out the window.

I always thought there were two sides to every story. Now I am realizing there are actually far more than just two.

A piece of life rooted in brutal death

When I was told this column would be appearing in the CJN's Yom Hashoah issue, I knew right away what I would write about.

I went to Hebrew day school for 10 years and received no shortage of lessons about the Holocaust. And, like the rest of my generation, I grew up in the era of Hollywood, where images of the Shoah have been abundant, almost to the point of having a desensitizing effect.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Thankfully, though, I was also given the opportunity to develop an authentic understanding of the atrocities that killed six million Jewish souls.

When I was 17, I participated in the March of the Living. I travelled to Poland with peers and Holocaust survivors to see with my own eyes what had always been conveyed to me on a printed page or through a camera lens.

What I didn't realize was exactly how that week in Poland would affect me.

Before leaving, I had heard stories of the difficulties people experienced when visiting the death camps – Auschwitz, Birkenau, Treblinka and especially Majdanek, where the camp and its surroundings have been left very much intact. But as I saw each of those historic places on my own trip, I felt myself strangely unaffected by them. It was almost like the sights around me did not register.

Looking back, I think I felt detached. Then, we went to a little village called Tikochyn. I stepped off of the bus and found myself in what could have been a shtetl out of a Shalom Aleichem story.

The first thing we did was enter the synagogue. The moment I stepped inside, I felt a spirit unlike anything I had ever experienced. The bimah stood in the centre of the building, and the walls were adorned with prayers painted in delicate script.

Within minutes, 200 teenagers from Toronto were singing and dancing. Arms linked, we circled the bimah in the most vibrant of horahs. For that moment, there was this unbelievable sense of profound Jewish pride: there we were, standing in the place of our ancestors, fulfilling the legacy they were prevented from fulfilling.

Afterward, we walked through the town. I felt as if I could hear the klezmer band that was going to come up the road. It was all so vivid and tangible. I got a real sense of the Jewish life that once thrived there. We saw the casings from mezuzot that once hung on the doorposts. And on one house, the warm sunlight shone through a stained glass window illuminating a royal blue Magen David in its centre.

After walking through Tikochyn, we got back on the bus, drove five minutes and stopped alongside what looked like a forest. We walked down a path through the trees and found ourselves faced with three big squares of land bordered by green metal fences. The people who rejoiced in the very synagogue we rejoiced in, the people who lived on those streets, in those homes, had been marched into that forest and ruthlessly killed, right where we were now standing.

As we faced the mass graves, I cried in Poland for the first time. For the first time, I felt the profound emotional connection that leads to a genuine understanding.

As I stood there, my eyes became fixated on an image that seemed so contrived that I observed it in disbelief. We were standing in the midst of a lush green forest. It was springtime and everything was in bloom, yet the area of the mass graves was dry and desolate, with greenery from surrounding trees casting a shadow overhead.

But by one of the green metal fences, I saw a tree growing out of a grave. It was a small tree, almost timid in appearance. It was fragile, but it stood there, a piece of life rooted in brutal death. This single tree seemed to stand as a reminder to all of us. We had just experienced the journey from a vibrant Jewish life to a debased and degrading death, but standing there, we had to acknowledge that even from the most incomprehensible tragedy, something greater emerges.

It was a little tree, but it conveyed the most powerful message. It stood, solemn, feeble, its branches reaching towards the heavens, pointing us to look beyond the depths of the graves. It made us see that while a body can be destroyed, a people and a life cannot.

The Kirshner File

Cambridge dotes on its genizah collection

Touring old Cairo in 1896, two Scottish women visited the venerable Ben Ezra synagogue, where they bought Hebrew-language fragments that had been torn out of a rare and dusty tome.

Upon returning to Britain, they showed their acquisitions to two scholars: Rabbi Solomon Schechter, a professor of talmudics and rabbinics at Cambridge University, and Charles Taylor, the master of Cambridge's St. John's College.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Rabbi Schechter and Taylor were duly impressed, having recognized the fragments as originals from the Book of Ben Sira, which eulogizes great figures in the Bible and which was thought to have disappeared. Shortly afterward, Taylor dispatched Rabbi Schechter, his colleague, to Cairo to trace the source of the women's purchases.

Rabbi Schechter, the future president of the Jewish Theological Seminary, found much more than he had bargained for in the attic – the genizah – of the Ben Ezra shul.

He stumbled upon a treasure trove of documents and texts relating to Middle Eastern Jews and Judaism from the eighth to the 15th centuries CE. The material, in Hebrew, Arabic and even Yiddish, had been deposited there by congregants, and cut across the entire spectrum of Jewish life in Egypt and the Mediterranean basin.

It was a fantastic find, comparable, perhaps, to Howard Carter's discovery of Tutankhamen's tomb in Thebes in 1922.

Once in Cairo, Rabbi Schechter spent months in the genizah, poring over its riches. European travellers and scholars who had preceded him had not been permitted to examine the contents of the genizah. Having immersed himself in it, Rabbi Schechter bought some 140,000 items, bringing them back to a warm reception in Cambridge.

The cache created an international sensation, forcing historians to reassess their view of Jewish history in the region.

As a result of Rabbi Schechter's foray, Cambridge University is today the world's largest depository of genizah fragments, documents and manuscripts.

They are housed in the Taylor-Schechter Genizah Research Unit, headed by Stefan Reif, a fellow of St. John's College and a professor of medieval Hebrew studies at Cambridge University.

Reif, in Canada recently to deliver lectures at the University of Waterloo and the University of Toronto, established the unit in 1974, when he was only 30.

By his estimation, Cambridge possesses two-thirds of the Cairo genizah's contents. The rest are scattered in about a dozen collections in Russia, Britain, Israel, Hungary, France and the United States.

Reif, who was born and partly educated in Edinburgh, Scotland, describes Cambridge's collection in superlative terms. "Nothing can touch it, except the Dead Sea Scrolls. It is a remarkable window on Jewish life."

There are, among other things, pages from Maimonides' Guide for the Perplexed, rabbinic dictionaries, biblical commentaries, philosophical treatises, polemical tracts, commercial bills of lading attesting to the movement of capital, children's letters to parents, midrash and folklore.

A fragment with the autograph of Maimonides

With his arrival at Cambridge, Reif launched a systematic program of conservation, micro-filming, research and publication that continues to this day.

"What we've tried to do over the past three decades is to ensure that the collection is properly conserved," he explained.

In recent years, thanks to the generosity of Toronto businessman Albert Friedberg, the work of digitizing the collection has begun.

To the best of Reif's knowledge, it will cost $5 million (US) to digitize all the genizah collections.

In an attempt to publicize the wonders of the genizah, Cambridge University Press has published The Cambridge Genizah Collections: Their Contents and Significance, edited by Reif with the assistance of his wife Shulie.

The latest volume, the 13th, which came out recently, sheds light on ninth-century prayers and Judah Halevi's last years in Egypt. It also discusses Jewish religious ideas under medieval Islam and offers an assessment of S.D. Goitein's contributions to Jewish historiography. Goitein, an Israeli Orientalist, drew on the genizah to write a major work on Jewish communities in the Middle East.

Stefan Reif

Cambridge's genizah unit has also published a bibliography of scholarly works on the genizah encompassing the period from 1897 to 1980. This year, it plans to release a bibliography covering the years 1980 to 1997.

At the suggestion of Schechter's grand nephew, Cambridge, in 1981, began publishing Genizah Fragments, a twice-yearly newsletter edited by Reif and sent to almost 2,000 subscribers.

Cambridge also maintains a Web site at http://www.lib.cam.ac.uk/Taylor-Schechter.

Three years ago, Reif, a graduate of the University of London, wrote A Jewish Archive from Old Cairo, a book designed to popularize Cambridge's genizah collection.

Currently, Reif and his team are working on cataloguing thousands of Judaeo-Arabic letters, written in Arabic with Hebrew characters. Long before Zionists in 19th century Palestine transformed Hebrew into a language of the vernacular, Jews in Cairo communicated in Hebrew among themselves and with Jews from far-flung places.

According to Reif, there is still much to be done.

Approximately 60,000 fragments in Cambridge's collection– and many more in the other collections – have yet to be catalogued.

"There is no reason why we couldn't finish cataloguing everything by 2010. What you need is money and staff."

Thanks to the recent formation of a consortium of universities to study the genizah in all its ramifications, this task may well be completed within that time frame.

Among the members of the consortium are Cambridge, Princeton University, Hebrew University and Tel Aviv University.

The project is directed by Jim Diamond, who holds the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo and heads up its Jewish studies program.

The objectives of the project, whose administrative centre is the University of Waterloo, are to transcribe fragments and translate texts, to digitize the entire collection, to produce a catalogue, to encourage and stimulate genizah scholarship and to develop a better understanding of the contacts between Jews and Muslims.

Reif, a Bnei Akiva alumnus whose children and grandchildren live in Israel, said that Jews and Muslims generally got on well in Egypt, provided Jews accepted their second-class status under Islam.

As far as he knows, a residue of genizah material, mostly from the 19th century, still remains in Cairo. But scholars have had no access to it. An association of Egyptian Jews in the United States has lobbied for it, but to no avail.

Egypt considers the genizah an Egyptian patrimony.

Reif, however, asks himself what might have become of the genizah had it remained in Egypt after Israel's emergence as a state in 1948.

He speculates that it might have met the fate of the Aleppo codex, which was partially destroyed in 1947 when a mob burned down the synagogue in which it was stored after the United Nations voted to partition Palestine.

The bright NEW choice in Jewish retirement living and respite care

To the family of William Katz ... condolences and thanks

At L'chaim, we were particularly blessed by the presence of the late William Katz, who graced us with his charm and dignity well into his 106th year. We are equally blessed and flattered by the recent expressions of gratitude of his daughter Ida Abrams and her family. Thank you for the privilege of working with you and your father, who was so special to all of us.

Each year, about 100 Grade 8 students participate in our annual school musical. The excitement begins in September with auditions, and continues with weekly rehearsals. We choose and modify a play to make it educationally appropriate, and hire a director, assistant director, musical director, choreographer and sound crew to ensure a top quality production. Teacher, parent and student volunteers do everything: set design, lighting, ticket sales, costumes, and ushers. The play enhances the arts and creates a real sense of community in our school. "Students assume responsibilities and are enriched by the experience, and they enrich us," says Middle School Principal Jerry Rosenfield.

Jewish Life

Kishinev, 100 years later

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

One hundred years ago this week, reports reached the West from St. Petersburg of severe anti-Jewish riots that had occurred in Kishinev, capital of the Russian district of Bessarabia.

The first news was sparse. Twenty-five Jews had been killed and 275 wounded in the attacks, newspapers reported, but eventually the death toll would nearly double to 49 and the number of wounded would surpass 500. About 700 Jewish homes were looted and destroyed, 600 Jewish businesses looted, and 2,000 Jewish families left homeless. Since the violence had been sanctioned and even partly orchestrated by the state, the town's garrison of 5,000 soldiers sat idly by.

On April 6, 1903, "a mob of teenage ruffians, undoubtedly acting upon a given signal, rushed through the city streets to attack and loot Jewish stores and homes," historian Howard Sachar records. "In the evening, looting gave way to killing. For nearly 24 hours, while the local police studiously avoided leaving their barracks, Jews were hunted down and murdered."

It was no accident that the pogrom coincided with Passover and Easter. The local newspaper, Bessarabets, had mounted a poisonous blood libel campaign that, despite its obvious falsehood, had succeeded in arousing ignominious elements of the populace to commit mayhem and murder.

The Russian peasantry felt an overpowering resentment towards Jews because "the Jew will not work in the field or engage in agriculture," Count Cassini, the Russian ambassador to America, explained to the New York Times in May 1903. "In this capacity, he takes advantage of the Russian peasant, whom he soon has in his power, and ultimately destroys."

The pogrom sparked a second wave of anti-Semitic violence in Russia, succeeding the first wave that followed the assassination of Czar Alexander II in 1881. Forbidden from taking any measures of self-defence, many of the murdered men, women and children in Kishinev had been savagely hacked to death.

Many Western democracies were outraged. U.S. President Theodore Roosevelt presented a petition to a Russian representative, who refused to accept it. Large Jewish protests occurred in New York, London and Paris. Even a few liberal Russians risked speaking out.

"The government's attitude towards these events is one more proof of the brutal egotism which does not flinch from any measures, however cruel, when it is a question of suppressing a movement deemed dangerous to themselves, and of complete indifference towards outrages not affecting their interests," Leo Tolstoy wrote.

The Kishinev pogrom was not an isolated event; rather, it was the thin edge of the wedge. Within months, similar riots erupted in Gomel, Mogilev and other cities. Dozens of similar disturbances occurred across Ukraine and Bessarabia in 1904 (Smela, Rovno, Aleksandriya), 1905 (Kishinev, Feodosiya, Melitopol, Zhitomir, Odessa, Yekaterinoslav, Kiev) and 1906 (Bialystok, Siedlce) with escalating casualties. According to the Encyclopedia Judaica, attacks occurred in 64 towns and 626 townlets and villages.

Historians connect the second wave of pogroms with the Russian government's attempt to divert the revolutionary anger of the masses onto the Jews. The outbreaks encouraged the rise of Jewish self-defence movements and stimulated migration to North America. They also lent renewed impetus to the dream of a Jewish homeland and sparked a "second aliyah" of Jews to Eretz Israel.

A third wave of pogroms occurred in Ukraine from 1917 to 1921, and these far surpassed the earlier waves in terms of violence and death tolls, which rose into the tens of thousands. But none of these pogroms could match the awesome evil magnitude of the Holocaust, which, another two decades later, would wipe out 53,000 Jews from Kishinev alone.

Israel and the fallout from the war

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

Through A Sephardi Window

Jerusalem is the eye of the world. Indeed, the midrash tells us that Jerusalem, with the land of Israel around it, is the bull's-eye of the world, and the centre point of the universe.

Anything that happens there is of keen interest to the entire planet. One need only pick up a newspaper to see the disproportionate space given to Israel. "Jews are news" is an old publisher's adage. Yet, certainly, we too keep an eye on world developments and consider how they will affect the Jews.

A story is told of a boy who ran excitedly towards his mother in order to tell her the New York Mets had won the World Series. The mother looked suspiciously at her son, then inquired, "Is that good for the Jews or bad for the Jews?" And former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger once famously commented that Israel does not possess a foreign policy, only a domestic one.

We are interested in everything that happens in the world, but primarily so for its impact on Israel.

It is fair to assume that, politically, America will emerge from the war in Iraq as a different nation. But how that difference will affect Israel is the key question. Although Israel has neither participated in the war nor, as during the 1991 Gulf War, has it been attacked, it is very much a part of the conflict. Unlike other wars that Israel did not take part in, this one is expected to affect Israel's future quite forcefully.

This change will be due to its close relationship with the United States.

What is America learning from this war? How will America attempt to regain a measure of goodwill from a world that sees it in such a negative light? Will the Americans, in an attempt to placate a hostile world, particularly a hostile and resentful Arab world, strive to obtain a settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and exert extreme pressure to impose one, no matter the cost to Israel? Or will America gain a greater understanding of the realities in the Middle East?

In the unnerving, unconventional tactics used by some Iraqis, U.S. forces have encountered various levels of resistance in their liberation of Iraq. This time, the Americans have seen first-hand things that are daily realities for the Israel Defence Forces: the use of civilian disguise, booby traps and trip wires, feigned surrenders that turn vicious and deadly, and that old mainstay, the suicide bomber.

All of these have startled the Americans. How long will they continue to tolerate casualties while their troops attempt to enforce law and order in this region? Will America move on in the area in the name of world order and its war against terrorism?

As we approach Israel's 55th birthday, one which in human terms would be considered the midlife point, the Jewish state faces yet another crisis.

Jewish Life

Forthright impressions of a Jewish leader

A Jew In America: My Life and a People's Struggle for Identity*, by Arthur Hertzberg, HarperCollins, 2002, $44.95.

Conservative rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, past president of both the American Jewish Congress and vice president of the World Jewish Congress, likes to refer to himself as an "eastern-European, Yiddish-speaking Chassidic Jew."

Books
Bernard Baskin

Others would regard Rabbi Hertzberg as an outstanding historian, university professor, public intellectual, persistent gadfly, social activist, fervent Zionist and a person of uncompromising principle. During the many years of his tumultuous public life, he has never hesitated to differ sharply from the Jewish establishment on a variety of issues.

A Jew in America is a compendious but wide ranging memoir that deals with the author's recollections, impressions, views and ideas over six decades as student, teacher, rabbi and Jewish leader. It reflects the richness of his astonishingly active life and his dealings with a galaxy of famous personalities.

Always, Rabbi Hertzberg insisted that Jews would not survive in America merely by resisting anti-Semitism or by emphasizing the enormity of the Holocaust. To assure continuity, he said, Jews must put their energies into deepening their knowledge of their own culture and tradition. He writes, "I sniffed at Jewish studies programs that had five courses on the Holocaust, three on contemporary novelists who loved [or hated] the Catskills, and one or two on the theory and practice of klezmer music. I wanted to know how such Jewish studies could be taken seriously when they were bereft of Talmud and Maimonides."

Rabbi Hertzberg, who resents the widespread slogan of Jewish groups "We are one," writes, "Few of those who shouted this slogan had children in Israel's army. They were tourists in the dangerous lives of others. Further, we are not one, because each Jew has to define for himself to what element of Israel's life he is attached."

In seeking a theological answer to the Holocaust, Rabbi Hertzberg rejects the widespread explanation that evil is the result of the misuse of the gift of free will by wicked men and women. He points out that every classic Jewish text teaches that God is the master of both good and evil in the world. As a consequence, he admits, his own belief in God is based on anger: "It is the only way for me to believe in God after the Holocaust. We've chosen different paths. You've broken diplomatic relations, but I've kept the embassy going."

Over the past 30 years, despite much opposition, Rabbi Hertzberg has favoured the Peace Now movement in Israel and the establishment of a Palestinian state. One of his major arguments for the creation of Israel is based on the idea of affirmative action. "We could not possibly make the case for the Jewish settlement in Palestine within the last century... without invoking the need of the Jews for homeland of their own after 20 centuries of being persecuted in every country in Europe and to a substantial degree in the Muslim world. The basic argument for Zionism was that the Jews required an act of 'affirmative action' to make their continued life possible."

Whether the issue was the war in Vietnam, the Civil Rights Movement or relations with the Catholic Church, the author has never wavered in following the call of conscience.

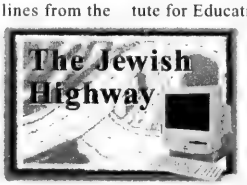
A Jew in America is written in a clear and engaging style. Anecdotal and replete with keen evaluations of a brilliant group of Jewish makers and shakers, the book is unfailingly informative and irrepressibly forthright.

Yom Hashoah: Righteous Gentiles, part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"More than once, in every generation, they have risen up against us, to destroy us. But the Holy One, blessed be He, delivers us from the destroyers' hands."

These remarkable lines from the Haggadah also have special relevance to the next holiday on the Jewish calendar, Yom Hashoah, which begins this Monday night. While history has proven the quote from the Haggadah to be all too true, there have also been individuals who have made a stand against evil. Today I will focus on the many Internet resources dedicated to Righteous Gentiles, the people who risked their own safety and the safety of their families to save Jews from certain death in the Holocaust.



One of the most famous Righteous Gentiles was Raoul Wallenberg [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/biography/wallenberg.html]. According to the official site dedicated to the efforts of the Swedish diplomat, Wallenberg is credited with saving the lives of at least 30,000 people.

Also of note is The Raoul Wallenberg Interview Project. During the 1980s and early '90s, Sweden's Uppsala University conducted nearly 200 interviews with Nazi victims in Budapest who were rescued by Wallenberg. You can read transcripts of more than 50 first-hand accounts by people who were saved by him [http://rwa.bibks.uu.se]. All interviews are in English.

Thanks to the efforts of author Thomas Keneally and filmmaker Steven Spielberg, the name Oskar Schindler, another Righteous Gentile, is known around the world. The New Orleans' Southern Institute for Education and Research has created the Schindler's List Teaching Guide. This large site examines the historical basis of the movie and supplies extensive background information [http://www.tulane.edu/~so-inst/slindex.html]. Another site devoted to Schindler is the Holocaust and Oskar Schindler Web site [http://auschwitz.dk/Schindler2.htm].

According to a very interesting article from U.S. News [www.usnews.com], the post-war years marked a sad decline for Schindler due to bad investments and a failing marriage [http://makeasherlink.com/?V2A41282]. But one of his life's highlights occurred in 1962 during the first of his 17 visits to Israel, when 200 survivors and their families greeted him at Lod Airport, shouting, "Oskar, Oskar, Oskar!"

Many other heroes lived their lives in relative obscurity. The U.S. News article mentioned above also lists "The Other Schindlers," including Polish social worker Irena Sendler, who gave nearly 2,500 children new identities and buried their real names for safekeeping. French shoemaker René Raoul sheltered more than 100 Jews who had fled Nazi roundups. For more profiles of Righteous Gentiles, see the notes to the PBS program Shtetl [http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shtetl/righteous], a brief essay called Rescuers During the Holocaust, which has an extensive bibliography [http://www.cs.cmu.edu/afs/cs.cmu.edu/user/mmbt/www/rescuers.html] and an excerpt from the book To Save a Life: Stories of Jewish Rescue [http://humboldt.edu/~rescuers/]. One of many stories cited: Barbara Makuch helped two Jews find protection in the school where she taught in Nazi-occupied Poland. She was eventually found out and sent to Ravensbruck concentration camp in Germany. But she survived her ordeal and even managed to help save the lives of fellow inmates.

The most striking salute to these heroes is the memorial forest planted in their honour outside Yad Vashem, the world-famous museum established by the Israeli government in memory of the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust. The memorial has also recorded their names at its Avenue of the Righteous Among the Nations [http://www.yadvashem.org/righteous/index_righteous.html].

As of this past January, more than 19,000 men and women have been recognized for their heroism with citizens of Poland and the Netherlands representing more than half that number. Aside from the recognition, Righteous Gentiles who choose to settle in Israel receive free health care and cash benefits equal to the rate of the average wage [http://www.btl.gov.il/English/benefit/right/right.htm].

Memories of Zaida at Passover

By MIRIAM CHINSKY and ADRIENNE BELANGER

Some of us celebrate two seders, others just one. Some start early in deference to the children; others wait until later, when the youngsters have nodded off or are struggling to stay awake.

Although the Passover story is the same everywhere, Haggadot vary and customs differ. Some families have their own songs or melodies, and the length of the seder depends on the will of the person who conducts it. Does he (or she) read every word and interpretation or move briskly to the conclusion?

My observant father-in-law used to start the seder late, following his return from shul, and continued past midnight. My husband Joe, who believed that the children should participate while they were alert, observed the traditions with the inherent seriousness of the occasion and remembered those in lands where such observances were forbidden, but he also infused the evening with joy. He did not repeat every word but included the seder's salient features, combining respect with pleasure. Surrounded by family and friends, he kvelled, brought a sense of mystery to the phantom arrival of Elijah and fun in the search for the afikoman.

Perhaps that is why our oldest granddaughter, Adrienne, now in her 20s, has such special memories of him. Here is one of her recollections from when she was a little girl.

"One of the fondest memories I have of my Zaida is of a seder many years ago when I was about eight years old," she says.

"At the end of the traditional dinner, Zaida would ask everyone around the table if they knew any songs the would like to sing. My mother and Aunt Janet would usually sing Dayenu and other Passover songs. But this year, I had learned a new song at school and was determined to perform it.

"I raised my hand away up in the air and said, 'I have a song I would like to sing, Zaida,' and with that, proceeded to stand up on my chair, hold my head high and belt out all five verses of Farewell to Nova Scotia. When I finished, it must have been obvious to my Zaida how hard I had practised and how difficult it had been to remember all the words, because he clapped for me and told me that my song had a beautiful melody. I think I smiled for a week.

"Although I've since learned that Farewell to Nova Scotia was not a very appropriate Passover song, my Zaida insisted that I sing it every year and always told me how amazing it was that I could still remember all five verses.

"My Zaida passed away a few years ago after a long illness. At his funeral, I was asked to say a few words and the Passover story was what I told.

"Zaida had changed a lot during the time he spent at the hospital. True, that man may have looked like Zaida and spoken like Zaida, but it was not my Zaida at all.

"My Zaida is the man sitting at the head of the Passover table proudly gazing over his ever-growing family, telling jokes and asking my Bubbie to please pass the roast beef. This is how my Zaida will always remain to me: happy, healthy, strong and smiling as I stand on my chair never failing to remember all the words."

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000	*If income postponed until June 1, 2004, gross equivalent yield 11%
Annual Income	10,000	22,833
Taxable Income	10,000	3,405
Tax (46%)	4,600	1,566
After Tax Income	5,400	21,267
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,222
Spendable Income	5,400	10,045
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	9.30%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO	(This is an illustration only; rates will vary)
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Some recent cases closed:
$900,000 Annuity — Gross Equivalent Yield 11.49%
$500,000 Annuity — Gross Equivalent Yield 13.46%

Mainstream, experimental films highlight festival

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

Festival season is upon us. For 10 years, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) has provided our savvy audiences with films that entertain, delight, move and provoke.

This year's 11th annual celebration of Jewish films, to be held between May 3 – 11, 2003, promises to be no different.

This festival has become one of the most important showcases of Jewish cinema in the world. With 21,000 in attendance last year, it's now considered the second largest Jewish film festival in North America, after San Francisco's.

This year, 59 films – including short films and features – have been painstakingly chosen from a record total of nearly 300 film submissions. The selected films came out on top after a rigorous screening process. At least three pairs of eyes, usually including executive director Helen Zukerman and director of programming Shlomo Schwartzberg's, view each submission, taking into account many factors including the film's subject matter and genre.

"It's especially important that the films have cinematic qualities, which can range from mainstream features to experimental movies," said Schwartzberg. The delicate art of film festival programming can be compared to creating a painting; each part of the composition must have its own unique qualities as well as fit into the larger schema of the whole work.

"The success of the TJFF is in bringing and introducing audiences to the wide variety of Jewish life."

Gems from past years cover vast territory, from the popular baseball-themed The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg to the Israeli film Hell's Angel, about Jewish sex workers.

While every installment of TJFF is as different as the films being screened, several favourite motifs return this year. These include Jews from Distant Lands, with Adio Kerida and Shalom Ireland offering portraits of Cuban and Irish Jewry respectively; and several documentaries on the Middle East, including Close, Closed, Closure, Between the Lines and Jenin Diary – The Inside Story.

Whereas last year's Holocaust films focused on the resistance movement, this year films such as Displaced! Miracle at St. Otillien, and Nicky's Children – which will close the festival – tell poignant rescue stories.

TJFF has thrived on spreading its wings and venturing into the far reaches of what it means to be Jewish. Schwartzberg notes that the importance of having a Jewish film festival in Canada is "to show everyone, not just Jews, what we are all about. It's not just Israel and the Holocaust which defines and impacts us."

To that end, Schwartzberg has highlighted several films to watch for: Amen. and Unfair Competition, by world-renowned filmmakers Costa-Gavras and Ettore Scola respectively; the "hip and outrageous" The Hebrew Hammer and Amy's Orgasm; Shanghai Ghetto; A Home on the Range: The Jewish Chicken Farmers of Petaluma; and Song of a Jewish Cowboy, which has an added attraction – the eponymous cowboy, Scott Gerber, will perform live Yiddish and labour songs at the festival.

In addition to the film screenings, the festival will also be holding several panels and events. One of these, called Truth, Lies and Videotape, will explore media bias in coverage of the Middle East and will attempt to delve into that most difficult question: what is "truth"?

Other events include a talk about the portrayal of Jews in American cinema, and a fun SpeedDating event to coincide with a film with that theme: A Match Made in Seven.

Several films will also be introduced by Torontonians and filmmaker guests. Among others, Prof. Michael Marrus will speak before the screening of Amen, and writer Vivian Kaplan will introduce Shanghai Ghetto, about which she's written a book.

Schwartzberg looks forward to the celebration of this year's "very strong and diverse line-up of films," and pauses for a moment to look ahead.

"There are so many Jewish stories and types of Jews in the world, and we hope and feel we have brought their existence to our audiences and will continue to do so in the future."

All TJFF screenings will be held at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor Street West. Tickets for each screening: $10 (available in advance or at the door) Advance tickets & info: 416-324-9121. The TJFF website is www.tjff.com. Program books will be available around the city at Famous Players and Cineplex Odeon theatres, Chapters/Indigo stores, libraries, Jewish retail outlets and stores.

Box office hours from April 1 are Mon-Thurs, 10 am – 8 pm; April 16 from 10 am to 5 pm, closed for Passover April 17-18. Fridays 10 am – 5 pm. Sundays 10 am – 5 pm. During the week of the festival, they will not accept phone orders. One should go the Bloor Cinema for tickets, which will be sold all day beginning at 9 am (Fridays at 10 am), and 8 pm Saturday night.

Filling pulpits is more challenging in Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Why does it seem to be so hard for some synagogues – particularly Conservative synagogues in Toronto – to find rabbis?

"I don't think there's a dearth of people training for the rabbinate," said Stephen Fried, author of The New Rabbi, a book chronicling Philadelphia's Temple Har Zion's search for a new spiritual leader. "I think the difference is more and more of these students don't want to be pulpit rabbis," he told The CJN. "They want to do other things, [such as] be a chaplain or run a day school. The pulpit is getting to be a harder and harder job to sell."

Also, he added, with the prevalence of dual-career couples, rabbi's spouses don't necessarily want to take on the role of "rebbitzen" in a congregation.

In Canada, there are further issues. With tuition for rabbinical school (and cantorial school) at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York now $15,340 (US) a year, it is not uncommon for recent graduates to have debts of between $50,000 and $100,000 (US), said Tom Wexelberg-Clouser, the seminary's Detroit-based Great Lakes regional director, whose geographical area of responsibility includes southwestern Ontario.

Many newly ordained rabbis "have to look for jobs that will help them get out of debt," said Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, who was ordained in 2000 by JTS. A Toronto native who returned here primarily to work on his doctorate at the University of Toronto and to be with family, Rabbi Glazer is now the third rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"Then there's the whole egalitarian issue," he added. Only one of the seven Toronto area synagogues affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – Beit Rayim in Richmond Hill– is completely egalitarian. Beth Tzedec offers Torah honours, such as aliyot, to both women and men but does not count women in the minyan.

When Beth Tzedec was recruiting, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the shul's senior rabbi, was told by rabbinical school graduates that they were so committed to egalitarianism they would not consider coming to a non-egalitarian congregation, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said at a forum on Women and Synagogue Ritual last November.

The synagogue was willing to consider a female candidate, "provided that the halachic framework of our congregation was understood and accepted," he said.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation, speaking at the same event, noted that some male candidates for a position at his traditional Conservative synagogue refused to come because their wives would not go to a non-egalitarian shul.

Rabbi Jill Borodin, who like Rabbi Glazer is a Toronto native, was ordained by JTS in 2001 and is now Rav Sheini (second rabbi) at Temple Har Zion in Philadelphia, coincidentally the same synagogue subject to Fried's scrutiny in his recent book.

Of her class of 29 men and women, only half went to pulpit positions, and the majority of that half are female, she said. Only six men went to pulpits, and of those, only one was willing to interview at a non-egalitarian congregation.

Also, she added, Toronto synagogues tend to have large congregations. "There is a trend in general of rabbis not wanting to be at big synagogues."

For traditional Conservative congregations, the choices are also more limited by Orthodoxy's move to the right in recent years. "The days when Orthodox rabbis moved into Conservative congregations are over," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

It's harder not only to attract rabbis, but also other Jewish professionals to Canada, he said. "There are many issues – people's perception of the dollar, moving to another country. Can one's spouse find employment?"

For Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, Toronto's Jewish educational system was part of the "inducement" to immigrate here, he wrote in a recent article in Conservative Judaism magazine, a JTS publication. He wrote the article, he said, to "make Canadian Jewry a little more accessible" to Americans.

Beth Tikvah's Rabbi Wayne Allen, who moderated the November discussion and who attended rabbinical school at JTS with rabbis Frydman-Kohl and Saltzman, recalled that when they were ordained 25 years ago, "coming to Canada seemed a very attractive alternative."

What befell the people Israel in Nazi Europe...defies description. Untold numbers were forced out of their homes, torn from their families, trampled in the dust, worked to death.
...Countless trains stuffed with human cargo sped to the camps, where from chimneys smoke ascended to God.
Megillat Hashoah 1:8-9,13

...Never will I be able to forget, and never will I have the power to understand.
...For these do I weep...for those who sanctified God's name and the name of the people of Israel, refusing to be subdued, fighting to the death... for infants who never learned to say "Mommy," for boys and girls whose youth was stolen from them.

New approaches required on Israel's behalf

At a time when anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism are converging throughout the world, meaningful partnerships are more important than ever for Canada's Jewish community, according to Hershell Ezrin, strategic consultant to the Israel Emergency Cabinet.

The Israel Emergency Cabinet was established last spring under the auspices of UIA Federations Canada to address, in partnership with other organizations, increasing anti-Israel sentiment and anti-Semitism.

The cabinet has already allocated $500,000 to support fact-finding trips to Israel, and $1.4 million for Jewish campus life.

Ezrin, who is Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of GPC International, told the UJA Federation Campaign 2004 Executive Cabinet that non-Jewish Canadians are unaware of Israel's realities.

The Israel Emergency Cabinet has allocated $1.4 million for Jewish campus life.

"Outside the Jewish community, the pressure there is to say, 'let's not be involved with this stuff … Let them fight it out, let them sort it out themselves,' " he noted.

Ezrin cautioned that new approaches are required by the Jewish community to advance Israel's case on the political and campus fronts. Without them, he said, the Jewish community risks being marginalized and perceived as narrow thinking.

On campuses, Ezrin said the Jewish community needs to provide a safe place where students can study in a calm environment. Equally important is the effort to rebuild positive relationships with professors, which have not been treated as a priority over the last few years.

Ezrin also believes the Jewish community needs to get more involved in the political process. "We have left that field open to a lot of other people," he said.

Honouring Canada's Jewish war veterans

As the average age of Canada's Jewish war veterans reaches 80, there is a sense of increased urgency about educating the public regarding the important role they played.

The Jewish Canadian Military Archives and Museum, a non-profit organization that recently opened on the fourth floor of UJA Federation's Lipa Green Building, is determined to make that awareness a reality.

The history of Jews in the Canadian military dispels the myth that they did not contribute to Canadian war efforts. In fact, of the 170,000 Jews living in Canada during World War II, more than 17,000 men and women volunteered for the military — the largest per-capita involvement of any Canadian ethnic group.

Since 1759, when Jews fought with General James Wolfe, members of the Jewish community have participated in every significant conflict that has involved Canada. Few people probably realize that the town of Schomberg is named after General James Wolfe's confidante, Col. Alexander Schomberg, who was a Jew.

Co-founded by Sol Raibmon, and Al Rubin, the Jewish Canadian Military Archives came together after it received seed money from UJA Federation as well as rent-free space in the Lipa Green Building.

The Archives showcases a fascinating variety of war memorabilia that has been donated over the years including uniforms, photos and medals.

"As our men and women who served get older, the time to let everyone know about their contributions is now," says Rubin, who served with the Royal Canadian Air Force.

"When adults and children come to see our displays, they are always amazed to learn that Jews were so important in the various wars," says Raibmon, also a former member of the Royal Canadian Air Force, who helped the Russians with search and rescue during WWII. "This is especially true when they learn that Jewish soldiers helped to liberate Nazi concentration camps. They always look at me in disbelief."

The Archives are currently expanding with new display cases being set up in various locations around the city including the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, Baycrest, Sunnybrook Veteran's Hospital, and the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"We currently have close to 300 veterans registered with us and eventually, we hope to be in the thousands," says Barbara Goldman-Safarti, project coordinator and exhibit director. "Within a year or so, we hope to have a website up and running with thousands of veterans on it. Imagine a grandchild being able to find his grandfather on the site, and learn all about his life when he was a young man serving his country. The possibilities are endless," she adds.

For more information about the Jewish Canadian Military Archives, please call Barbara Goldman-Sarfati at 416.781.6344.

Israel Trauma Coalition provides financial help to victims of terror

A new pilot project is underway within the Israeli school system to assist young victims of terror. These youngsters, while not having been physically injured themselves by a terror attack, may have lost friends or loved ones to terrorism, or may have narrowly escaped injury or death themselves.

The Israel Trauma Coalition (ITC), a new initiative made possible by funds raised through UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, will ensure that experienced trauma professionals are able to work with students affected by ongoing terror attacks.

While terror incidents affect the way Israeli adults understand and respond, Israel's children are even more emotionally vulnerable. After exposure to trauma, they have shown diminished cognitive and behavioral functioning, an increase in anger, and a steady loss of trust.

Unfortunately, few of these young victims of trauma are referred to mental health clinics for help. Sometimes symptoms go unrecognized or are considered normal consequences of ongoing stress.

"We have evidence that many of these kids – victims of terror or trauma – are still negatively affected psychologically," says ITC Chair, Warren Kimel. "It's essential that they get the help they need, and through the Israel Trauma Coalition, we're going to undertake this project in 10 Jerusalem schools."

So far UJA Federation has contributed $400,000 U.S. towards the coalition.

Ceremony provides grants to orphaned victims of terror

Although Reut Jacobson spoke lovingly of her mother at a recent Jerusalem ceremony, she only has memories to give her strength. Her mother, Rina Didovsky, was murdered in a terror attack, and Reut was among 41 young people who received payments from the Jewish Agency Orphan Fund, supported by UJA Federation Campaign 2003 contributions.

Through the fund, another 370 younger children who lost one or both of their parents, are being granted $5,000 U.S., which has been placed in trust until they turn 21.

"Two years ago," said Jacobson, "my mother was murdered. She was a teacher. Terrorists shot her while she was on her way to school. She never made it. She never made it to her classroom and she never returned home."

She thanked the Jewish Agency for all its help and for making victims of terror feel that they are not alone. In particular, she said the fund made it possible to receive assistance quickly, without going through a long bureaucratic process.

Tragedy also struck IDF sailor Sergei Melichov who accepted a cheque from the fund. Melichov's life was shattered when his father, Boris, celebrating a relative's bar mitzvah in Hadera, was killed by a terrorist who had burst into the reception hall and opened fire on the guests with an M-16 rifle. Six others were also killed.

"I think that the JAFI Fund is the one that doesn't just offer empty words; it offers help and it comes through with that help," said Melichov. "It's good to know that someone is there for you, with you."

"Our private victory over terror is to continue our life and to be worthy of the memory of those we have lost. Our public victory is not to give up hope and to move forward," said Jewish Agency Chairman Sallai Meridor.

"Obviously, no sum of money can replace a parent, but if a grant from the fund helps heal the loss in even a small way, it has fulfilled a vital, blessed task," says Howard Weisband, Director-General of the Israel office of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada. "Torontonians should be proud."

Imagine a dynamic young leadership conference

The recent Imagine International Young Leadership Conference in Montreal — touted as a weekend that would change the lives of young Canadian Jews — lived up to its billing.

The conference began with a daylong "by invitation only" Jewish Leadership Institute for 100 young adults who have been identified as emerging leaders by Federations, community agencies and synagogues.

The program offered opportunities for learning, networking and socializing with peers. Participants also heard from world-class speakers such as Rabbi Michael Melchior, Dr. Ellen Cannon, Dennis Prager, Irwin Cotler, John Loftus, Rabbi Shmuel Boteach and Elie Wiesel.

Elie Wiesel

Over 500 young leaders attended the conference, including more than 100 recruited from Toronto by Jessica Cooperman and Brian Tanner.

The conference provided a holistic Jewish experience, with a full Shabbat program focused on spirituality and capped off by a gala Mystery Ball.

Richard Diamond, the Past Chair of Young Leadership who was instrumental in developing the national young leadership structure, was honoured at the conference. Other leaders from Toronto honoured by the National Young Leadership Executive were Jessica Cooperman, Gilbert Palter, Anthony Sigel, David Spiro, and Naomi Cohen who were recognized by their peers for outstanding contributions both locally and nationally.

Toronto will host the conference in 2005.

Witness didn't see fatal blow that killed Baranovski

A friend of the three men accused of killing Matti Baranovski testified last week that one of the suspects, Meir Mariani, was standing near Baranovski but did not kick him.

Alan Kogan, 19, said he was in G. Ross Lord Park on the evening of Nov. 14, 1999 when a dozen or so people approached Baranovski and other teens hanging out a picnic table. He told court that he didn't know who pushed Baranovski to the ground, but he was sure Mariani did not kick him.

Asked by defence lawyer Steve Fishbayn whether he was sure Mariani did not kick Baranovski, Kogan said "that's right."

Mariani was near Baranovski, but he was the only one in the group whose face wasn't covered, and he wasn't kicking, Kogan said.

Mariani, Daniel Weiz and Lee Cochrane are facing second degree murder charges in connection with the beating death of the 15-year-old Baranovski. All three have pleaded not guilty.

The Crown alleges the accused were part of a larger group that went to the park that night to settle scores with another gang. The Crown claims the three picked on Baranovski when he refused to hand over money and cigarettes as they had demanded.

Defence lawyer Marie Heinen, representing Weiz, challenged Kogan's credibility, saying he was part of an effort to pin the crime on her client. Kogan admitted he didn't tell the whole truth in earlier testimony related to the group of boys they had expected to find in the park, but he denied he was part of a plan to falsely blame Weiz.

Under further cross-examination, Kogan admitted he gave police the name of one of Baranovski's best friends, whose name also was Dan, and said he was involved in the beating.

"You messed up. You blamed the wrong Dan," Heinen said.

"You knew there was a plan to falsely blame Dan Weiz," she stated.

"No," Kogan replied, though he added he had "confused the two people."

Earlier, Kogan told the court the three accused were part of a group that had surrounded Baranovski prior to his death. But he said he could not identify the ones who kicked the North York teen.

Reena receives $142,891 grant

THORNHILL — Elinor Caplan, Liberal MP for Thornhill, on behalf of Jane Stewart, minister of Human Resources Development Canada, last week announced $142,891 in federal funding to Reena to deliver a Youth Internship Canada Project.

The project will help address a "chronic and serious shortage" of qualified workers who have training and experience working with people with developmental disabilities, by attracting youth to this field of work, says a statement from Caplan's office.

The grant will provide comprehensive training and work experience for up to 10 unemployed youth for a period of 34 weeks.

"It is exciting initiatives like this that truly benefit our community – both our unemployed youth and people living with developmental disabilities," Caplan said.

The project will not only provide meaningful work for youth who have had difficulties finding employment, but also provide the developmental disabilities sector with a potential new source of workers in the field, Caplan added.

TOYS FOR LIFE: Miryam Spiegel (left) delivers gift packages to Annette Lichtman, a social worker with Zareinu Educational Centre, for delivery to families in the community. TLC – Toys for Life Club – is a project by children for children, whereby children donate a toy, craft or game anonymously to children in need in our community. The project was started by Miryam Spiegel (Ulpanot Orot) and is run by her and Maya Stern (USDS). The girls collect toys and package them for delivery on behalf of the "members" who receive a membership card signifying that they have done a mitzvah – good deed – with no expectation of being otherwise thanked or knowing the recipient of the item. It is enough that they know that they have done an important deed and helped to improve the life of another child and family. To date, more than 50 packets consisting of 5-20 items have been delivered quietly throughout the community to families in various situations.

Lack of basic medicines around world concerns Cohen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Academia

Of all the problems afflicting humanity, from the war in Iraq to the malaise of underdevelopment in impoverished countries, there is one that rarely commands the global visibility and attention it so richly deserves.

And that is an abiding source of concern to Jillian Clare Cohen, a professor at the University of Toronto's Leslie Dan faculty of pharmacy and a World Bank consultant.

The problem she is trying to alleviate turns on a disturbing phenomenon. According to the World Health Organization, one-third of the world's population lacks access to basic medicines.

"In parts of Africa and Asia, these numbers are even higher," said Cohen, who joined the faculty last year as its first resident political scientist.

"This is a hugely serious issue because the current burden of disease falls predominantly on the poor, who are living on less than two dollars a day," she explained. "This, in turn, has an impact on the well-being of these individuals and, ultimately, on economic development."

Cohen, 36 and single, believes she brings a different perspective on the role of governments and politics in pharmaceutical policy.

As she put it: "Governments, ideally, seek to create conditions that improve the health and prosperity of their populations. Pharmaceuticals are vital technologies that can contribute to these broader objectives."

In her mind, the link between governments and drugs is clear.

Governments regulate the market, provide pharmaceuticals and pharmaceutical services and create incentives for investments in that sector.

"In short, governments are intricately involved in the pharmaceutical system," said Cohen, a first-generation Canadian whose parents, Kenneth and Hilary, immigrated to Canada from South Africa in the early 1960s.

A graduate of McGill University and New York University, she has long been interested in social policy and international issues.

"I was fortunate as a child to travel widely with my family to South Africa, Brazil, Panama and other countries. This gave me a sense that the world was bigger and more complex than my own neighbourhood in Toronto."

Cohen's interest in pharmaceuticals jelled when she worked as an intern for the United Nations' Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in Paris.

Through a series of events, she was given the opportunity to study essential drug policy at the United Nations Children's Education Fund headquarters in New York City.

"From there, I never looked back."

While finishing her PhD in New York, Cohen joined the World Bank's health, nutrition and population team, based in Washington, D.C.

Jillian Clare Cohen

This took her to Romania, where she investigated the pharmaceutical component of a World Bank-funded health project, and presented her findings to the minister of health.

Since then, Cohen has travelled on business to Bulgaria, Hungary, Croatia, Brazil, Haiti, Ecuador, Costa Rica, India and Indonesia.

The issues she has examined run the gamut from drug pricing and quality control to the development of local manufacturing capacities.

"I think my most satisfying project, which oddly enough was one I did not spend a lot of time on, was in Rajasthan, India," she said.

"I went to India with a team of health specialists to monitor the impact of a World Bank loan. I found that the money allocated for a state-administered quality assurance program had not been spent as intended. It was really disheartening to see that."

In her view, a multitude of factors account for the fact that good quality medicines are still beyond the reach of so many people.

"Poor physical access to health facilities; prices of medicines that exceed the purchasing power of the poor; corruption in both the private and public sectors, and government failure."

The issue, she believes, has been thrust to the forefront by the HIV/AIDS crisis.

"It demonstrates in stark terms why access to pharmaceuticals is critical, not only for improving quality of life but permitting life itself. There are no grey areas here because so many lives are at stake."

To her regret, governments have been slow to respond. But non-governmental organizations – Doctors Without Borders and Health Action International, to name but two – have exerted pressure on governments and pharmaceutical companies to make changes.

Their campaign, she said, is finally bearing fruit.

"I have seen enough to know that there is a lot of work to be done to make access to drugs a universal norm instead of an exception for the majority of the world's population."

Jewish student elected to SFU student board

By ARIEL ZELLMAN
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Jewish student and Israel activist Brent Zacks was elected as the arts representative to the student board in the recent elections at Simon Fraser University (SFU), after facing a number of difficulties.

A fourth-year student in history and political science, Zacks said in an interview that he and other Jewish students at SFU have experience an increase in anti-Israel sentiment and anti-Semitism among the student body and the faculty. The campus, he said, has become a target of the Vancouver branch of the International Solidarity Movement, known here as the Palestine Solidarity Group.

"In four years at SFU, it's been pretty rocky," he said, but it has only been this year that he and others have begun to fight the propaganda, after seeing a significant rise in anti-Israel, anti-American and anti-democratic rhetoric in the student newspaper, the Peak, and the student government, the Simon Fraser Student Society (SFSS).

After several articles hostile to Israel appeared in the Peak, Zacks began talking with other members of SFU's small Hillel. They agreed that they had to do something to educate people about "the other side of the story" and formed an Israel advocacy committee (IAC).

A similar committee was being formed at the University of British Columbia, and the two groups shared strategies for responding to the anti-Israel sentiment on both campuses.

At its first meeting in December, the SFU-IAC put together a constitution and an executive board. Within a month, the group had 45 members, confirming the organizers' belief that others at SFU shared their concerns.

The anti-Israel attitude on campus grew, however, after a conference was held by the political science and history student associations on Feb. 8, titled Dispelling Misconceptions: Media, Conflict & Imperialism in the Middle East. Eight speakers presented an anti-Israel perspective, despite organizers' claim they were presenting a balanced view of the conflict. The IAC was contacted one week before the event to suggest a pro-Israel speaker.

"This had been in the works since December," Zacks said. "We would have had one speaker in a panel of nine and we would be beaten up." They turned down the request.

On the Monday after the conference, the SFSS released a resolution that read: "The Simon Fraser Student Society calls for the immediate end to the illegal U.S.-backed Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the right of return for all Palestinians to their homes, and an end to Israeli apartheid."

When Zacks and other members of the IAC attended the next SFSS meeting to ask for a discussion of the resolution and to have it amended, they faced a barrage of anti-Israel rhetoric, Zacks said.

Over screams calling him a racist, Zacks tried to present his point of view. Several board members resigned, protesting Zacks' right to speak during an open session of the SFSS. The Peak later also denounced him as a racist.

Still attempting to have the resolution changed, Zacks attended a policy review committee called to examine and amend it. Several committee members, "none of them from the Middle East," wore Palestinian keffiyahs, he said.

But instead of examining the resolution, the group claimed that Israel is an apartheid state, that Arabs are not allowed to go to Israeli hospitals nor vote in Israeli elections, and once again called Zacks a racist for suggesting otherwise.

The IAC then held an Israel Awareness week at SFU, attempting to educate students about the Arab-Israeli conflict. They obtained more than 150 signatures on a petition demanding that the SFSS resolution be changed or dropped entirely. The board passed the resolution yet again without changes.

"They just laughed at us. This wasn't democracy," Zacks said.

A group of students who opposed the resolution approached Zacks and asked him to join their slate for the SFSS elections to be held at the end of the year.

The slate became a target, Zacks said. One Peak article claimed that the slate was funded by Hillel, that this was the only slate not against tuition increases and the only one with Jewish members. In truth, they did not support tuition increases and Zacks was the only Jewish candidate on a slate of 11.

Running on a platform that promised to bring the students' voices back into the SFSS, Zacks won by 15 votes. All but one of the previous members were voted out of office. The one left was an officer who had either abstained or voted against anti-Israel resolutions.

Zacks hopes that with an almost entirely new student board, the SSFS will be able to change or rescind the anti-Israel resolution over the summer and get the board back to representing the students of SFU.

On Sunday, May 25, Israel Wants to Hear From You. Just join us with your friends and family, when we Walk with Israel. It's the world's largest solidarity walk on Israel's behalf, which attracted 25,000 last year.

It's time to tell the world about our community's extraordinary support for Israel at a time of ongoing turmoil.

Registration for the Walk with Israel begins at 9:30 a.m. at Coronation Park (across from the CNE's Prince's Gates at the corner of Lakeshore and Strachan). The Walk, starting at 10:30 a.m., will wind its way through the streets of downtown Jewish Toronto before finishing with the exciting RioCan Festival at The National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place.

As Israel's crisis continues, your support means the world for our Jewish State. Just look at what Israel has been facing since September 2000.

- More than 700 Israelis have been killed and over 5,000 wounded in terror attacks. Many of these injuries are permanent and the victims require care - both physical and psychological - for life.
- Government budget cuts and security expenses have left an insufficient amount of money available for many of Israel's vital social services.
- Last year was the worst ever for Israel's economy, with unemployment at over 10%, and the tourism industry in critical condition.
- Anti-Israel hatred is spreading around the world.

"Israel continues to make sacrifices each and every day to protect our freedoms as Jews, and Torontonians have the opportunity to say 'thank-you' by simply participating in this one-day solidarity event," says Peter Ekstein, Campaign Volunteer Development Chair, Walk with Israel.

Sponsorship proceeds from this year's Walk with Israel will assist Israel's victims of terror and other vulnerable Israelis. You can become a sponsored walker by collecting contributions online at www.jewishtoronto.net and clicking the Walk with Israel button.

For more information, a sponsorship kit, or details about joining our Walk with Israel volunteer team, please call the our Hotline 416.631.5700 or visit our website.

Who will live; who will die? Ghetto survivors remember

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Poland before World War II was not always a hospitable place for its Jewish citizens, but for a number of Holocaust survivors who were children when the Nazis invaded, memories of that prewar period are dominated by recollections of close family ties and a comfortable, if not extravagant, existence.

Children attended Jewish schools, they participated in clubs, many came from families that ran their own businesses, they had enough to eat and they looked forward to the Shabbat dinner that often included luxury items like chicken and cholent.

That life was torn asunder on Sept. 1, 1939, when German forces invaded Poland. Jews residing in Warsaw felt it right from the start. Some of the heaviest bombing during the military campaign was targeted directly at the city's Jewish neighbourhoods.

On Oct. 12, 1940, a decree was issued giving Jews about a month to congregate in a walled-off neighbourhood in central Warsaw that was to become known as the Warsaw Ghetto.

On April 19, 1943, a small group of resistance fighters, many associated with the Zionist and socialist youth clubs, launched the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

Today, there are few survivors of the uprising still alive, though several Warsaw residents now live in and around Toronto. Some lived for a time in the ghetto and managed to escape through weak points in the surrounding wall. Others, seeing the writing on the wall, fled Warsaw fairly early in the war, made their way to Soviet-occupied Poland, and from there to safety in Siberia and Uzbekistan.

David Arzem stands in front of a photo of himself (left) and his brother Yoseph.

David Arzem (Jarzembski), 75, recalls the day the Nazis changed his life forever. It was during Rosh Hashanah, 1939, and like most of the other Jewish residents of the village of Pustelnik, a community about eight kilometres north of Warsaw, he was celebrating Rosh Hashanah.

"We were in the synagogue when the rabbi announced the Germans were 50 to 60 kilometres from the village," he recalled. "A lot of people wanted to run out of the shul, but one guy, a horse-dealer, picked up a chair and stood by the door and said, 'No one runs out of the shul until we finish davening.'"

With the arrival of the Nazis, conditions started to deteriorate, although not too badly at first. Persecution was nothing new for the community's Jews. Arzem recalls teachers at his public school letting Jewish students out early so they wouldn't be beaten after school by anti-Semitic classmates.

Prior to the war, Arzem's family were fairly well to do. His father, Moishe, worked in the shoe business in one of the four buildings his grandfather owned in town.

Most of the Jewish community was involved in small business, as shoemakers, tailors, "little geshefts" (businesses), he said. A few were kovals (blacksmiths).

Throughout 1940, life became increasingly difficult, and at the end of the year, the eight-member Jarzembski family moved in with two of his aunts on Novolipia Street in the Jewish quarter of Warsaw.

They were crammed into a single, tiny apartment. For food, they received a ration card that entitled the bearer to not much more than a slice of bread per person per day.

It was a cruel existence, Arzem recalled. The bread itself was of poor quality and was hardly enough to subsist on.

His parents often went without. On one occasion, Arzem recalls, "my mother [Esther] came home from the bakery with the bread. She cut the bread and gave everyone a portion. When it came to her, I asked, 'Where's yours?' She said, 'I already ate.'" Arzem said he knew that wasn't true.

In 1941, his father succumbed to starvation; his older brother, Shlomo, weakened by lack of food, died a little later during an outbreak of typhus. Like thousands of other victims of starvation and disease, Shlomo's body was wrapped in cloth and left in front of the building where in the evening, a work crew placed it in a two-wheeled wagon and carted it away for burial.

Arzem was an active 13-year-old. He remembers hanging out in the local shtiebl, a small synagogue, and listening to the grown-ups discuss the deteriorating situation. It was there he learned of a street, Krochmalna Gas, that was half in the ghetto, half on the Aryan side, divided by a barbed wire fence.

With help, he was able to scramble under the fence into

'Don't go into the ghetto, they're shooting and deporting' the gentile side. Using this surreptitious entry point, he supplemented the family's starvation ration by trading buttons, needles, hair clippers, thread and other small items for food – flour, beans, chickpeas.

Eventually, he expanded his range, taking public transportation 100 kilometres out of Warsaw, where he could obtain better quality merchandise.

How did he manage to evade capture?

"You become so smart, you become so protective. You smarten up. It's hard to understand where you take the courage."

Eventually, he brought his younger brother Yoseph along. They told curious farmers who asked where their parents were that their parents had been killed and the boys were being raised by their grandparents.

Asked why others didn't take this escape route, Arzem says it's impossible to understand the situation – and the psychology – facing Jews in the ghetto. "No matter how many videos you see, you can't describe the cruelty that occurred to our people. They were beaten mentally. They were treated without mercy.

"The cruelty that was done, you couldn't believe," he said. If you walked the streets of the ghetto, you could see lice crawling all over people's clothes, and the people completely ignoring it.

One day on his return to Warsaw, he stopped at the home of his father's gentile friend. "He said, 'Don't go in [to the ghetto], they're shooting and deporting.' So I didn't think it was safe to go in."

After a couple of weeks, he entered the ghetto, but his mother and little brother Gershon, who was only three years old, were gone. The memory of his small brother still brings tears to his eyes.

Arzem left Warsaw for good in the winter of 1942, a few months after the great deportation of July 22 to Sept. 12. He and his brother lived in the Polish countryside, serving as farmhands. Once, he and Yoseph were separated and, being too young to plan for every contingency, they didn't make any arrangement to meet later. They were not reunited until 1947. It was to prove a short reunion. Yoseph eventually found his way to Israel, and at 16, he lied about his age to join the army. He was killed in action in the Galilee in 1949.

Leon Krym grew up in Czerniakow, a suburb of Warsaw that had a substantial Jewish community. His father, Mordechai Meir, worked as a property manager and on weekends, davened as a cantor in the local synagogue. His mother, Sarah, ran a small textile store.

Occasionally the family would visit the Great Synagogue on Tlomacka Street and his father would chant with the famed Moshe Kosivitzky.

An observant lifestyle was fairly typical in his community, Krym recalled. Homes were kosher and people generally attended shul on Shabbat. Like his friends, he attended a Jewish school. Zionist organizations were popular and Czerniakow was also home to a substantial chassidic community.

Born in 1923, Krym looks back on his teenage years with some fondness. "I was a happy kid. We had Jewish friends, and we had non-Jewish friends."

Krym also recalls it was "normal in those days to get beaten up by a [gentile]."

When the war started, Krym was already in the labour force, taking streetcar number 2 to get to work in a factory in Warsaw that manufactured hardware, like screws.

It was while at work that he heard people talk about the start of the war.

With the German occupation, everything "was in disarray." His father, afraid the Germans would consider him a dangerous intellectual, dismantled the family's typewriter piece by piece and had Leon toss the parts in a farmer's field.

Business dried up and the family was forced to live on its savings. When they were deported to the ghetto, things got "very tough."

With the funds from the sale of their property, the family rented a tiny apartment in the ghetto, and the Krym family, all six, ended up living in one room.

Like Arzem, Krym found a way out of the ghetto. He used to "jump the wall and try to find food. It was very dangerous, but I bought bread and brought it back to the ghetto."

If you were found, he said, the result would be "Gestapo and shot. Shot."

In late 1941, his older brother Avraham took him to the wall and told him he must escape for good. "I wanted to go, but I didn't know why my brother didn't go. Perhaps he had already joined the fighters."

Outside Warsaw, in the town of Polavi, he

'Why have you come back? Here it's hell' got a job working for a farmer, cutting straw and taking care of cattle. He received food and a straw mattress in the barn for his efforts.

When the Germans cracked down on the countryside, the farmer, who knew he was Jewish, told him to leave immediately. He decided to return to the ghetto. "Everyone was shocked when they saw me knock on the door. They said, 'Why have you come back? Here it's hell.'"

Their reaction drove him to tears, but his mother comforted him and fed him with the meagre rations she had.

One day in the summer of 1942, the Nazis targeted their neighbourhood for a roundup. "The SS came in trucks, circled the building and took people to the Umschlagplatz [square], and from there they put them on trains."

When they first came in, "we heard screaming of Jewish policemen that everybody has to come down.

"We already knew that we were on the line now. My mother was crying." Avraham, fortunately, happened to be away from the apartment.

As the trucks were being loaded, his father told him to show him a work pass that entitled him to work in a razor factory. "He said, 'Maybe you will be saved.' I didn't want to. He literally pushed me out of the line. I came in front of the officer, which was very dangerous, and I showed him my work card. He measured me from head to bottom and with a thumb, he pointed to me to go back [to the apartment]. That was the last time I saw my parents, my brother and sister."

Krym believes they were taken to Treblinka and killed.

"I went to the room and was crying like a baby. I saw a picture of my parents on the wall and I was crying."

Avraham and his girlfriend, Anka Shafran, came to console him that night.

The next morning, Krym was back at work. Late in 1942 or early in 1943, he was assigned to a job in a locomotive repair unit outside Warsaw. He was outside the city when the uprising broke out. He knew Avraham, a Betar Zionist, and his girlfriend were both resistance fighters, but Krym doesn't know precisely what happened to them, only that he never saw them again.

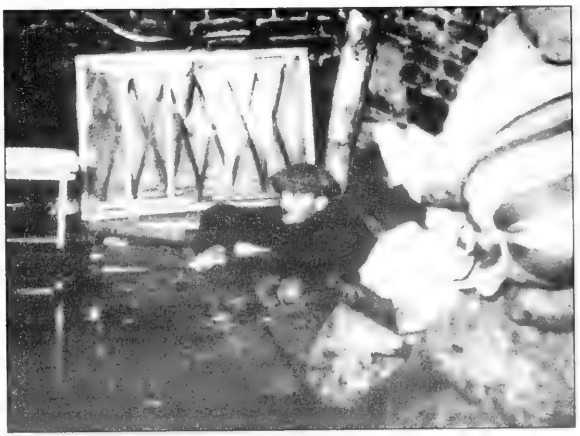
A year and a half later, in August 1944 when the nationalist Warsaw Uprising took place, Krym was working in a forced labour camp. Polish forces took over the camp and freed him. He quickly joined the Polish underground.

He still sports scars on his hands from a bomb explosion that killed many fellow fighters.

Krym survived underground until the Soviets liberated Warsaw. At night, while foraging for food, he and a friend ran into other Jewish survivors who had also managed to evade the Nazis. They ate what they could find in abandoned homes and drank from water pipes they cut into with narrow slits.

After the war, Krym joined an uncle in Paris and worked for him as a furrier. In 1949, he moved to Israel and served for four years in the Israeli army. In 1953 he moved to Canada.

(Stories about life in wartime Warsaw next week.)



A Jew emerges from a hiding place beneath his underground bunker after its capture by German troops during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

מה יהיה

סיומה המהיר והמפתיע של מלחמת עיראק מביא לים של ניחושים והשערות:

האם החזית הפלשתינאית היא האתגר הבא של בוש, או שמא מדינות הטרור סוריה ואיראן? האם נחישותו להוציא את שלום ישראל-פלשתין טובה או רעה ליהודים? על פניו אפשר לטעון שנחישותו של בוש נגד סאדם חוסיין צריכה להתפרש כאזהרה לטרוריסטים למיניהם. אבל השערה כזו מבוססת על ההנחה שטרוריסטים פועלים לפי ההיגיון המערבי. וזו כמובן עלולה להיות טעות מרה. ביתמים יש ראש ממשלה פלשתינאי, שמדינות המערב וגם ישראל מקוות שיתמודד כראוי עם נושא הטרור. אם יצליח-יהיה שלום. אם לא יצליח- המלחמה תמשיך. פשוט למדי. לפחות על פניו, נראה שהאיש חפץ בשלום. האם יש לו כוח להתמודד נגד טרוריסטים פלשתינאים- ימים יגידו, לילות ישורון.

"Nowhere in Africa"

אמרות שוות זהב

Saturday, May 3

8:00 pm - Opening Night Festivities
9:15 pm - AMEN.
FRANCE , 2002, 130 min.
Director: Costa-Gavras

What did Pope Pius XII and the Vatican know about the Holocaust? Why did they not do more to help save the Jews? These questions are at the core of Costa-Gavras' gripping fact-based drama about an SS officer and a Jesuit priest's heroic attempts to inform the world about the genocide.
U. of T. Professor Michael Marrus will be in attendance.

Sunday, May 4

11:00 am - TRUTH, LIES, AND VIDEOTAPE (Panel)

Is it possible for a filmmaker to capture "The Truth" in a time of war? A TJFF panel of respected filmmakers and journalists discuss key issues during turbulent times.

1:00 pm - CLOSE, CLOSED, CLOSURE
ISRAEL / FRANCE, 2002, 58 min.
English, Hebrew, Arabic with English subtitles
Director: Ram Loevy

One of the casualties of the current intifada has been the well-being of the over 1,000,000 Palestinians who live in the Gaza Strip. A forceful point-of-view film by a respected Israeli.
Director Ram Loevy will be in attendance.

3:00 pm – SHALOM IRELAND
IRELAND, 2003, 56 min.
Director: Valerie Lapin Ganley

Since the 1860s, Jews have flourished in Ireland. This engaging film introduces us to a community we know little about.
Director Valerie Lapin Ganley will be in attendance.
With the short film THE BOMBAY JEWS (30 min)

5:15 pm - DISPLACED! MIRACLE AT ST. OTILLIEN
USA, 2003, 46 min.
Director: John Michalczyk

A true-life thriller. They survived the war, but many displaced European Jewish refugees were quickly forgotten. Two 19-year-old American Jewish army privates remarkably focused world attention on one group, housed in an ancient Benedictine monastery in Germany.
Saul Shulman, who was at St. Otillien for three years, will be in attendance.
With the short film A BRIDGE OF BOOKS (13 min)

7:15 pm - UNFAIR COMPETITION (CONCORRENZA SLEALE)
ITALY, 2001, 120 min.
Italian with English subtitles
Director: Ettore Scola

From master Italian filmmaker Ettore Scola comes a powerful tale of racism, responsibility and the slow awakening of a buried conscience. A feud between two tailors has its comic elements and seems harmless, until an anti-Semitic comment is made.

9:45 pm - BENNY BENNY
ISRAEL, 2002, 51 min.
Hebrew, Romanian with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Eitan Anner

Jewish Blue-ish! Traffic cop Benny has a problem. He hates straight arrows, those honest citizens who obey the rules. A routine traffic stop reacquaints him with a straitlaced Romanian dentist and childhood crush, whom he decides to seduce. Raunchy, witty and sharp. Warning: sexual situations and explicit language
With the short film MINUS PLUS (22 min)

Monday, May 5

11:00 am - ADIO KERIDA
USA, 2002, 58 min.
English, Spanish with English subtitles
Director: Ruth Behar

Her family left when she was small but anthropologist Ruth Behar never lost her love for her Cuban birthplace. Incorporating actress Elisabeth Pena's poignant narration, Behar's sheer joy at being in her beloved homeland, and infectious music, this is a Jewish Buena Vista Social Club.
With the short film JEWS IN ARMENIA (25 min)

1:00 pm - ALL I'VE GOT
ISRAEL, 2002, 62 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Keren Margalit

When 72-year-old Tamara passes on, she finds herself on a ship, heading across river to the afterlife. There she meets her first love, who died at age 22, and is offered a momentous choice.
With the short film FOOLISH ME (33 min)

3:00 pm - A TRUMPET IN THE WADI
ISRAEL, 2001, 97 min.
Hebrew, Arabic, Russian with English subtitles
Directors: Lina Chaplin, Slava Chaplin

An Israeli Romeo and Juliet love story set against the backdrop of Middle Eastern tensions. A newly arrived Russian-Jewish immigrant musician becomes involved with the daughter of a Christian-Arab family in the Wadi neighbourhood of Haifa.

5:00 pm - Y.I.D. - YEHUDEEM IN THE DIASPORA
CANADA, 2002, 69 min.
English, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Igal Hecht

Are the Israeli Jews who live in Toronto an accepted part of the larger Jewish community in the city? A disquieting look at two new solitudes.
Director Igal Hecht will be in attendance
With the short film FALAFEL (10 min)

7:15 pm- GOD IS GREAT...I AM VERY SMALL (DIEU EST GRAND, JE SUIS TOUTE PETITE)
FRANCE, 2001, 98 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Pascale Bailly

When adorably flighty Michèle (Audrey Tatou, Amélie) falls in love with an avowedly secular Jew, and decides to convert to Judaism, the stage is set for a sharp comedy about the vagaries of love.
With the short film KHASENJAH: THE JAMAICAN JEWISH WEDDING (6 min)

9:30 pm - GEBIRTIG
AUSTRIA / POLAND / GERMANY / USA, 2002, 115 min.
English, German, Yiddish with English subtitles
Directors: Lukas Stepanik, Robert Schindel

The destinies and memories of a diverse group of people collide when the existence of a noted Nazi, known as the Skull Cracker of the Ebensee concentration camp, is unearthed in Austria.

Tuesday, May 6

11:00 am - RECONSTRUCTION
USA, 2001, 90 min.
English, Romanian, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Irene Luxtig

On September 18, 1959, six Jews were arrested for the "crime" of robbing an armoured car of one million (Rumanian) lei, en route to the Romanian National Bank. Forty years later, the events are still shrouded in mystery.

1:00 pm - ATLANTIC DRIFT
AUSTRIA / FRANCE, 2002, 35mm, 88 min.
English, German and Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Michel Daëron

When 2000 Jewish refugees fleeing Hitler boarded the ship, the Atlantic, they hoped to make it to Palestine - and safety. But they didn't reckon with the British, who stopped them from entering the country.

3:00 pm - EPSTEIN'S NACHT (EPSTEIN'S NIGHT)
GERMANY, 2002, 82 min.
German, Yiddish with English subtitles
Director: Urs Egger

Released from prison, after serving fifteen years for murder, Jochen Epstein is suddenly confronted by a woman from out of his past. A mysterious, suspenseful story starring Bruno Ganz.
Director Urs Egger has been invited to attend.

5:00 pm - UNDYING LOVE: TRUE STORIES OF COURAGE AND FAITH
CANADA, 2002, 88 min.
English, German and Yiddish with English subtitles
Director: Helene Klodawsky

One of the most ironic aspects of the Holocaust is that it often threw together men and women whose relationships would never have developed if not for the war. A tribute to the redemptive power of love.
Director Helene Klodawsky and many of the film's subjects will be in attendance

7:30 pm - SAMY Y YO (SAMY AND I)
ARGENTINA, 2002, 85 min.
Spanish with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Eduardo Milewicz

Meet Samy Goldstein, a Jewish sad sack TV writer, who's about to turn 40, with a girlfriend who treats him like dirt and a life which is going nowhere. A charming confection.

9:30 pm - THANATOS & EROS - THE BIRTH OF THE HOLY FREAK
USA / GERMANY, 2002, 59 min.
English, German with English subtitles
Director: Karl Nussbaum

What is the real meaning of love? What is the real feeling of death? A haunting, experimental examination of the Holocaust and how it has shaped (or warped) us all. Warning: Scenes of explicit sexuality.
With the short films MEMOIRES INCERTAINES (36 min), and ONCE (12 min)

THE 11TH ANNUAL Toronto Jewish Film Festival

With the short film THE COLLECTOR OF BEDFORD STREET (34 min)

3:00 pm - TO LIVE WITH TERROR: THE UNSOLVED ATTACKS IN BUENOS AIRES
USA, 2002, 58 min.
English, Spanish, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Ton Vriens

In the 1990s, the Argentinian Jewish community was rocked by two terrorist attacks which killed over one hundred people–Jews and non-Jews. The culprits were never brought to justice, but the suspects, including Hezbollah, Iran and a corrupt police department, are many.
With the short film ASESINO (57 min)

5:30 pm - MY TERRORIST
ISRAEL, 2002, 59 min.
English, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Yulie Cohen Gerstel

In 1978, El Al flight attendant Yulie Cohen was shot and wounded by a Palestinian terrorist in London. Twenty-two years later Yulie decides to reach out to her jailed assailant, and forgive him.

7:15 pm - A HOME ON THE RANGE: THE JEWISH CHICKEN FARMERS OF PETALUMA
USA, 2002, 52 min.
Directors: Bonnie Burt, Judith Monetell

A little-known slice of American Jewish history is unearthed in this rollicking tale of the hardy, unlikely Jewish chicken farmers of Petaluma, California.
Singing cowboy Scott Gerber will perform live
With the short film SONG OF A JEWISH COWBOY (18 min)

9:30 pm - GIRAFFES
ISRAEL, 2001, 115 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Tzahi Grad

A case of multiple mistaken identities and random chance encounters. This hypnotic drama about three women—Dafna, an actress; Avigail, a reporter; and Efrat, a secretary– will reel you into its fascinating world.

Thursday, May 8

11:00 am - MY NAME WAS SABINA SPIELREIN
SWEDEN / SWITZERLAND / DENMARK / FINLAND, 2002, 90 min.
English, German with English subtitles
Director: Elisabeth Márton

She was known as a footnote in the annals of psychoanalysis. Sabina Spielrein, the first client treated by Jung, and the young Jewish woman who went on to work with Freud, became one of the first female psychoanalysts.

1:00 pm - MONSIEUR BATIGNOLE
FRANCE, 2002, 99 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Gérard Jugnot

In German-occupied Paris, butcher Edmond Batignole's conscience is belatedly awakened when a young Jewish boy, escaping deportation, shows up at his door.

3:15 pm - JENIN DIARY - THE INSIDE STORY
ISRAEL, 2002, 65 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Gil Mezuman

In April 2002, thirteen Israeli soldiers lost their lives during an anti-terrorist mission in the Jenin refugee camp. A rare behind-the-scenes glimpse into the Israeli military and their often conflicted soldiers.

5:00 pm - LA GUERRE A PARIS (THE WAR IN PARIS)
FRANCE, 2002, 81 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Yolande Zauberman

As the war rages on, two young Jewish men struggle to survive. When Ana Maria, a Spanish communist fleeing Franco enters the picture, a love triangle develops.
Co-writer / Director Yolande Zauberman has been invited to attend.
With the short film LES GALETS (SKIMMING STONES) (11 min)

7:15 pm - SECRET LIVES: HIDDEN CHILDREN AND THEIR RESCUERS DURING WORLD WAR II
USA, 2002, 71 min.
English, French, Polish with English subtitles
Director: Aviva Slesin

The Righteous Gentiles, the non-Jews who saved Jews during the Holocaust, remain a source of admiration. Why did they risk their lives, and the lives of others, in the service of decency? They speak out, alongside those they saved. Inspirational.
Director Aviva Slesin will be in attendance.

9:30 pm - THE HEBREW HAMMER
USA, 2002, 85 min.
Writer / Director: Jonathan Kesselman

An outrageous spoof! The Hebrew Hammer, aka Mordecai Jefferson Carver (Adam Goldberg), swings into action when Santa Claus' evil son, Damien (Andy Dick) decides to destroy Hanukkah. Sacrilegious, fearless and hysterically funny! Explicit language.
Writer / Director Jonathan Kesselman will be in attendance.
With the short film A FEVER IN THE BLOOD (11 min)

Friday, May 9

11:00 am - THE NAZI OFFICER'S WIFE
USA, 2003, 98 min.
English, German and Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Liz Garbus

Edith Hahn led a spoiled existence in pre-World War II Vienna. When the war began, she fled to Munich to live as an Aryan, married a Nazi and had a child with him. A true-life story without easy answers.

1:00 pm - BETWEEN THE LINES
ISRAEL, 2001, 58 min
Hebrew, Arabic with English subtitles
Director: Yifat Kedar

Of the numerous Israeli reporters covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, only one actually does so from a base within the Palestinian Authority. Meet Amira Hass, reporter for the left-wing daily Ha' aretz.
With the short film THE EYE OF THE REPORTER (27 min)

3:00 pm - THE TRAMP AND THE DICTATOR
UK, 2002, 58 min.
Directors: Kevin Brownlow, Michael Kloft

Though born in the same week in April 1889, and with similar childhood backgrounds, Adolf Hitler and Charlie Chaplin could not have been more different. They are connected through one film, The Great Dictator. Includes newly unearthed colour footage of the black and white classic.
With the short film THE PAWNSHOP (20 min)

5:00 pm - THE GREAT DICTATOR
USA, 1940, 128 min.
Writer / Director: Charles Chaplin

Chaplin's classic is back in a new sepia restored print. Boldly, Chaplin tackled Nazism in this satirical film, playing dual look-alike roles, as a Jewish barber and as the great dictator, Adenoid Hynkel. Sixty plus years later, it's still a standout.

Saturday, May 10

9:15 pm - AMY'S ORGASM
USA, 2001, 88 min.
Writer / Director: Julie Davis

What do you do when you've written a best-selling book entitled Why Love Doesn't Work and then fall for the type of guy you've warned your readers against? Funny, raunchy and off the wall.
Warning: Sexual scenes and explicit language
Writer/Director Julie Davis will be in attendance.

Remembering the Holocaust beyond space and time

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Petr Ginz, a gifted young artist and writer from Prague, perished in the Holocaust, but some of his writings and drawings survived. Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, chose one of the young artist's drawings, a moonscape, to take with him on his ill-fated flight aboard the Columbia.

In a lecture titled Beyond Space and Time: Holocaust Remembrance and the Historic Trip of Israeli Astronaut Ilan Ramon, given at the Asper Jewish Community Centre in Winnipeg, Irena Steinfeldt spoke of the link between Ginz and Ramon and changing Israeli attitudes towards the Holocaust.

The lecture, part of the Asper Foundation Lecture Series, was also the inaugural event of the newly created Asper International Holocaust Studies Program at Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies. The program is funded by income earned from a $4-million fund set up by the Asper Foundation and allows the International School to expand its programming in the form of biannual international conferences, international outreach professional development and training programs for educators, international seminars for educators from English-speaking countries and the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research (a joint venture between governments and educators dealing with Holocaust-denial, racism and xenophobia).

Steinfeldt, the executive assistant to the chair of Yad Vashem, worked with French film director Claude Lanzmann on his award-winning documentary Shoah, and has lectured around the world on Holocaust-related subjects. She has also edited several books and written educational programs.

Steinfeldt began her lecture with a brief overview of the life of Petr Ginz. He was born in Prague in 1928. Although his parents and his sister survived the war, he and his classmates were interned in Theresienstadt in 1942. While living in the ghetto, and later in the concentration camp, he kept a journal with reports and plans for the future, edited a children's magazine, wrote stories that he read aloud to children every Friday night, and drew.

Of the 140,000 Jews imprisoned in Theresienstadt, only about 20,000 survived the war, Steinfeldt noted.

Ginz was transported to Auschwitz on Sept. 28, 1944, and was probably murdered shortly after he arrived, she said.

At the time, Steinfeldt noted, there was a young girl in Birkenau, Tonya Kreppel, who was to survive the war. She made her way to Israel after the war and became the mother of Ilan Ramon.

"Despite what they had been through, the survivors had an unbelievable desire for life," Steinfeldt said. "They married and had children and worked to protect and build their new homeland in Israel. They put the past behind them and looked to the future. When one meets survivors today, one can't help but be awed by their enormous energy and strength."

Steinfeldt is also the child of Holocaust survivors. "When I was growing up, we used to think of our parents as coming from there somewhere," she said.

"Our parents tried to make a good life for their children without burdening them with the past. But the past was always present in the form of the absence of grandparents, a sigh, a look. There was always something hanging in the air."

In the early days, she said, the survivors filled the void by working to build the new state, with Hebrew replacing Yiddish. Young sabras, with their roots in the new state, regarded their parents with their accented Hebrew as an embarrassment.

The turning point came with the Eichmann trial in the early 1960s, she said. "For the first time, Israelis began to hear accounts of the Shoah as individual stories. The voices over the radio became embedded in the Israeli consciousness. That began the process of putting names and faces to the victims of the Shoah. The survivors came to be viewed in a new light – as members of our society with tremendous dignity – and the image of the survivors began to change from passive victims to heroes."

Furthermore, she continued, in searching for their roots, many Israelis had to come face to face with the Holocaust. The survivors became a living bridge connecting Israelis with the Diaspora and the Jewish Europe that was destroyed in the Holocaust.

"Today," she said, "the Shoah has become one of the formative events of Jewish and Israeli life."

She also noted that a growing number of European countries have established Holocaust centres and memorials and commissions to examine their own roles in the Holocaust.

She spoke of the work of Yad Vashem noting its leading role in Holocaust research and education worldwide. There are teacher training programs available in nine languages.

The International School for Holocaust Studies, she said, also hosted about 100,000 Israeli soldiers and officers last year for study days, despite the intensity of the conflict with the Palestinians.

"We have as complete a list as possible of the victims and we hope to have the list online by the next Yom Hashoah," she said.

She also reported that Yad Vashem is working on a plan developed 10 years ago to perpetuate the lessons of the Holocaust long after there are no longer any survivors left alive to bear witness.

Referring to the resurgence of anti-Semitism, Steinfeldt noted that while the most virulent anti-Semitism is coming out of the Arab World today, there is also a new wave of anti-Semitism in Europe. She sees this as a reaction to the self-examination taking place in many countries as to their role in World War II.

Jewish leaders welcome Quebec Liberal victory

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Liberal leader Jean Charest was hailed by FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings as "the next premier of Quebec" on March 10, at the groundbreaking of a Chabad centre in Hampstead.

Few people shared Cummings' optimism at the time. With Charest's victory, many in the community are hoping this could be the turning point that might stem the tide of the community's decline, confirmed by the 2001 census figures that show the population has dropped to 80,000.

Cummings said last week that he couldn't answer that. "We work with all parties and look forward to very good relations with the Liberal government. I'm confident we will be able to move our agendas forward."

Asked whether the election of the Liberals is good for the community, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region president Joseph Gabay said, "We always work with the government in place. We worked closely with the PQ, and hope to do so again with the Liberals... Every government is good for the Jewish community as long as it is responsive to our needs."

Lawrence Bergman, re-elected to a third term in predominantly Jewish D'Arcy McGee with a 23,000-vote plurality, said he finds the community "ecstatic" about the Liberal victory.

Charest, 44, enjoys a popularity in the community that goes beyond his being the Liberal leader. It's a relationship Charest has quietly cultivated since he arrived from Ottawa five years ago. Unlike outgoing Premier Bernard Landry, Charest could not claim to have had his first job in the Jewish community (Landry worked for the Jewish Labour Committee), to have close Jewish friends or to have visited Israel.

Charest's years in Brian Mulroney's government did not bring him in much contact with the community in his portfolios of youth, amateur sport and the environment.

But Charest did have contact with the Jewish community in his hometown, Sherbrooke, where he grew up near the since-closed synagogue. He has said he admired the contribution the small community made to that Eastern Townships city.

He had a similar message last month when he hailed the community for its "extraordinary contribution" to Montreal, Quebec and Canada, and expressed appreciation for its "continuing presence."

As Liberal leader, Charest has spoken to Jewish groups on several occasions, publicly and privately. He has often repeated his wish that Quebec be a society where everyone feels at home and that its government be inclusive in deed, not just word.

At a Jewish National Fund dinner three years ago, he received a standing ovation when he said: "This is one of the few places in the world where people of different origins live in peace, with shared values, building a common project that transcends the purposes of any single group." He also said the community's attachment to Israel is "not a contradiction" to its attachment to Quebec and Canada because being Canadian embraces such multiple identities.

He has shown an understanding of the community's concerns about health care and the loss of its young people, but has been firm on language. In November 1999, he told the Jewish Business Network he would make no changes to the language laws because they represent a "consensus" and "compromise." "The majority of anglophones are satisfied with [Bill 101] after the 30 years of debate we have had. I think most Quebecers want to live in peace."

Charest earned admiration from the community for his response to the Yves Michaud affair. In December 2000, Michaud, a PQ militant, was in trouble for saying Jews were not the only people who have suffered and for singling out Côte St. Luc voters for not casting a single "yes" vote in the 1995 sovereignty referendum.

Charest demanded that Lucien Bouchard explicitly say he did not want Michaud as a candidate in an upcoming byelection and blamed the premier for the whole controversy. Bouchard left the final say to the party executive, then when things escalated, resigned in January, 2001.

Bergman said Charest has always been responsive to community concerns or events. "When I proposed the bill to have Yom Hashoah recognized, he gave his unconditional support immediately."

Bergman, whose nomination was assured when he successfully led the campaign two years ago to save D'Arcy McGee from being eliminated in an electoral-map revision, said he is ready to serve the government in any capacity Charest sees fit.

Campaign worker Sid Margles, a veteran political mover-and-shaker, said before the election he was certain Bergman would be named to the cabinet, possibly the revenue post.

Gabay said the first issue the community will raise with Charest is funding for Jewish day schools. About two months ago, leaders presented their case to Charest that the per capita funding of students should be equal to that in the public sector. Government funding of Jewish schools now amounts to less than half of costs.

"He made no promises, but he said he recognized that something has to be done," said Gabay.

CJC met with about 20 candidates from the three major parties during the campaign. The other main issues raised were the need to combat anti-Semitism and racism, possibly through the schools; the shortage of long-term care beds, inadequate home care and the cost of drugs; the hiring of more non-francophones in the provincial civil service; and more flexibility in recognizing the professional qualifications of immigrants.

Practising what you preach

"Understanding means rounded facts, credible analysis, subtlety, historical reference points, balance..."

Jeffrey Simpson, the multiple-award winning author and national affairs columnist for the Globe and Mail, wrote this noble definition in his recent review of Rogue Nation: The America the Rest of the World Knows by Peter Scowen (in the Globe's Books section, April 12). Simpson faults Scowen for flouting sound journalistic practice in pursuit of a "reflexive" anti-Americanism.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

If only Simpson had followed his own advice when writing about aspects of U.S. Middle East policy recently. Unfortunately, the understanding that Simpson extols is missing when he turns his guns on the "Likudnik hawks in Washington," who, he claims, are dictating foreign policy to U.S. President George W. Bush.

Simpson decries what he views as the "Bush administration's unconditional support for... Sharon," a man he has characterized as a "political thug." Simpson even asserts that the Bush administration has allowed Sharon to guide U.S. policy "and knew it had to work with a Congress that would ask how high when the Israelis yelled jump."

There is reason to be concerned when a writer of Simpson's calibre starts sounding like right-wing U.S. commentators Robert Novak and Pat Buchanan, who claim that prominent Jewish neo-conservatives are dictating U.S. policy toward the Middle East.

The reality is that Bush is no more controlled by Sharon or his "Likudnik" representatives (a suggestion of dual loyalty here?) than was former U.S. president Harry Truman under the sway of the scientists on the Manhattan Project, the majority of whom were Jews who first advocated the development of, and then created, the atomic bomb, fearful that the Nazis might produce one first.

The parallels are worth examining. Truman did not order the atomic bomb to be dropped on Hiroshima to please scientists such as Leo Szilard, Edward Teller, Eugene Wigner and Robert Oppenheimer any more than Bush initiated a war in Iraq to satisfy neo-conservatives such as Pentagon adviser Richard Perle and U.S. Deputy Defence Secretary Paul Wolfowitz.

In both cases – as in all such cases – U.S. policy is determined by U.S. national interests: Truman's desire to end World War II with as few U.S. combat casualties as possible in Japan, and Bush's hope to eliminate a threat from Iraq after the trauma of Sept. 11.

Historically, Jews have been over-represented in key American intellectual circles, but they have not controlled U.S. policy. The truth is that a confluence of talent and policy-planning has occasionally dovetailed with the course of world events.

Now, many in the American Jewish community are worried that British Prime Minister Tony Blair may be gaining a strong influence on Bush and that Israel could be served up on a platter to satisfy post-Iraq sentiment in Europe and the Arab Middle East.

Simpson, nevertheless, is convinced that the Bush administration will not "immerse itself in Israeli-Palestinian talks no matter what Mr. Blair pleads." If Simpson is wrong, as many fear, can we expect to see references to the "Blairites" running the U.S. State Department in his upcoming columns?

New meets old at new Victoria cultural centre

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — An overflow crowd of 300 attended the official opening earlier this month of Congregation Emanu-El's long-awaited new educational and cultural centre in downtown Victoria.

Attendees included members of the Victoria and Vancouver Island Jewish communities, local MPs, MLAs, mayors, and representatives from the First Nations, Muslim, Chinese and Christian communities in Victoria.

Grand Chief Ed John, of the First Nations Summit, earned a a standing ovation for his 20-minute speech in which he offered greetings and spoke of Jewish-First Nations reconciliation.

The new $1.3 million centre complements Congregation Emanu-El's historic synagogue, the oldest in Canada, which was built by 100 pioneer Jewish families in 1863.

The buildings are located at the corner of Blanshard and Pandora streets, about 1½ kilometres north of Victoria's Inner Harbour tourist district.

The April 6 grand opening/simchah gedolah featured tours of the new centre and synagogue, traditional klezmer and Middle-Eastern music, and an adult Jewish community choir that sang in Yiddish and English.

The 9,200-square-foot centre will contain classrooms, a licensed day-care, administrative office, reception hall, a library and archives, kosher kitchen, rabbi's office, rooftop outdoor playground and Vancouver Island's first mikvah.

Because the synagogue was designated a national historic site in 1982, when a renovation and restoration of the building was completed, the new centre's design had to be approved by Victoria's heritage design committee.

Charlotte Atlung Sutker, chair of the opening ceremonies committee, said planning for the centre began 18 years ago, and fundraising started in earnest in the mid-1990s. "Most of the $1.3 million came from the members of Congregation Emanu-El," she said. "A few Vancouver donors also contributed, and we received a BC 2000 grant of $40,000 from the B.C. government."

With a moderately growing membership of 200 families, the Conservative Congregation Emanu-El is one of four Jewish congregations in Victoria. The others are Congregation Aish HaTorah (Orthodox), The Victoria Society for Humanistic Judaism and Kolot Mayim Reform Temple.

The Jewish community of Victoria had its beginnings in the late 1850s, when the discovery of gold in what is now mainland British Columbia attracted a group of Jewish prospectors from San Francisco. In 1860, the fledgling community purchased land for a cemetery on the outskirts of Victoria, which is still in use.

In 1862, Congregation Emanu-El was organized and land for a synagogue was purchased and set aside. When construction of the synagogue was completed in 1863, all of Victoria attended the dedication.

Toward the end of the 19th century, Victoria's Jewish population began to decline as Vancouver became the economic centre of British Columbia. By the mid-1940's, Congregation Emanu-El's membership fell to a handful.

The synagogue, by then 80 years old, had also deteriorated. It was drafty and hard to heat and too expensive for the small congregation to maintain. Congregation Emanu-El made a decision to modernize the synagogue. Although the modernization compromised the architectural integrity of the building, it allowed the congregation to keep the building through its lean years.

The post-war years brought an economic boom to Victoria, and with it a new and energetic Jewish population. In 1978, a small group of volunteers decided to restore the synagogue to its original character and beauty. The restored synagogue was rededicated in 1982, and has remained in daily use since then.

Volunteer has warm feelings for Pier 21

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Marianne Ferguson has rarely said no to a good cause.

The Halifax woman gives countless volunteer hours to many organizations, including Pier 21, the entry point on the Halifax waterfront that saw a million immigrants pass into Canada between 1928 and 1971 and has since been made into a museum.

Herself an immigrant in 1939 at age 13, Ferguson is also involved in Halifax Hadassah-WIZO, Shaar Shalom Synagogue, and is a devoted mother and grandmother. Last fall, she was honoured by the Atlantic Jewish Council with a well-earned community volunteer award.

But mention Pier 21 and her eyes light up. She is there almost every day during the heavy tourist season, from May through October, guiding tours, explaining the impact this building has had on her life. In winter, she helps in the office.

A just-announced $7 million expansion to Pier 21 will honour all immigrants to Canada - men, women and children who arrived between 1867 and the present day, but the ever-rosy Ferguson does not believe this will take away from recalling those who arrived though Pier 21.

"It's wonderful to enlarge. And it's nice to acknowledge all immigrants," says Ferguson, who arrived from Poland in 1939, escaping Nazi oppression in the nick of time. "Expansion to include all new Canadians certainly won't take away from those who came through here to establish new lives in Canada between 1928 and 1971."

Ferguson, her parents, sisters and grandmother were able to establish a new home near Milford, N.S., but she sadly relates that she lost 11 family members in the Holocaust.

She remembers seeing Nazis march by her house every Sunday, singing anti-Jewish songs.

"When we went outside, we were always afraid of being taken away [to concentration camps]."

Her parents, Otto and Meta Echt, made plans quietly to shepherd Ferguson, her sisters Renée and Brigette and their grandmother out of Poland to safety.

"My father was a pharmacist, but the Germans closed his business, telling people 'The Jewish pharmacist might poison you with his medications.'"

They fled from Poland, to Liverpool, England, then boarded the ship Andania to Halifax.

"We arrived March 7, 1939, and were very relieved, although we were so apprehensive about leaving relatives there," recalls Ferguson.

"We could have taken 11 others to Argentina, but Canada made the first offer to my father, for only immediate family. He took the offer, but always had guilty feelings because Hitler invaded Poland in the fall of 1939 and our relatives were never seen again."

She gazes fondly at Pier 21's exhibits and memorabilia.

"It was exciting arriving here. Coming from Danzig [a city then in the corridor between Germany and Poland, now called Gdansk], and being subjected to the racism we faced, we were greeted here by friendliness and comfort."

Ferguson has conducted tours and worked in the office since Pier 21 re-opened as a heritage museum in July 1999. More than 275,000 people have visited in the last 2½ years.

"I like to work with adults or small groups of children," she says. "While some small children are too young to take in all the information and realize the impact Pier 21 had, it's good for schoolchildren to see how things used to be."

Even though her story is poignant and meaningful, Ferguson is reluctant to put too much of herself into the tour. "I feel embarrassed to tell my story but when I do, people are amazed these things could happen."

Three generations of Ferguson's family have volunteered at Pier 21, which makes her proud. "My daughter Lea [McKnight], her son Matthew, a college student, and [granddaughter] Becky [Ferguson, a high school student], have all helped here. It means a lot to me to see my family continue to take an interest in their history."

Ferguson says she will never tire of the historic site.

"Next to my home, Pier 21 is my favourite place, because this is where I came when I was 13. I felt welcome to a new country then and still feel welcome here today."

Torontonian brings 'flavour of Jewish culture' to Atlantic youth

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Michael Anthony knew he faced a challenge when he started his new job last fall, but he feels he has met it and succeeded – so far.

Since September, the 24-year-old Toronto native has been the Atlantic Jewish Council's first full-time co-ordinator of youth programming. His goal during his two-year term, he says, is to provide a diverse Jewish and social experience for the couple of hundred Jewish young people across the region, most of whom live in in Halifax.

He says he's happy with his mix of programming thus far.

"For the younger children [ages five to eight], there is always a flavour of Jewish culture. For the others, we've tied in sports, drama and other things. The most popular activities have been day camps, where everyone gets a wide variety of activity including sports, Jewish music, drama, dance and arts and crafts."

Challenge to bring programs to smaller communities

While working on a history degree at York University, which he completed in 2002, Anthony was involved in a number of Jewish student activities, including Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, United Jewish Appeal campaigns and York's Jewish Student Federation.

"With three months left in my degree program, I changed my focus from history to concentrate on the interest in youth programming I had picked up in elective education courses. I heard about this job and jumped at the chance."

Anthony replaces Darcie Richler, who served part-time in the position for two years while attending Dalhousie University. She is now associate director of community development with the Canada-Israel Committee in Ottawa.

Filled with enthusiasm, Anthony runs at least one program a month for each of four age groups, serving a total of 150 youngsters ages five to 17. He has also given them a sense of community by helping them initiate clothing drives for Phoenix Youth Services (for homeless teens in Halifax), food collections for Metro Food Bank and a volunteer session at a Salvation Army shelter.

Using students from Dalhousie and Saint Mary's universities and University of King's College, many of whom are familiar with the youngsters from Camp Kadimah, Anthony ran a successful Shabbaton last fall that attracted young people from all over the region.

"One of the major challenges is generating programs in smaller communities in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. It's very difficult to provide age-appropriate programs where the population in each group is so small."

But he's developing an online chat room that will enable those kids to talk with youth from major centres – "an outreach to youth," as he calls it.

"Chatting in real time is great for discussing issues that can bring them closer to the programs being held in Halifax."

Anthony is working hard to keep parents and children informed. "I send flyers to each home in Halifax, then call each family for every program. I'll talk to the kids and their parents. As the parents hear my voice more, and see what their kids are getting from the programs, they'll hopefully keep their children coming."

As part of his job, he'll stay in the region this summer as a section leader at Camp Kadimah in Barss Corner, about an hour outside Halifax. "That will enable me to see the children, and them me, in a different context."

He concludes, "We're getting more than half the available children to our programs and that's good. Now we can only grow."

Seifert extradition case adjourned

VANCOUVER — The extradition case of Michael Seifert, a one-time SS guard now living in Vancouver, has been adjourned until June.

Judge Selwyn Romilly agreed to the adjournment to allow a defence request that documents be translated into Seifert's native language, German.

The documents were originally in Italian and formed part of the court record of an Italian military court that convicted Seifert in absentia of murdering 11 people.

The Italian court found that Seifert served as a guard at the Bolzano transit camp in Italy during World War II.

One day prior to the adjournment, court heard testimony from one of Seifert's former SS colleagues, who now lives across the lane from him in east Vancouver.

The witness, Peter Makelke, identified Seifert as a guard at the camp and said he had been convicted in 1944 of sexually assaulting an Italian woman while on leave. Under cross-examination by defence lawyer Doug Christie, Makelke admitted he lied about his Nazi past when he applied to immigrate to Canada in 1952.

Justice Department officials said they would evaluate Makelke's Canadian status in light of his admission.

Supreme Court to hear appeal on balcony sukkot

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Supreme Court of Canada has agreed to hear an appeal from a group of Montreal condominium owners who want the right to erect sukkot on their balconies.

The plaintiffs are residents of the tony Le Sanctuaire condomimium apartments, whose management has forbidden residents to build the temporary huts associated with the week-long holiday of Sukkot.

They will argue that the policy limits their freedom to practise their religion.

The plaintiffs named are Moïse Amselem, Gladys Bouhadana, Antal Klein, Gabriel Fonfeder, Miguel Bernfield and Edith Jaul. The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada is co-party.

The case has been before the courts since 1998, when the condominium corporation, Syndicat Northcrest, won a permanent injunction in Quebec Superior Court against the sukkot, citing a clause in the contract signed by owners that forbids any construction on balconies. The residents say there was a sudden change in attitude by the corporation, which until that time had allowed sukkot.

The residents appealed to Quebec Court of Appeal and lost again in a 2-1 decision.

Steven Slimovitch, the League for Human Right's legal counsel, said a similar argument will be made in the Supreme Court as was made in the provincial appeal court – that is, that the lower court judge went beyond his competence by deciding what is a correct practice of Judaism.

The Superior Court judge heard conflicting testimonies from two rabbis serving as expert witnesses.

Rabbi Moise Ohana, spiritual leader of Congregation Or Hahayim, said putting up a sukkah is an essential practice in Judaism. He said the corporation's offer of one sukkah on common property did not fulfill this obligation because Sukkot is a festive holiday and if people are inconvenienced by having to leave their homes to visit the sukkah, that would detract from enjoyment and would, therefore, be contrary to the religion.

McGill University Jewish studies professor Barry Levy, a witness for the corporation, denied that erecting a sukkah was an obligation of Judaism, and rather is a tradition.

"The trial judge basically said he preferred Levy's version and ruled in favour of the corporation. Our appeal will be that a civil court should never make a ruling on dogma… It's a scary day when the state, through the judiciary, tells somebody what is the correct way to practice their religion," Slimovitch said.

"The courts cannot decide how we govern our relationship with a higher being."

In the Quebec Court of Appeal decision, the dissenting judge agreed with the plaintiffs on this point, but the other two did not touch on the religious freedom issue, basing their decision instead on the contract signed by the condominium owners.

"We believe that the charter guarantee of freedom of religion, including exercise of that religion, takes precedence over a civil contract," Slimovitch added.

Slimovitch said he assumes the Supreme Court will not hear the case for at least eight or nine months.

GROUNDBREAKING IN BARRIE: Am Shalom Congregation in Barrie, Ont., held a groundbreaking ceremony on April 6 at the new Huronia Road site that will become the permanent home of the Simcoe County Reform Jewish population. Construction is expected to begin shortly, with completion planned for the High Holy Days this fall. Attending were Henry Bernick and his family, who donated the land; MP Aileen Carroll and MPP Joe Tascona. During the ceremony, Barrie Mayor Jim Perri presented the congregation with an inscribed ceremonial shovel, local businessman Lou Kozlov made a substantial donation, and Marc Brenner read a prayer sent by Rabbi Bernard Baskin of Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton. Seen are members of the of Am Shalom board of directors, from left, Marshall Green, Gerald Levine, Eric Allen, Robin Hadfield, Marty Tanenbaum and Dror and Somi Feiner.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Kick it up a notch – these guys can't cook

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If you spend an evening watching the Food Network on cable TV, you might come to the conclusion that the world's best chefs – or at least the most telegenic – are men.

There's Emeril "Bam" Lagasse, Jamie "The Naked Chef" Oliver, Graham Kerr, Wolfgang Puck, Molto Mario Batale and "Hot Off the Grill" Bobby Flay, just to name a few. If you had just arrived from another planet, you might reasonably conclude that these Earth guys can really cook.

Ahh, but that would be an erroneous conclusion, to say the least.

Sure, most of us have some specialties we unveil when we entertain, particularly if you want to impress the opposite sex. An old friend of mine specialized in an Italian red dish, that is a pasta covered in a tomato sauce with lots of ingredients (when it's all red, it doesn't much matter what the ingredients are). When served with prodigious quantities of red wine, it was, let us say, guaranteed to make a lasting impression.

Food, Scrumptious Food

For my part, there's nothing quite like grilling over the open fire of a gas or charcoal barbecue. Just grill it and flip it; pretty much anything short of tossed salad tastes better on the 'cue.

For most guys I know, keeping it simple is an unfailing guide to cooking. Most wouldn't know a terrine from a taco, and mealtime is more an adventure in what you can find in the fridge than it is in creative culinary techniques. Cookbooks are nice, but for us the credo is, "I need to eat and I need to eat now!"

Years ago, when I was living in Vancouver, a friend came to visit from our hometown in Winnipeg.

Once, on returning home from work, I casually asked him what he'd had for lunch. I knew there wasn't much in the apartment to eat, but I was stunned into near silence when he told me, "a potato chip sandwich."

"A what?" I inquired.

"A potato chip sandwich," he repeated, as if the recipe could be found in all the great cookbooks of Europe.

"I couldn't find any food, so I took some potato chips, put them on a slice of bread, then took another slice of bread, and made a sandwich."

"It wasn't bad," he reassured me.

Thinking back on it, I now realize it was my fault I had left him alone, bereft of a prepared meal. There were hints that maybe he hadn't really had to manage on his own before. The night before, I had barbecued steaks, good sized 10-ouncers, and after serving him his, I was surprised to find he'd gobbled it up before I was halfway through mine. I was even more surprised when he casually asked where I'd left his other steak.

Clearly, at that point in his life, he didn't understand the concepts of shopping, food selection and preparation and not making a pig of oneself.

But I note that putting together a meal from whatever you can find in the house is a talent that more and more young men are developing, particularly as large numbers delay marriage and find that when they do become part of a couple, their wives are no more talented in the kitchen than they are.

Here at The CJN, you'll find as motley an assortment of culinarily challenged men as you'd want to find this side of a Bonnie Stern cooking class, yet none – well, maybe one – appears to be in dire need of a hot meal.

I would guess that the best cook in the bunch – at least the one who talks a good meal best – is José De Freitas, a production maven.

His "I just got home and I've got to eat now" meal is fried rice. "If you've got leftover rice, it takes two seconds," he said.

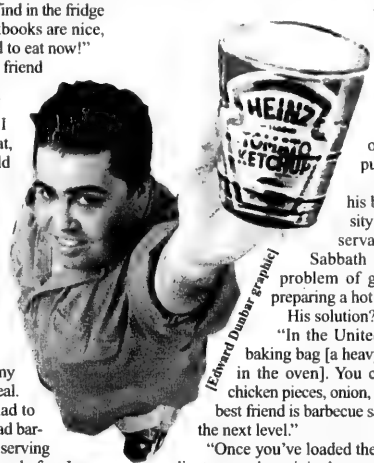
"What you can do is you can take some hot, spicy salsa sauce, mix it with tuna, boil it together and throw it over white rice. My mom makes something similar from scratch, but that's the easy way out of it."

Marshall Cohen, whose wife Ella is our Ask Ella columnist, specializes in pizza bread. As Ella describes it, "you take bread and then you take ketchup and you put the ketchup on the bread. It's not bad," she says, as others in the office begin to gag at her description.

"Then you take shredded mozzarella or a slice of processed cheese and you put it on top of the ketchup and then whatever you have in the house, like sliced pickles and onion, and you put it on top of the cheese. Then you put on top of that garlic powder, maybe oregano, basil and chili flakes, and you put it in the oven until the cheese melts.

"Then we have Fudgsicles for dessert."

Gary Laforet, The CJN's general manager, picks up on the ketchup theme. It's part of his version of French toast – white bread well and truly soaked in egg wash, sprinkled liberally on both sides with onion salt, fried until golden brown and then smothered in ketchup.



[Edward Dunbar graphic]

"Ketchup," José says. "It's such a mangia-cake thing to do. I had to slap my uncle once when he was going to put it on eggs."

Michael Stavsky recalls his bachelor days at a university in Denver. As he is an observant Jew, the oncoming Sabbath presented the special problem of getting out of class and preparing a hot meal in time.

His solution?

"In the United States, you can buy a baking bag [a heavy duty plastic that can go in the oven]. You can put anything in it – chicken pieces, onion, potatoes. And a bachelor's best friend is barbecue sauce. It's ketchup taken to the next level."

"Once you've loaded the bag with all your ingredients, you shove it in the oven at 200 degrees and let it roast all day. "It's the frum bachelor's secret," he said.

Jared Ronski, a CJN sales rep, agrees that his "meals tend to be simpler. They tend to be on the easy-to-prepare side."

Peanut butter and banana sandwiches are a mainstay. "They sound a little weird, but they taste great."

"Once I actually tried to cook for my girlfriend. I went on the Internet and found a recipe for turkey scallopini with pasta. The pasta was alright, but the turkey ended up tasting like rubber."

He should have stuck to his other staple, one mentioned by many other men as their standard fallback meal: macaroni and cheese. "I eat boxes and boxes of it," Jared said.

Like other bachelors, Jared has also learned to gussy-up plain old tuna, using Italian dressing or mustard. Like other guys, he's also prepared to eat it straight out of the can, avoiding the untidy nuisance of actually having to clean plates.

Britta Montgomery, another production maven, recounts a meal prepared for her and her husband by a bachelor friend.

He cooked a couple of pieces of French toast and then sandwiched them around chocolate chips, the kind you use for baking. He poured maple syrup all over the concoction and then, "he ate it like a sandwich. It was really gross."

Gross indeed. I think I'll e-mail the recipe to my potato chip friend. For him, it will seem like haute cuisine.

Palestinian woman arrested for plotting suicide mission

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Security forces operating in the West Bank city of Nablus on Monday arrested a Palestinian woman suspected of planning to carry out a suicide attack inside Israel.

The woman was arrested in the city's Balata refugee camp. The woman, who was named as Feyroz Ahmed Mahmoud Makhil and is in her twenties, was arrested along with another wanted Fatah activist in the dawn raid.

In the Ramallah area, forces arrested three Palestinian men wanted for questioning.

Security forces across the country remain on high alert Monday, the fourth day of Passover. Israel Defence Forces sources told Israel Radio the number of specific terror warnings remains unchanged.

In Hebron, the IDF imposed a curfew on Palestinian neighbourhoods adjacent to the Tomb of the Patriarchs, which is expected to draw thousands of Jewish pilgrims during Passover.

Security has also been beefed up in east Jerusalem, where thousands are expected to visit to mark the holiday, and at various points along the seam line with Palestinian areas.

IDF cameraman Cpl. Lior Ziv, 19, from Holon, was killed early Sunday and three other soldiers were wounded during an operation to destroy a Hamas smuggling tunnel in Rafah. Five Palestinians were killed and 30 others wounded in the operation.

The operation began late Saturday night when Givati brigade infantrymen and engineers in armoured vehicles including tanks, under the command of Givati commander Col. Imad Fares, rolled into the Sabora neighbourhood of Rafah to find and destroy tunnels used for smuggling from Egypt into Rafah.

The incursion was met by unusually stiff resistance, including light weapons, anti-tank grenades, hand grenades and home-made bombs. Early in the operation, soldiers killed and wounded some of the armed Palestinians.

Ziv, a still photographer from the IDF Spokesman's Office, was assigned, along with videographer Durel Gillerman, to a unit looking for tunnels. It is standard procedure for cameramen to remain inside an armoured vehicle until other troops clear an area of hostile elements.

But almost immediately after leaving the armoured personnel carrier, Ziv, who was wearing a flak jacket and helmet, was shot in the head and died instantly. Gillerman was wounded. When two medics began attending them, they also came under fire – one was seriously hurt and the other lightly. All three were evacuated to Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva.

Elsewhere in the area, soldiers uncovered a large tunnel, 30 metres deep, 300 metres long and 60 centimetres wide, which they blew up with 200 kilograms of explosives. According to military sources, the tunnel was used by Hamas, and its opening was under the home of Hamas activist Naim Abu Ubeid. A smaller tunnel was also uncovered and destroyed.

During the operation, three houses were demolished, including one owned by Muhamed Abu Shimala, the current head of the Hamas military wing in Gaza. At first he was believed to have been killed in the firefight, but it later turned out he survived. He is thought to be behind the killing of an IDF officer in Rafah in 1994, and was propelled to the leadership of the Hamas military wing after IDF successes against a series of predecessors.

A 30-metre-deep tunnel was discovered and destroyed by Israeli forces this week in a house in Rafah, in the Gaza Strip. It was used by Hamas for gun running from Egypt, the military said.
[Israel Sun photo]

Among the Palestinian casualties Sunday were known members of terror groups operating from Rafah, as well as a 14-year-old boy.

The IDF operation prompted a Hamas response – two Qassam rockets fired at Sderot in the Negev that slightly wounded an Israeli woman who suffered from smoke inhalation when a rocket started a fire in her apartment. A number of mortars were also fired at Israeli communities in Gaza, causing no casualties.

In a separate incident Sunday, a Palestinian teenager was killed by IDF fire near the village of Azun, east of Qalqiliya, when soldiers shot him after he was seen throwing Molotov cocktails at Israeli cars.

South of Jenin, a landmine went off near an IDF patrol, causing no injuries.

In another development, Islamic Jihad claimed it was responsible for an attack on the West Bank town of Shaked, where three Israelis were wounded. The gunman, from Jenin, was killed by soldiers during the attack.

Nabil Sha'ath: No chance Abu Mazen will form gov't

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior Palestinian leader Nabil Sha'ath said Monday that the rejection by prime minister designate Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen) of a compromise deal to settle a dispute about the cabinet's composition eliminated his chances of presenting his government to the Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC) by his deadline, the Israeli news agency Itim reported.

"Mahmoud Abbas has no chance of presenting a government due to the large gaps and the deep crisis between him and [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat," Itim quoted Sha'ath, the PA's foreign affairs spokesperson, as saying.

Since the efforts made Sunday and Monday to resolve the crisis did not yield positive results, Sha'ath reportedly said the talks had reached a dead end and it would be impossible for Abu Mazen to present his government to the PLC by the deadline – Tuesday evening.

Abu Mazen had rejected a compromise deal brokered by senior Palestinians involved in attempts to reach an agreement that would allow him to do this.

The proposal would have seen 24 ministers serving under Abu Mazen, 14 of whom were members of the previous cabinet. The list does not include, however, Mohammed Dahlan, whom Abu Mazen supports, but Arafat does not want in the new cabinet.

European and Arab leaders spoke to Arafat by phone, pressing him to get the new cabinet approved quickly. Among those exerting pressure were German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Jordan's King Abdullah and the European Union's Middle East envoy, Miguel Moratinos.

A European official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Moratinos told Arafat that European officials consider Abu Mazen the only acceptable choice as prime minister.

Quoting senior Palestinian sources, Israel Radio also reported that Abu Mazen is refusing to hold any further meetings with Arafat, and is determined not to commence his premiership until Arafat agrees to grant him real powers.

Mohammed Dahlan

The sources also claimed that Arafat's bureau has started to look for possible replacements for Abu Mazen, and they reported that the United States, the European Union and various Arab countries were all pressuring Arafat to show some flexibility toward Abu Mazen, to allow him to meet the deadline.

European officials consider Abu Mazen the only acceptable choice as prime minister

With the deadline looming, Abu Mazen repeated an ultimatum he had used before, according to Palestinian sources. He told Arafat he has no intention of being prime minister under imposed conditions.

The sources said Sunday night there was concern Abu Mazen would not meet the deadline to present a government and it was not clear if Arafat had anyone else he could ask to form a government.

The sources also said Arafat has received dozens of letters of support from residents of the West Bank, helping to revive his conviction that he can still determine who sits in the cabinet. But the PLC has voted into law a dramatic reduction in the PA president's authority, giving the PLC the authority to approve a cabinet.

The new Palestinian cabinet had to be approved by Wednesday. If leaders failed to meet the deadline, Arafat was likely to appoint another senior member of his own Fatah party.

Arafat and Abu Mazen held separate talks Sunday with Fatah members, Abu Mazen's aides said.

Abu Mazen stormed out of a PLO central committee meeting in Ramallah on Saturday night over Arafat's bid to block Dahlan's candidacy for a key ministerial portfolio.

The prime minister designate has threatened not to take up his post, political sources said. He wants the former Gaza security chief to be in charge of security in the new cabinet, but Arafat wants that responsibility to remain in the hands of the current interior minister, Hani el-Hasan, who is one of his loyalists.

Arafat wants Dahlan kept away from any security portfolio, because Dahlan has managed to establish a strong and independent security apparatus in the past.

Dahlan tried to defuse the crisis Sunday by offering to give up a seat in the cabinet if it would help the two reach an agreement, Israel Radio reported.

But Abu Mazen said Dahlan's disqualification constituted a red line for him, and he left the central committee meeting. Palestinian sources described the talks as "tense and stormy."

Arafat said Saturday that at most, Dahlan could be appointed as a minister dealing with peace negotiations. Arafat also demanded that between 14 and 17 of the new ministers in Abu Mazen's cabinet be former ministers of previous governments.

So far, Arafat seems victorious on the issue of the Dahlan appointment, with most Fatah and PLO groups supporting the Palestinian leader's objections to the nomination.

Israel wants to help remaining Jews leave Iraq

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency and the Mossad are looking into the possibility of bringing the remaining Jews in Iraq to Israel, according to official Israeli sources.

The same sources confirmed talks were being held with the U.S. administration in an effort to gain Washington's approval for an operation. At this time, U.S. military officials operating in Iraq are not inclined to allow the operation to take place.

"The message we are getting from the Americans is that there is no immediate danger. 'Give us a week or two in order to stabilize the situation and then we will see,' they are saying," the Israeli officials said.

Another problem organizers in Israel are facing is the unwillingness of Iraqi Jews to leave for Israel. This appears to be the message the Jewish Agency, the Mossad and third parties are receiving from the community.

The danger to the Jewish community in Baghdad has grown recently, not only because of the general anarchy in the city, but also because of the rising interest journalists are showing in them.

The Iraqi capital is home to 34 Jews, most of whom are elderly. The heads of the community moved to Britain a number of years ago.

Just over a week ago, the sole synagogue still operating in the city was closed down for fear of looting.

Israel faces suspected SARS cases

By HAIM SHADMI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BE'ER SHEVA — Doctors at Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva were to find out Wednesday whether a 77-year-old man suspected of suffering from the deadly SARS virus does actually carry the disease, the hospital's director told Israel Radio Monday.

The man was hospitalized Monday after his return a week ago from a trip to China. He arrived suffering from a high fever, coughing and breathing difficulties, which are typical symtoms of severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS). He was placed in isolation and put on antibiotics, and is being treated by a small staff. Although his lung X-ray was OK, he will remain in the hospital for the time being.

On Saturday, a two-year old girl from a kibbutz in the north was hospitalized in Haifa after being suspected of contracting SARS. By Monday morning, her temperature had dropped, and she was to be released later that day.

The girl's family recently returned from a long stay in Australia and flew back to Israel via Hong Kong.

Hong Kong's government said Monday the SARS virus had killed six more people in the city and infected 22 more people. The figures brought the Hong Kong death toll from SARS to 94 and a total of 1,402 cases, a government statement said.

SARS has infected more than 3,800 people worldwide, and killed 205, the World Health Organization said Monday.

As of that time, Canada had 304 probable and suspect cases in six provinces. Most – 253 cases – have been in Ontario, where 14 people – all in the Greater Toronto Area – have died of the disease.

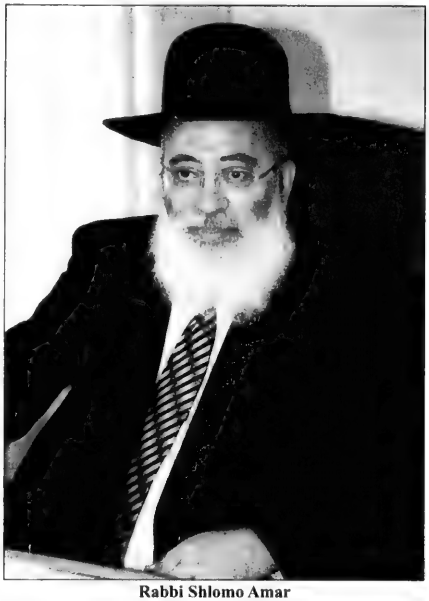
The flu-like illness, which is widely believed to have originated in southern China, hit Hong Kong in March and has been spread around the world by air travellers.

The World Health Organization (WHO) said Monday about half of the 402 suspected SARS cases in Beijing were most likely to be confirmed.

A team of WHO virologists that investigated the outbreak in Beijing thought that about 200 of the suspected cases could be classified as probable, or clinically confirmed, a WHO spokesperson in China said.

"We're still concerned about the number of suspected cases," Henk Bekedam said a day after the Chinese government said Beijing had 339 SARS cases, not the 37 reported previously.

"The expert team felt from the cases that they had seen that quite a percentage, let's say 50 per cent of the cases, most likely could be probable," Bekedam said.



Rabbi Shlomo Amar

Rabbi Yona Metzger

NEW CHIEF RABBIS: One of Israel's new chief rabbis pledged last week to work for a "progressive, open rabbinate." The new Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Rabbi Yona Metzger, 50, made the comments after being elected, along with Rabbi Shlomo Amar, 55, who was chosen Sephardi chief rabbi. They were selected for their 10-year terms by a 150-member electoral body made up of 80 rabbis and 70 politicians. Less than twenty-four hours after being elected, the pair presided over the symbolic sale of the country's chametz to Jabar Hussein from Abu Gosh. The election of Rabbi Metzger was not without controversy, however. Outspoken religious Zionist rabbi and former Meimad MK Yehuda Gilad, who heads a liberal Orthodox yeshiva, last week criticized the election of Rabbi Metzger, saying the choice alienates religious Zionists because his election was backed by non-chassidic haredim who don't recognize the Chief Rabbinate. Other critics said Rabbi Metzger lacks experience running a municipal rabbinate and as a rabbinical court judge. Many observers view the selection of the chief rabbis as political deals that do not sufficiently consider the qualifications the chief rabbis should possess. [Isranet photos]

The Week in Israel

April 14

• Israeli officials said Afghanistan is interested in normalizing relations. The Afghani foreign minister, Abdullah Abdullah, recently sent a message to his Israeli counterpart, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom. (Later in the week, the Afghani government denied it had established any contact with Israel aimed at normalizing relations.)

April 15

• Two Israelis were killed and seven wounded at the Karni terminal, where goods move between Israel and the Gaza Strip, when a Palestinian gunman entered the terminal hurling grenades and spraying automatic weapons fire. Hamas claimed responsibility.

April 16

• The Israel Defence Forces imposed a complete closure on the West Bank and Gaza that was to be in effect over the Passover holiday, after receiving warnings of attacks planned by Palestinians.

April 17

• In an operation in Tulkarm, Israeli troops shot a Palestinian and arrested five militants planning suicide bombings during the Passover holiday.

April 18

• British Prime Minister Tony Blair has invited Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to London, but a date for the visit has not been set. A British Embassy spokesperson in Tel Aviv said Ambassador Sherard Cowper-Coles had sent a letter to Sharon's office, mentioning the invitation.

• Israel gave the United States a list of measures that it intends to implement following the swearing-in of the new Palestinian government under Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas. The steps are meant to alleviate the plight of the Palestinian population and improve the functioning of the Palestinian Authority.

PA daily ridicules race of U.S. soldier

By ITAMAR MARCUS

Palestinian Media Watch

In the past, Al-Hayat Al-Jadida, the official Palestinian Authority daily, has attacked U.S. national security advisor Condoleezza Rice and used her race as the vehicle to launch what were intended to be personal insults, calling her "coloured," "dark" and "the "Black Lady."

Now, Hafez Barghouthi, the editor of the PA daily, has ridiculed the race of the U.S. Marine who climbed the statue of deposed Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, calling the soldier, because of his Asian appearance, a Mongol who was coming to finish the Mongol invasion of the area by Genghis Khan 700 years ago.

The following are excerpts from the text, which appeared April 10:

"Have you noticed the face of the Marine who climbed Saddam's statue to hang him with a rope pulled by a tank? Concentrate very closely: He has slanted eyes, a flat nose, smooth and hairless chin, thin lips. His face is round and his cheekbones protrude. He is not a Western American. He is of Chinese origin, or Japanese. He has a connection to Mongol origins. This Mongol arrived almost 700 years after the Mongol invasion of Baghdad to finish Holako's plan [Holako was a Tatar who invaded Baghdad in 13th Cent]. He has the same idea as Genghis Khan… The main target of the Mongols was Mecca, in order to exterminate the Islamic religion."

British Jews worry about far right

By ANDREW MORRIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Until recently, Britain was one of the few countries in Europe that did not have a significant far-right movement. Last year, however, the far-right British National Party (BNP) won five seats in local elections.

With a new round of municipal elections approaching, some observers here fear the party will further advance into mainstream politics. A record 218 BNP candidates will stand in the May 1 elections in England and Wales. At a time when war in Iraq, the terrorist threat from militant Islam and the issue of asylum seekers have led to ethnic tensions in some cities, the BNP has been accused of exacerbating the situation by playing on the fears of local populations.

Jewish officials say the BNP is run and supported by people who have made virulently anti-Semitic and racist comments, and at least one party leader has been convicted for attacking a Jewish teacher. Some party activists are known Holocaust deniers.

The party supports repatriation of asylum seekers and a "whites-first" employment and housing policy, yet some worry that the far right could expand its power base.

The BNP recently signaled its intention to openly play the race card when, for the first time, it presented a candidate for local elections in an area with a large Jewish population.

In the northeast London ward of Barkingside, postal worker Julian Leppert sought Jewish votes by claiming that only the BNP was defending the Jewish community from supposed attacks by Muslims and asylum seekers. The tactic alarmed Jewish defence groups and observers of the far-right scene, who say there is no evidence of such attacks.

Local synagogues, mosques, churches and race-relations groups mounted a co-ordinated campaign to highlight the threat from the BNP.

A spokesperson for the Board of Deputies – the umbrella organization that represents most British Jews – was dismissive of Leppert's outreach to the Jews.

The BNP's "policy is one of historic hostility to all minorities, and they are certainly no friends of the Jewish community," the spokesperson said. "They may seek to persuade voters otherwise, but in reality they represent a major threat to our community [and seek to create] discord among others."

The rise of the BNP as an electoral force has been closely watched by British investigative journalist Nick Ryan, whose recent book Homeland: Into a World of Hate describes his six-year odyssey into the heart of the BNP and European and American neo-Nazi groups.

Ryan is skeptical about BNP claims that the party expects to win ethnic votes. "They're looking for the shock headlines," he said. "I would like to see them prove this. They once said they had great support from the Sikh community in one election, and it turned out to be one maverick Sikh guy."

Ryan acknowledged, however, that there is anecdotal evidence that Jews in other parts of Europe have voted for right-wing parties.

"I've heard from some of my contacts that a few Jews in Antwerp voted for the Vlaams Bloc [a Belgium Flemish nationalist party], because of the perceived militant Islamic threat of recently arrived North African immigrants," he said.

But though the extreme right frequently uses the argument that "the enemy of my enemy is my friend," Ryan doesn't expect to find Jews and other minorities voting for the BNP.

The Board of Deputies' spokesperson was equally unconcerned: "Who knows what way certain individuals vote in a secret ballot?" But the claim that the party has significant Jewish support "is nothing but fanciful."

Both Ryan and the Board of Deputies say voter apathy is far more likely than Jewish votes to produce seats for the BNP. Historically, local elections in Britain have seen very low levels of voter turnout. The average is a dismal 25 per cent.

Mainstream British voters are usually not involved in local politics, a phenomenon that aids single-issue and protest parties. The mainstream parties' failure to mobilize their voters has allowed the BNP – whose predecessor, the National Front, saw minor electoral success in the 1970s – to win five seats on local councils in economically deprived, largely white towns and cities in England's north.

With the BNP aggressively focusing on issues such as local housing and employment, which they claim the mainstream parties neglect, protest voters may mark their ballots for the BNP without realizing the ramifications of their vote.

"The BNP play on fear. They want people to think they are the only force that will stand up for them against asylum seekers, high crime, lack of housing and the failure of the major parties to address these issues," Ryan said. "But what the protest voters often don't realize is that underlying this is the race card. A vote for the BNP is, above all else, a vote against black people, Asians and, of course, Jews."

Belgian Jews relieved after law changed

By JONATHAN FISK
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BRUSSELS — Belgian Jews are breathing a sigh of relief after the country revised a controversial law that allowed Belgian courts to try foreigners for alleged crimes against humanity.

"Belgium has come to its senses. It has realized that its position was becoming awkward because of international reactions to this law," said Julien Klener of the Consistoire Central Israelite de Belgique, the official body representing Jews. "Let's hope that the negative criticism Belgium is facing will calm down."

The amendments to the law, passed April 5, bring an end to the lawsuit filed against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon by a group of Palestinians over his alleged role in the 1982 massacre of Palestinians by Lebanese Christian militias in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps.

The law, which aims to prosecute war crimes and genocide wherever they occur, remains unique for its principle of "universal jurisdiction." That extends the reach of Belgian courts to complaints against people with no direct link to the country.

The recent changes, however, will allow the judiciary to reject complaints in which there are no victims of Belgian nationality or in which the plaintiffs have lived in Belgium for less than three years.

The government also will be able to reject cases in which the accused comes from a democratic country where he or she can receive a serious trial.

High-profile cases were becoming increasingly embarrassing to Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt's government. The Sharon case, for example, soured relations between Belgium and Israel and even led to the recall of the Israeli ambassador.

The final straw came last month when a group of Iraqis used the law to file a complaint against former U.S. president George Bush, current U.S. vice-president Dick Cheney, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and U.S. Gen. Norman Schwartzkopf, accusing them of war crimes during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The lawsuit infuriated the current Bush administration and alerted Belgian lawmakers to the dangers of the law.

But Belgian Jews are especially relieved by the dismissal of the case against Sharon.

On the one hand, Belgian Jews were concerned by the deterioration of relations between Israel and Belgium. On the other, they wanted to ensure that the law did not strain their dialogue with Belgian authorities.

"The crisis in the Middle East creates so much confusion in this country already that we do not want to mix things up even more," said Michele Szwarcburt, president of the Centre Communautaire Laic Juif, the secular Jewish community in Brussels.

Szwarcburt said she believes that the law is misunderstood.

"It stems from a generous feeling to fight war crimes," she explained. "But it is unjust to try Sharon. Israel is a democratic country and can try its own nationals. This law would be perfectly acceptable if it were only applied to non-democratic states."

Belgian Jewish officials said they believed they made a difference on the issue.

"Our role here is to ease tensions that have risen between Belgium and the State of Israel," said Philippe Markiewicz, head of the Co-ordinating Committee of Belgian Jewish Organizations.

"But we have absolutely no problem with the authorities," he insisted. "Belgium's international role on the political stage has been saved."

Israel has said that it will return its ambassador, Jehudi Kinar, after Passover.

Kinar was recalled to Jerusalem in February after Belgium's Supreme Court declined to invalidate the law, which would have allowed Sharon to be prosecuted when he left office and lost his diplomatic immunity.

Film fest takes audiences around the Jewish world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs May 3-11 at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W [416- 324-9121] Over the next few weeks, The CJN will be previewing some of the films.

Long before Arab hijackers crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., terrorists attacked the Israeli embassy and the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, Argentina. The bombings, which took place in March 1992 and July 1994, respectively, killed 114 people and were the worst anti-Semitic outrages since the Holocaust.

To Live With Terror, an accusatory documentary by Ton Vriens, to be shown Wednesday, May 7 at 3 p.m., explores these twin acts of terrorism. Pulling no punches, this muckraking film claims that the Argentine authorities have botched the investigation.

Although Carlos Menem, then president of Argentina, promised to hunt down the perpetrators, they remain at large to this day.

Recently, however, Juan Jose Galeano, the judge in charge of the case, issued arrest warrants for four high-ranking Iranian government officials who, he says, helped plan the crimes. Among them are Ali Fallahian, a former minister of security and intelligence, and Ali Akbar Parvaresh, a former deputy speaker of Iran's parliament.

To Live With Terror has little faith in Argentina's judicial system or its federal police force. For example: police removed forensic evidence from the ruins of AMIA, and the government did not establish a proper investigative unit until 1997.

Menem, a Syrian-born Muslim who converted to Christianity in his youth, is portrayed as an ambivalent figure. Although he never bothered to visit the AMIA site, he commiserated with the Jewish community's grief.

According to an Argentine newspaper editor, Menem has "something to hide." Reports suggest he accepted a multi-million dollar bribe to hush up the affair.

He is not the only one who comes off looking badly. A radio talk show host claims that timid local Jewish leaders did not press the government sufficiently hard to resolve the cases.

Amira Hass is an iconoclast. A tough, opinionated reporter who covers the West Bank and the Gaza Strip for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz , she is the subject of Yifat Kedar's Between the Lines, a hard-hitting documentary that explores her background and her beliefs. It will be screened on Friday, May 9 at 1 p.m.

Israeli journalist Amira Hass at work.

Described as a rebellious person who enjoys annoying the powers that-be, Hass is currently the only Israeli Jewish journalist who reports from the territories. She is based in Ramallah. Before being posted to the West Bank, she reported from the Gaza Strip.

Hass, whose mother was a Holocaust survivor, was raised in a communist household. No wonder she has been at odds with Israel's Palestinian policy. Hass claims that the Oslo peace process was doomed and that the intifadah was preordained because Israel's objective is to dominate the Palestinians. She claims that Israelis pay attention to the Palestinians only when violence envelops them.

Between the Lines follows her on assignment in the West Bank and Gaza, where she dodges bullets, has a run-in with Jewish settlers, navigates Israeli checkpoints and pointedly questions a senior Palestinian official about the lack of democracy in the Palestinian Authority.

The film also zeroes in on her brief visit to Berlin, where Hass' old friend speculates that she has alienated many Israelis by virtue of her sympathy for the Palestinians and her strong stories. Contrary to the view espoused by the current Israeli government, Hass believes that Israel has a negotiating partner in the current Palestinian leadership.

A "riddle" to even her mother, Hass is depicted as a single-minded and fearless person whose quest for the truth trumps everything else.

The Bombay Jews, by Rajesh Latkar, focuses on India's largest Jewish community, where about half of India's 5,000 Jews live today. This small, charming film, set to be screened Sunday, May 4 at 3 p.m., only glosses the surface, but as an introduction to Bombay Jewry, it is adequate.

The Bombay Jews unfolds mainly through interviews with communal leaders. Virtually all of them speak highly of India's multicultural society, of the mutual respect that Jews, Hindus and Muslims show to each other (this is a flight of fancy, given last year's Hindu-Muslim clashes) and of the absence of anti-Semitism.

The three main streams of Indian Jewry – the Bene Israel, the Baghdadis and the Cochin Jews – are fleetingly identified, but Latkar stops short of providing a historical survey of this culturally intriguing community.

Shorn drastically by emigration, this is a community that accentuates the importance of Jewish education. But can it survive the perils of attrition and the allure of Israel and the West?

Jews of Armenia: The Hidden Diaspora, by Vartan Akchyan, is the little-known story of a remote Jewish community in the former Soviet Union that has waxed and waned over the centuries.

It boasts a fascinating pedigree, and if its present leader can be believed, Ashkenaz referred originally to Armenia.

Armenia's chief rabbi claims that the Armenians are of partial Semitic stock. It is also claimed that Armenia's ancient Jews, the so-called Zoks, converted to Christianity. Weathered tombstones with Hebrew markings attest to the fact that Jews lived here hundreds of years ago. The current community, which is described as secular and assimilationist, was formed in the 1930s.

This short, atmospheric film, which will be screened Monday, May 5 at 11 a.m., is a window into an exotic Diaspora outpost.

Amen, the newest movie from acclaimed director Constantin Costa-Gavras, deals with the Holocaust, and is a blend of fact and fiction. It is adapted from Rolf Hochhuth's explosive 1964 play, The Deputy, which dwells on Pope Pius XII's refusal to denounce the Nazi extermination of European Jews. It is also based on the biography of Kurt Gerstein, an SS officer who blew the whistle on German crimes.

In Amen, Gerstein (Ulrich Tukur) informs Swedish diplomats and the Vatican that Germany is using Zyklon B gas to slaughter Jews in concentration camps in Poland. As well, he enlists the aid of a well-placed Jesuit priest (Mathieu Kassovitz) to press his case.

To Gerstein's shock, the Vatican is largely indifferent to the plight of the Jews. The United States is not that eager to help either.

There is a vitally important story struggling to emerge in Amen, which will be screened on Saturday, May 3 at 9: 15 p.m. Unfortunately, the film is hobbled by melodrama and never really springs to life.

Valerie Lapin Ganley's Shalom Ireland (Sunday, May 4 at 3 p.m.) celebrates a declining community, one that produced Chaim Herzog, an Israeli president. We're introduced to Joe Briscoe, whose father was Dublin's first Jewish mayor. We're told about the synagogue that was rebuilt with frozen Nazi funds. We also learn about an early 20th century anti-Semitic outbreak in Limerick that temporarily clouded Ireland's otherwise cordial relationship with its Jewish citizens.

* * *

The John Garfield Story (Sunday, May 11 at 11 a.m.) is a nine-minute short about the illustrious 1940s Hollywood actor (The Postman Always Rings Twice and Body and Soul) who played brash, cynical characters and whose meteoric career was tragically cut short by the McCarthyite witchhunt.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL IS NORTH AMERICA'S LARGEST

This season's Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF), which runs at the Bloor Cinema May 3 to 11, is the result of at least six months of intense planning and film screenings, according to Shlomo Schwartzberg, the fest's director of programming.

With about 60 films in its schedule, the 11-year-old TJFF is the biggest Jewish film festival in North America, and operates on a budget of $500,000, Schwartzberg says.

Subsidies come from the Toronto Arts Council, the Trillium Foundation, the Zukerman Foundation, the Israeli and French consulates, the Goethe Institute and other patrons.

Sponsors of individual films include Goodman and Carr, the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation, Delaney Capital Management and the Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman Foundation.

The TJFF is hosting at least a dozen out-of-town directors, actors and other guests this year. Since the fest usually pays for airfare and accommodation, hosting is one of its biggest expenses.

Schwartzberg, a Montreal-born freelance journalist who contributes to the Jerusalem Report, Festival magazine and numerous film industry publications in the United States and Britain, says he has been evaluating an unending parade of films, and negotiating for many of them, since last August.

"Just because you want a film doesn't mean you get it – there are a lot of variables," he says.

Some filmmakers prefer not to submit a work to the TJFF for fear it will be pegged as "too Jewish," thus potentially limiting its audience for general release. And many would rather submit to the much more prominent Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF), which commences in September.

But while the TIFF inevitably draws a few entries away, it may also help the TJFF attract good films, Schwartzberg explains.

"The TIFF has given the city such a cachet that when I request films, it's easier sometimes to get them. Because of the TIFF, Toronto has now been put on the map – we benefit from the credibility that they established. The TIFF has made Toronto more famous and filmmakers start thinking that any festival in the city is good."

Between the Saturday evening opening (the French film Amen by director Costa-Gavras) and the Sunday night closing (the Czech film Nicky's Children, about Nicholas Winton's wartime kindertransports), the festival is expected to attract some 21,000 audience members.

The festival's All-You-Can-Sit Pass ($200) gives access to all showings, while the Regular Deal ($125) is good for 20 films. The Weekday Special ($60) permits entrance into all films prior to 5 p.m. on weekdays.

Tickets: opening night $20, general admission $10, seniors/students $6, weekday matinees $6. Box office, 17 Madison Ave. Web site, www.tjff.com. Festival hotline, 416-324-9121. Festival programs are available at numerous locations around the city.

Yom Hashoah Play: A Christian congregation at a pro-Israel church is staging the premiere of In the Shadow of Death, on Yom Hashoah. Produced and directed by Stephen Puddle, the multimedia performance traces the disintegration of a Jewish family in Stuttgart, Germany, during the Nazi era. The Jewish community is invited to attend. Toronto Airport Church, 272 Attwell Dr., Etobicoke. April 29, 7:30 p.m.

Hot Docs films explore some Mideast and Jewish themes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The 10th annual edition of Hot Docs, the Canadian International Documentary Festival, gets under way April 25 and runs until May 4.

Films will be screened at the Royal Cinema, Bloor Cinema, Innis Town Hall and the Royal Ontario Museum.

Here is a preview:

Aviv Gefen may be Israel's answer to Bob Dylan or Kurt Cobain.

A smouldering rock star whose songs reflect his personal insecurities and his unwavering commitment to peace, Gefen is the subject of Tomer Heymann's absorbing profile, Fed Up Generation (Saturday, May 3 at 11:30 p.m., Royal Cinema).

The charismatic grandson of the legendary Moshe Dayan, he was supposedly the last person to embrace Yitzhak Rabin before his assassination in 1995. On that horrible night in Tel Aviv, Gefen sang his now-famous A Song for Peace ("We'll conquer peace/ and not the territories/We'll bury the guns/not our kids.")

The film – a celluloid catalogue of his life – opens as Gefen, wracked by self-doubt, converses with his flower-child mother. She assures him he is intelligent and sexy and has a great future.

He need not have worried. At a rock concert, his smitten fans swoon and sing along, carried along by the flow and depth of his lyrics.

Devastated by the breakup of his parents' marriage, Gefen composed his first song out of sheer loneliness. Now he has a special place in his heart for his empathetic grandmother, who raised him. ("Thanks for letting me be/what I wanted to be.")

Fued Up Generation exposes a viewer to a soulful artist and a segment of Israeli society rarely seen in the Diaspora.

Visitors arriving at Ben Gurion Airport speed past the adjacent town of Lod (Lydda), bound for brighter, more alluring destinations. Populated by some 50,000 Jews and 25,000 Arabs, Lod, once renowned for its olive groves, is now rundown and neglected, and a centre of Israel's drug trade.

Tsipi Reibenbach, who grew up in Lod as the daughter of Polish Holocaust survivors, returns for a visit. In A City Without Pity (Thursday, May 1 at 9:45 p.m., Royal Cinema), she recalls her childhood, talks to local residents and suggests that Lod has lost the lustre of its civic pride.

Bereft of even a movie theatre, with open sewers despoiling the Arab neighbourhood, Lod looks desolate and forlorn, a template of urban degeneration. To emphasize this point, Reibenbach juxtaposes images of delicate flowers and lemon trees against the harsh reality of Lod's current status.

She leaves us with the impression that the past was better and that relations between Jews and Arabs in Lod leave much to be desired.

* * *

Avi Mograbi, the Israeli comedian, offers a snapshot of Israel in August (Monday, April 28 at 4:30 p.m., Royal Cinema.

For Mograbi, August is a mixed blessing – the hottest time of the year, it's also the month in which his son was born. In general, August is a metaphor for Israel's less redeeming qualities.

August begins as Benjamin Netanyahu, the former prime minister, renounces his leadership of the Likud party. Judging by these excerpts, Mograbi dislikes politicians like Netanyahu.

The camera pans on a busy Kupat Cholim clinic where patients grate on each other's nerves; on Palestinian guest workers denouncing African foreign workers; on rude soccer fans shouting obscenities; on a laid-off employee cursing her former employer; on a mock political demonstration in which West Bank settlers pretend to be Arabs coveting Tel Aviv.

In a film-within-a-film, Mograbi attempts to cast an actress who will play the wife of Baruch Goldstein, the Kiryat Arba medical doctor who single-handedly killed 29 Palestinians in a murderous rampage in 1994.

The Israel that emerges in August is almost uniformly unflattering.

* * *

Shelley Saywell's Generation of Hate (Tuesday, April 29, 7 p.m., Royal Cinema) is extremely timely, being an examination of the effect United Nations economic sanctions had on Iraq before last month's U.S.-led invasion of that bedraggled country.

In her estimation, the embargo reduced Iraq to penury, though this did not stop Saddam Hussein from building gilded palaces.

Saywell claims that while most Iraqis were hardly enamored of Saddam, they were equally critical of the United States.

She lists the regime's human rights violations and exposes its utter disregard of the environment.

In a prescient observation, Saywell states, "The regime can't buy the loyalty of the people." Wise words.

Saywell's shocking film, Crimes of Honour (Wednesday, April 30 at 4:30 p.m., Royal Cinema), deals with the issue of "honour" killings in Jordan and the West Bank.

"Honour" crimes, which highlight the festering conflict between tradition and modernity in Muslim societies, are perpetrated by male relatives (brothers and fathers). The victims are hapless women deemed to have dishonoured their families.

A woman can "dishonour" a family by falling in love with the wrong person, by engaging in premarital sex or by having been raped, even in a case of incest.

Although "honour" crimes are not sanctioned by the Koran, they are deeply embedded in ancient tribal codes, and often occur when pride trumps simple common sense and humanity. More often than not, "honour" killings take place in poorer families, where honour seems more important than wealth.

Saywell tells the stories of several women who have felt the wrath of their aggrieved families, including 23-year-old Rania Arafat of Amman, who was disinherited and condemned to death when she bowed out of a marriage with a cousin and fled with a boyfriend.

Festival features three films about Righteous Gentiles

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs May 3-11 at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. [416- 324-9121] Over the next few weeks, The CJN will be previewing some of the films.

MONSIEUR BATIGNOLE

Monsieur Batignole (France 2002) is a simple, deeply satisfying feature film about one man's efforts, despite his otherwise unheroic life, to rescue three children from the Nazis.

Batignole, a middle-class butcher in wartime Paris, hardly seems to care when his upstairs neighbours, the Bernsteins, are deported for being Jewish; after all, it was his own daughter's fiancé who denounced them.

His main goal seems to be to become chief purveyor of meats and other goods to the occupying Nazi forces. But when young Simon Bernstein shows up three days later at the Bernstein's former apartment, which the Batignoles have taken for themselves, the ordinary butcher unhesitatingly rearranges his allegiances and hides the boy at considerable risk to himself.

He swears it it just until morning, but as new complications arise, Batignole goes to increasingly greater lengths to protect the boy – as well as the two girls, Simon's cousins, who materialize one evening in his basement.

The Batignoles stand proudly outside the butcher shop.

And thus the stage is set for the unfolding of this mostly realistic fable about the remarkable transformation of Citizen Batignole from bourgeois opportunist to Righteous Gentile.

Actually, Batignole's transformation is somewhat trickier than that. As he attempts to smuggle the children to freedom in neighbouring Switzerland, he starts to identify fully with the Jews whose tragic fate he had previously regarded as none of his business. Fate has now given him this rescue mission, and he commits himself to it despite the various setbacks, including Simon's sometimes annoying behaviour, that test his resolve along the way.

Some moviegoers may be torn over the appropriateness of a film set in Nazi-occupied Paris that purports to be a warm-hearted dramatic comedy, and glosses over the cruelty and inhumanity of the deportations and the death camps.

Doesn't this violate our sombre and sacred duty to remember? But like Life Is Beautiful, Monsieur Batignole demonstrates that laughter also has its place in the genre, and that Holocaust films need not always be grim and heroic.

For Gerard Jugnot, who wrote and directed as well as played the title role – brilliantly, in all instances – the film may be a way of indulging in some wishful thinking: the wish is that more citizens could have been like this ordinary man who behaves nobly when faced with a difficult moral choice. In the meantime, the film sidesteps many painful realities about Vichy France's complicity with the Germans – a forgiveable lapse, once you recognize Jugnot was attempting much more than a history lesson.

The young actor Jules Sitrok charms us as Simon: he reminded me of the young Alexander in the Bergman film Fanny and Alexander. Like that Bergman masterpiece, Monsieur Batignole seems to project a certain mystical aura around the Jews, as though they benefit, even in the darkest moments of their history, from some sort of miraculous intervention. What else is it, after all, that pulls the strings of fate and puts the unwary Simon and his cousins into the hands of so unlikely a protector as Monsieur Batignole?

Jugnot felt the need to temper the happy ending with a postscript that his fictional children were never reunited with their parents, who were presumably slaughtered on the Nazi's immense butcher's-block.

It is the underlying bleakness and despair, rarely alluded to in this film but a defining element of the genre, that make the drama so real and the comic moments so poignant.

The TJFF screens Monsieur Batignole on Thursday May 8 at 1 p.m.

NICKY'S CHILDREN

This rousing, feature-length documentary focuses on the life of the Righteous Gentile Nicholas Winton, who, as a 29-year-old London stockbroker on vacation in Czechoslovakia in 1938, was driven to action after seeing the plight of Czech Jewish children facing death at the hands of the Nazis. It was Winton who established the Kindertransport trains that brought 669 Jewish children to safety in England.

Modestly, he kept his remarkable accomplishments to himself; his wife brought his great heroism to world attention after discovering his hidden scrapbooks in 1988. Veteran CBC reporter Joe Schlesinger, who was among the children Winton rescued, narrates the film, which includes a memorable reunion of Winton and many of the people he saved.

Schlesinger and other Kindertransport survivors will be in attendance at the TJFF screening of Nicky's Children, which closes the festival on Sunday May 11 at 9 p.m.

SECRET LIVES: HIDDEN CHILDREN AND THEIR RESCUERS DURING WWII

Herself hidden by Lithuanians as a baby, Academy award-winning director Aviva Slesin profiles numerous Righteous Gentiles from France, Lithuania, Poland, Belgium and Holland, along with the children they sheltered in this inspirational 71-minute film.

Emerging from varying political and religious backgrounds and social classes, each of the rescuers acted according to their consciences, without worrying about the consequences. Many speak out for the first time about what compelled them to risk so much in the service of decency.

Director Aviva Slesin is scheduled to attend the TJFF screening of Secret Lives: Hidden Children and Their Rescuers During WWII, on Thursday May 8 at 7:15 p.m.

According to Saywell, King Abdullah II of Jordan is trying to discourage "honour" crimes, while liberated Jordanian women are fighting back by staging protests and founding movements to combat these killings.

Behind the Camera (Wednesday, April 30 at noon, Royal Cinema) is essentially a family album of a German-Jewish family in Weimar Germany from 1927 to 1936.

Joanna Mexellon's brief film is based on the flickering home movies of Rachel Rockstein, who recorded picnics, weddings and vacations.

Rockstein, who later immigrated to New York City, recreates an era shattered by the iron fist of fascism and anti-Semitism.

Curacao's Jews have a long, rich history

By MELANIE REFFES
Special to The CJN

CURACAO — Sitting on the shores of the warm Caribbean Sea, Curacao is the largest of the six islands that make up the Netherland Antilles and one of the most picturesque.

Just 61 kilometres long and 12 kilometres wide, this pastel-coloured piece of paradise is north of Venezuela and under three hours, by air, from Miami. It's a sophisticated island with a cosmopolitan history and one of the best-kept secrets in the Caribbean. But what really sets Curacao apart from any other island in the Caribbean is its Jewish history.

Called the "Cradle of Judaism in the Americas," Curacao is home to the oldest Jewish synagogue in continuous use in the Western Hemisphere.

The Mikve Israel-Emanuel Synagogue, or the "Snoa," which means synagogue in the local Creole language Papiamentu, is located at the northeastern corner of the walled capital city of Willemstad and takes up most of the block. Founded in 1651 and consecrated in 1732, the Snoa is older than the more famous Touro Synagogue in Rhode Island, which was actually founded in 1763 by several congregants from Curacao.

Today, the Curacao Snoa is affiliated with the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation and the World Union for Progressive Judaism and, along with its adjoining museum, is one of the top tourist attractions on the island.

The first Jew to arrive in Curacao was Samuel Cohen. He served as an interpreter on board the Dutch fleet that conquered the island from the Spaniards in 1634. A few years later in 1651, a dozen more Jewish families from the Amsterdam Portuguese community immigrated to Curacao with a second wave following in 1659.

Most of the early settlers were from Spain and Portugal and had fled the Inquisition, at first finding refuge in Holland and Brazil and later in Curacao. Through the centuries, the Jews flourished in banking, shipping and commerce, and today still own many of the island's businesses.

By the end of the 18th century, the Jews made up more than half of the white population in Curacao. At the turn of the 19th century, the Jewish community was the largest and wealthiest in the New World, supporting synagogues in Caracas, Panama, Jamaica, South Carolina, Philadelphia and New York. Some of those congregations still offer a special prayer for the Curacao community every year on Yom Kippur.

Today, there are just 427 Jewish souls left on the island out of a total population of fewer than 200,000. Heske Zelermyer is one of them. Born and raised in Curacao, she is married to the Snoa's rabbi, Gerald Zelermyer.

"When I was little, I would go to services with my aunts and sit upstairs in the woman's gallery and throw sand downstairs, which gathered on the rims of the hats the men wore," she remembers. "It's a very powerful emotion to realize that our ancestors from the Inquisition did exactly the same thing."

Today a thick white carpet of that fine white sand covers the Snoa's entire floor. According to Rene Madura, the synagogue's past president, the reasons are both practical and symbolic.

"The first reason is to remind us of the Sinai desert and our forefathers 40 years of wandering there," he says, "Secondly, many of our ancestors were secret Jews in Spain and Portugal and they'd put sand on their rooms of worship to help muffle the sounds during services."

The Snoa is typical of the Sephardi synagogues of the period, with old Spanish tiles lining the courtyard, a magnificent mahogany Theba where the rabbi conducts services, and walls that are some 70 centimetres thick and made of limestone and coral and filled with sea sand.

The adjoining museum, which was the original rabbi's house and a mikvah, houses some of the rarest Jewish artifacts in the world, including a Torah scroll brought from Amsterdam by the island's original settlers and a large battered 200-year-old silver tray from Holland that is still used for the smashing of the wine-glass during wedding ceremonies. (The custom in Curacao is a bit different than elsewhere: the groom crashes the crystal goblet down onto the tray rather than crushing it beneath his foot.)

Also in the Snoa's collection are hand-wrought silver K'tarim (Torah crowns) from the first half of the 18th century, colourful hand-decorated ketubot (marriage contracts) from 1739 and a silver havdalah spice box dating to 1704. But perhaps the most magnificent piece of the past is an exquisite Dutch-made pipe organ that used to be played during services.

Today, music remains a major part of the Snoa, says Gideon Zelermyer, Heske Zelermyer's oldest son and the cantor at Montreal's Shaare Zion congregation. At just 27 years old, he is not only one of the only Curacaoans in Montreal (if not the only one!), but he's also one of the world's foremost experts on Dutch Jewish music.

The exterior (top) and interior of the Mikve Israel Emanuel 'Snoa.'

"I began researching the unique music of Curacao's Jewish community in Israel in 1999 and continued by going through the archives in Curacao a year later," Gideon says. "The music is typical of the Spanish Portuguese school, supremely lyrical and melodic with hints of the island's dance rhythms."

Along with his Israeli teacher Raymond Goldstein, Gideon rescued many cantorial tunes from dusty boxes in the Snoa and has recorded a CD of Curacao's Jewish music, which will be available this spring.

To his mother, the restoration of the music of her island gives her great pride.

"God gave Gideon a gift," she says. "He loves and lives music and has talent and a gorgeous voice. Now others will get to hear it on his CD."

The spirit of the Sephardi Jews who came to Curacao all those years ago in search of religious freedom is still evident after 350 years. With the fiery determination of the island's contemporary Jewish community, that spirit will surely be alive and well for at least another 350 years.

Laughter is the best medicine

Is there a place for humour and laughter when it comes to religion? Can one be a devout follower of Islam and still have a sense of humour? Is humour holy? Are the Simpsons good Christian role models?

These questions are answered in the informative one-hour documentary Righteous Humour, airing on Vision TV on April 28 at 8 p.m.

Over the past year, interviews have been conducted with leaders of major faith groups to get their take on the role that humour plays in their religion. Interviews were also conducted with some up-and-coming comedians who incorporate religion into their acts.

One Muslim comedian is very candid with the response to his act. A Jewish comedian talks about being Jewish and his special Jewish comedy nights, as well as the way he handled a heckler who attempted to make a vicious anti-Semitic joke. Another Jewish comedian with a Muslim wife discusses how he incorporates their situation into his act, and the responses he gets.

Executive producer Marion Schwarz says Righteous Humour is both timely and important. "It shows that our similarities are far greater than our differences. It is vital to remember in these trying times how important humour and laughter are."

Rabbi says Jewish-Jewish marriage has higher 'happiness factor'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When it comes to intermarriage, prevention is the best medicine, according to Rabbi Doron Kornbluth.

"It's like eating right, and exercise," he said in an interview.

A 33-year-old Montrealer who made aliyah in 1991, Rabbi Kornbluth is the author of Why Marry Jewish? Surprising Reasons for Jews to Marry Jews, a new book published by Targum/Feldheim. He spoke recently at Toronto's Pride of Israel Synagogue on Helping Our Kids Marry Jewish.

A graduate of the Université de Montréal, where he studied political science, sociology and economics, Rabbi Kornbluth received private smichah in Israel, where he now teaches Jewish thought at Neve Yerushalayim, a women's yeshivah.

He started researching intermarriage two years ago, after being asked to work on an educational project for Heritage House, an independent organization that has free Jewish youth hostels in Israel and where Rabbi Kornbluth works part-time.

"Everybody I know has relatives or friends intermarrying or dating non-Jews," Rabbi Kornbluth told The CJN at the Thornhill headquarters of Aish HaTorah. He is not affiliated with the Orthodox outreach organization, but spoke in a private home at an event organized by the group.

"To just say intermarriage is wrong doesn't get you very far," said Rabbi Kornbluth. He said he wrote the book to create a user-friendly volume for the "modern Jewish single" and to help other interested parties understand how to deal with the issues.

Many parents hesitate to say they prefer their children to marry Jewish, because they "have a gut feeling it's racist," he said. Acknowledging differences between people is not racist, but demanding that someone give up part of his or her heritage is, he told parents later that evening.

"The truth is, the best thing you can do for your kids is to wisely and carefully encourage them to marry Jewish."

Statistically, he noted, a marriage between two people of the same religion is more likely to last and generally has a higher "marital happiness factor." It is also better for children's self-esteem and sense of identity, he said.

The average Jew in his or her twenties is not as involved Jewishly as they were in childhood and doesn't realize that his or her Jewish involvement is likely to rise again, he said. "People change."

Parents can minimize the chances of their children intermarrying by living a strong, committed Jewish life, he said. "The earlier you start, the easier it is."

Some of the ways parents can boost the odds of their children marrying a Jew include articulating their views on intermarriage, role modelling Jewish involvement, facilitating their children's Jewish involvement, and creating positive Jewish memories, said Rabbi Kornbluth, who has three sons ranging from 6 months to 4 years old.

Sometimes, he said, parents are afraid of being hypocritical and hesitate to make a Shabbat dinner, for example, because they don't keep kosher. "It's not hypocritical," he said. "Everything counts."

Parents of teens should be careful not to force anything on them, he said. "Pick things that work… When parents know their kids, they will know what to push and what not to push."

If the parent-child relationship is tenuous, he added, "do not push Jewish stuff." Instead, he recommended continuing to be an example of a committed Jew.

If parents feel they are part of a special legacy and that each Jew counts, he said, they will naturally give that to their kids.

Rabbi Kornbluth added that it's not necessarily too late for parents of older children who have not taken "preventative" measures. "Talk about it sincerely... being honest is a starting point. Start to get involved yourselves."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Can you tell me which fruits and vegetables have the most nutrients or vitamins?

A. As a rule, the best way to choose the most healthful fruits and vegetables is to look for the ones most brightly coloured – rich, dark red peppers, cantaloupes, strawberries, broccoli, spinach, blueberries and sweet potatoes are all excellent choices. One exception is cauliflower, which, while pale in colour is rich in nutrients.

The other important factor is freshness. Always try to choose produce that is at the height of its season and that is locally grown, as these will contain the highest number of vitamins. Lastly, remember that frozen and canned vegetables are also good choices as they are often picked at the peak of their freshness.

Q. I like to eat eggs often, and I find they really fill me up, but I am concerned about their fat and cholesterol content. Should I cut back?

A. You are right. Eggs are high in fat and cholesterol, but they can be filling and satisfying because they are an excellent source of protein. The good news is all of the protein is in the white and all of the fat is in the yolk. My suggestion is to keep eating eggs, but use more whites and fewer or no yolks to reduce the fat content. Also be mindful of the amount of butter or oil you use in the pan if you really want to be fat conscious.

Loved ones leave us with sense of legacy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When a loved one dies, our assumptions are destroyed, says Stephen Fleming, a psychologist who specializes in grief counselling.

"Our expectations of justice are challenged and shattered and we are faced with the demands of restructuring ourselves," said Fleming at a recent lecture co-sponsored by Temple Sinai's young family's committee and Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario.

Facing a loss can be a daunting challenge, "but it is the price you pay for loving. When you lose someone, you never get over it," said Fleming, also a lecturer at York University's Atkinson College.

When someone dies, he said, people left behind see the world as a more dangerous place. "If someone you love dies, than someone else can die as well. Your world suddenly begins to shrink."

He rejected the traditional stages of grief – denial, anger, bargaining, depression and acceptance – arguing instead that death is never accepted.

"Maybe there is resignation, but there is no acceptance. There is no such thing as recovery."

After a loss, people need to restructure their behaviour, he said. "Too much time is spent talking about emotional responses to a loss, and physical responses are ignored."

Fleming spoke of one woman who had always driven to work with her husband. "When she returned to work after he died, she automatically entered the car through the passenger side. The old behaviour didn't work anymore. She needed to learn a whole new set of behaviours."

When people grieve, they feel shattered, he said. "When you lose a loved one, parts of yourself are lost as well."

With every relationship we lose, however, we are left with a legacy, he said. "There are lessons learned in living and loving, and these transform us irrevocably. As we change, we become different, and maybe even better."

By changing, he said, we revise our assumptions and the world becomes more accurate. "When our belief in justice is shattered, we realize that our perspective was all an illusion. When we finally begin to rebuild our assumptive world, we rebuild it more accurately."

By recognizing a legacy, "an ongoing relationship with the deceased is maintained. You are forever transformed through this relationship. If there are six family members, there will be six different relationships with the person."

People who are grieving are not necessarily depressed, Fleming said.

"The symptoms that do overlap include being down, and feeling no energy. What is distinguishable about depression, though, are feelings of self-condemnation, worthlessness and feeling unlovable. There is no internal sense of self-condemnation in grief."

He said grief is not made any easier if a loved one's death is expected. "There is no such thing as anticipatory grief. Every death is perceived as sudden because as long as you can reach out and touch someone, you cannot imagine their absence."

Trauma victims, Fleming said, experience similar symptoms to those who are grieving. "Grief and trauma closely resemble one another; each has profound implications."

Problems arise when grief is attached to the trauma, he said. "The implication is that the trauma needs to be dealt with in order to appreciate the legacy of the loved one."

That's because trauma complicates the issues of grief, he said. "There are often police investigations, and litigation is ongoing. Trauma victims suffer from post-traumatic estrangement. They do not feel connected to the world. They have trouble feeling connected to someone whose life is intact."

FINE PROPERTIES

THE SPRING MARKET & YOUR HOME

By
Paul F. Slavens
Manager-Broker, Paul Slavens Real Estate Inc.

Just as the flowers will bloom, "For Sale" signs will be springing up all across Central and North Toronto. Some homes will move quickly and the owner will proudly show off the "Sold" sign on the front lawn. Owners are very proud of this sign, because usually it means that the ideal goal of moving up to a more desirable home or a lifestyle change will be achieved.

But what can one say of those properties that sit there month after month? The "For Sale" Sign lingers out on the front lawn, as though there is something wrong with the house. After 34 years in the real estate business, I can offer one insight about those signs and that is: It isn't always the fault of the property.

The RIGHT BROKER can -- and does -- make a difference. All brokers are not the same. The reason Paul Slavens Real Estate Inc. has succeeded in delivering results in rising and falling markets comes down to one key point. We are owner-managed and -operated, and dedicated to building an organization with key agents that are committed to us. Quite simply, we attract the BEST AGENTS. Recently, many younger sales representatives have chosen to pursue their careers at PAUL SLAVENS. That means the broadest mix of buyers can be tapped to look at your property, from established agents, to those in touch with the "thirty-something" market that is powering real estate sales in our marketplace.

In addition, my role is as MANAGER-BROKER; I do not compete against my representatives. Instead, my sole function is to lend my marketing skills, experience and prestige to help our agents negotiate a satisfactory sale. I am proud to state that I do not sell real estate directly; I help close deals. And making deals is what this business is all about.

Perhaps this Spring, you will be contemplating selling your home. You've heard some talk about the market, and it's been some time since you've had an updated opinion of the value of your property.

Here are several points to consider when selecting a BROKER: all of them are reasons you should call the "SLAVENS TEAM".

Longevity: Is there a proven track record behind the Real Estate Broker you are considering? How many years has the Agency been in business? For how many properties have they successfully negotiated and completed the sale on behalf of satisfied clients?

Owner/Manager: does the principal Broker sell, in competition with his own Sales Representatives? In there someone in the organization who can provide objective, impartial analysis concerning your transaction?

Agents: Are there expenenced, professional sales representatives in the office? How long have they been with the Company? The longer they stay with the Company, the greater likelihood that they are skillful and successful producers.

Advice: Have you been given a thorough "look" at your property, with insights on all of the many small marketing tips that can help make it sell quicker, and for a better price?

Price: Is the offering price realistic, and are you knowledgeable about comparable sales in your area, determining whether your home is comparable, or not, to these other properties?

Mortgage Financing: Can your Broker provide you with sources of funds for your next transaction, and make the sale of your present property more attractive to the buyer?

If the answers to the above are NOT in the AFFIRMATIVE, then you should talk to an agent at Paul Slavens Real Estate. If you call our office and mention this column, a qualified representative will give you a free, no-cost, no-obligation property market evaluation.

Fitness guru promotes short, intense workouts

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Harley Pasternak has a message for anybody who thinks they can't really get into shape unless they put in at least an hour a day at a gym or sports club.

Think again, says the physical fitness expert and personal trainer. You don't have to ride a bike for an hour or more, or pound the rubber on a treadmill until the next guy in line says time's up.

If you adopt a multivariable training (MVT) technique, but perform the exercises with the proper intensity and variety, you can experience great results after relatively short workouts, he says.

That means performing a number of different exercises, constantly changing the routine, and using "ultra-high resistance" cables or barbells in short, intense workouts that could last half an hour. The results will amaze you, he says.

Lunges, leg curls, ab crunches, shoulder presses, tricep pushdowns are all common exercises and when combined with cable-resistant machines, can work to give you quick results. The exercises should mimic the body's natural, everyday movements while stimulating muscle growth and promoting fat loss.

Exercises mimic natural movements

The theory behind the program is a synthesis of the general adaptation syndrome, pioneered by Hans Selye, which holds that the body reacts to stress but less so as it adapts to a particular stimulus. Once it gets used to a particular stress, the body's reaction lessens.

By constantly changing your exercise routine – the exercises, the number of repetitions, the time between sets – you can keep stimulating your body and improve its performance.

Pasternak's approach to exercise has found an appreciative and glamourous market segment that promises to continue growing. As his Web site notes (www.harleypasternak.com), he has become known as the fitness guru for Hollywood north.

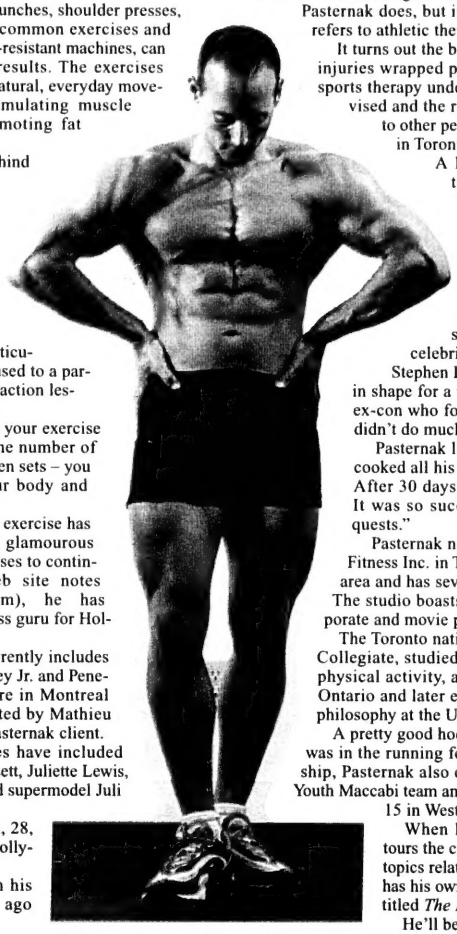
His roster of clients currently includes Halle Barre, Robert Downey Jr. and Penelope Cruz, all of whom are in Montreal working on a movie directed by Mathieu Kassovitz, who is also a Pasternak client.

Other celebrity trainees have included Stephen Dorff, Angela Bassett, Juliette Lewis, Bai Ling, Eliza Dushku and supermodel Juli Ordon.

At this point, Pasternak, 28, is limiting himself to the Hollywood glamour set.

Pasternak happened on his career four or five years ago somewhat by accident.

At the time, rock band Limp Biscuit was in Toronto for a concert and a couple of the performers had injuries that needed attention. He was contacted by a band representative, who was looking for an athletic trainer. That's what Pasternak does, but in the United States the term refers to athletic therapists.



It turns out the boys in the band wanted some injuries wrapped prior to the show. With some sports therapy under his belt, Pasternak improvised and the result was a recommendation to other performers who happened to be in Toronto.

A little while later, Pasternak trained actor James Caviezel (The Count of Monte Christo) for a film, Angel Eyes, that also featured Jennifer Lopez.

Word spread that there's a guy in Toronto who can whip you into shape quickly. His roster of celebrity clients quickly grew.

Stephen Dorff, for instance, had to get in shape for a movie in which he played an ex-con who for eight years in the slammer didn't do much beyond getting in shape.

Pasternak lived with Dorff for a month, cooked all his meals and trained him daily. After 30 days, "he looked phenomenal... It was so successful, I got a load of requests."

Pasternak now runs Bodiworx Health & Fitness Inc. in Toronto's Yonge and Eglinton area and has seven trainers working for him. The studio boasts a roster of individual, corporate and movie production clients.

The Toronto native, who attended York Mills Collegiate, studied kinesiology, the science of physical activity, at the University of Western Ontario and later earned a master's in exercise philosophy at the University of Toronto.

A pretty good hockey player who at one point was in the running for a college hockey scholarship, Pasternak also excelled at golf, making the Youth Maccabi team and representing Toronto at age 15 in West Bloomfield, Mich.

When he's not training others, he tours the country and speaks on various topics related to physical fitness, and he has his own TV show on the W network titled The Right Fit.

He'll be appearing at the Fitness and Model Expo (FAME) at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre May 2-3.

"נגיעה עם נמשים" מאת: רות סגל, הוצאת עם עובד

הסיפור הוא סיפורה האישי של רות סגל על ילדותה בפולניה בזמן מלחמת העולם השנייה. כידוע, סגל היא היום שחקנית תיאטרון בישראל. הספר מתאים לכולם, מבוגרים ונוער כאחד; מעין דיווח ישיר של ילדה שמביאה עובדות מבלי לרצות לגרום לזעזוע אלא לספר את הסיפור כפשוטו. קורות סיפור הישרדותה של רות סגל, ילדה יהודייה בפולניה רחוק מלהיות פשוט אלא שהוא מובא מנקודת מבטה ובשמה של ילדה שאיננה יודעת עדיין כיצד לעשות מניפולאציות רגשיות.

זכרונותיה של רות (רותציקו) מתחילים בעיירה קטובִיץ, ברחוב מריאצקה, שם היה לה בית חם ומשפחה אוהבת. אבי, אם ואחות. עד 1939 היא ידעה שמחה ושלוות חיים. כשרון המשחק שלה מתגלה כבר בילדותה; כשאמא שמה תקליט מאוסף האופרות שלה, כולם היו מבקשים: "יעכשיו את רותציקו" והיא הייתה עוטפת עצמה במפת שולחן או וילון ורוקדת לקולותיהם של בנימינו ג'ילי או יוזף שמידט. אחרי 1939 הכל השתנה. אף אחד לא היה מעוניין יותר בהצגות שלה, לא שמים לב אליה, אבא דבוק לרדיו ואמא בחרדה מתמדת.

לאביה של רות היה ברור בעוד מועד שאם יחכו לבואם של הגרמנים, המשפחה אבודה. כך נפתח מסע גלגוליה של המשפחה מבית, לבית ממקום מסתור אחד לשני. תחילה נפרדים מהעזרת הגוייה שתרשה לעצמה לגנוב את כל חפצי הבית שהותירה המשפחה ואחר כך נוסעים לסבתא בלומה באולקוש. שם כבר קוראים בעיתונים שהגרמנים פלשו לפולין. לזמן מה תושבי המקום בטוחים ש"חצבה הפולני עומד בגבורה בפני התוקפים." אשליה זו כמובן תתנפץ מהר מאוד. שוב האב, בנגוד לדעת אשתו, מתעקש שחייבים להמשיך לנדוד; לצורך זה הוא רוכש סוס ועגלה. למרות כל המורא, הסבל והחשכה בעולמה של הילדה היא לא תאבד את אישיותה החזקה, אומץ לבה ואפילו את חוש ההומור.

הקורבן הראשון היא אחותה של רות, הלינה שהתעקשה לנסוע לאהובה וסופה שתשלח למחנה השמדה. מאז לאבא ואמא, לדברי הילדה יש פרצופים של "אני יודע משהו, אבל לא יכול לספר." דווקא רב-סרן גרמני שהאב מיודד עמו מזרז את המשפחה להימלט מהאזור ולנסות להתבולל בקרב האוכלוסיה הלא-יהודית בעיר הגדולה וורשה. האם צובעת את שערה ואת רות מתרגלים להחפץ לילדה קתולית. מעתה שמה: אירנקה. "אל תשתמשי בכלל בשמות הקודמים, אפילו לא בבית ואפילו לא בחלום! השמות החם מתו!... מה המקצוע של אבא שלך? הוא היה סוחר. לא! לא! לא! אבא שלך היה מורה. סוחר זה מקצוע יהודי! אבא שלך היה מורה!"

קצב המעבר מדירה, לדירה, וממקום סתר אחד לשני גובר. האם כבר לא יוצאת אף פעם ממקום המחבוא שכן על אף צבע השער החדש, "האף שלה בשרני והעיניים עצובות; כל הגורל היהודי משתקף בעיניים שלה." לילדה, כך אומרים, מראה לא רע; האף קטן ועכשיו יש לה צמות. "ממש שיקסלה קטנה, רק חבל שהנמשים היהודיים נשארו." כך אומרים עליה והיא תוהה: "עם נמשים זה דבר יהודי?" מיום ליום נאלצים בני המשפחה לחוות יותר רעב ויותר השפלה ומגיע אף היום בו מסוכן להמשיך לחיות כמשפחה; כל אחד נאלץ לחיות בנפרד. רות מסתתרת עם בנות נוצריות ולומדת בקומפלט, "מין בית ספר שמתנהל בבתים פרטיים, במחתרת." היא מתאהבת בנער אנטישמי ועליה ללמוד אצל כומר שונא יהודים. קרן אור בחייה היא חברתה אולה.

השלגים נמסים, האביב פורץ בשלל צבעיו וחייה של רות-אירנקה קשים מנשוא. לאחר מרד המחתרת הפולנית בוורשה נשלחים הפולנים למחנה עבודה בגרמניה. אירנקה וארבעת חברותיה הנוצריות (לאחר המלחמה יסתבר שכולן יהודיות!) נשלחות למחנה בעיר בריג. הן עובדות בתנאים אוימים בבית חרושת לסוכר אך הן שורדות. סבלן לא תם גם לאחר שחרור המחנה על-ידי הצבא הרוסי; חייל רוסי אונס את חברתה הטובה, אולה.

(כתבה זו מוקדשת לחברתי הטובה חנה גליקמן.)

SPINACH SALAD W/ORANGES & ALMONDS

6 tblsps. vegetable oil	1 tblsp. honey
1/4 cup fresh orange juice	1 tblsp. chopped fresh tarragon
3 green onions, minced	1 tsp. grated orange peel
3 tblsps. unseasoned rice vinegar	4 oranges
1 pkg. spinach	2/3 cup sliced almonds, toasted

Whisk first 7 ingredients in small bowl. Season with salt & pepper. Cut peel and white pith from oranges and cut into segments. (Dressing and oranges can be made 1 day ahead. Cover separately and chill. Rewhisk dressing before using.)

Combine spinach, half of almonds, and all orange segments in large bowl with enough dressing to coat. Divide among plates. Sprinkle with almonds. Makes 6 servings.

About Food

Dear Norene

Hana Greenfield was liberated from the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in 1945. She returned to Kolin, Czechoslovakia, hoping to find her family, who had lived there for generations. There she found her sister Irena and her rabbi, who had lost his entire family. The rabbi was trying to resurrect the synagogue and prepare it for Rosh Hashanah. He told the sisters to cut up an apple and dip it in honey.

"I'll never forget his words," said Greenfield. He told us, "As bitter as was our past life, we should have a sweet future."

Before World War II, the Jews of Czechoslovakia numbered 380,000; only eight per cent survived. A writer, Greenfield divides her time between Tel Aviv and Prague, where she runs a program teaching Czech youth about tolerance and educating them about the Holocaust. The program is funded from the proceeds of her book, Fragments of memory (1992).

When she was a young girl, Greenfield learned this recipe from her family's maid. She said, "Years later, when I married and had children in Israel, I wrote Anka asking for the recipes for the wonderful food I had in my memory, like this apple kugel."

It's just a tiny sampling of the treasures found in The Foods of Israel Today by Joan Nathan (Knopf, $60 Cdn), a wonderful book that deserves a place in every Jewish cookbook collection.

CZECH APPLE-NOODLE KUGEL

1/4 cup raisins
1/4 cup orange or apricot liqueur
8 oz. egg noodles
1/4 lb. (1/2 stick) unsalted butter or pareve margarine
2 lb. Granny smith or other flavourful apples (about 6), cored, peeled and grated
1/2 cup light brown sugar
1/4 cup apricot jam
1/2 cup roughly chopped walnuts (optional)
1 tsp. salt
4 large eggs

Put raisins in a small bowl with liqueur. Let sit for about 30 minutes while you prepare the kugel, until raisins are plumped.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x12-inch baking pan. Cook noodles according to package directions and drain.

Meanwhile, heat butter or margarine in a frying pan. Add apples, brown sugar and jam. Saute until the apples are soft. Remove from pan, reserving a few tablespoons of the liquid.

Place noodles in a large bowl with the apples, walnuts, salt, raisins and any liqueur not absorbed. In a separate bowl, beat eggs well; mix with noodles, then pour into prepared pan. Brush top with reserved liquid from apples. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.
